negligence in this regard by the defendant. None of them go to the length of holding that a railroad company must police its lines with fire fighters, or impose upon train crews the duty of extinguishing fires which may arise along the lines of the railway at any point during the passage of a train over the tracks of the company. On the contrary, in the case of Kenney v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 70 Mo. 252, it is held: "That the company is not liable because its servants neglected to extinguish the fire when they discovered it on the track. It was their duty as citizens to prevent the spread of the fire, and by their conduct on the occasion . . . they manifested a cruel and brutal indifference to the destruction of a neighbor's property; but it was not in the line of their employment, and was no more their duty to extinguish the fire than that of any other person who saw it."

In the case of Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Shipley, 39 Md. 251, the court said: "A company is not obliged to keep men stationed along the line of its road either to guard against or to extinguish fires which may happen. With trains passing almost at every hour on many roads, and with a rapidity unknown to any other power, it would be utterly impracticable to keep men stationed at every point where a fire may occur. To impose such a duty would not only be unreasonable in itself, but it would . . . make railroad companies insurers against loss by fire of all the property along the line of their roads."

In connection with the thought expressed in these decisions from other jurisdictions, the language of Chief Justice Gibson, in New York & E. R. Co. v. Skinner, 19 Pa. 298, 57 Am. Dec. 654, is suggestive. He said: "The irresponsibility of a railway company for all but negligence or wanton injury is a necessity of its creation. A train must make the time necessary to fulfil its engagements with the postoffice and the passengers; and it must be allowed to fulfil them at the sacrifice of secondary interests put in its way; else it could not fulfil them at all."

We are, therefore, of the opinion that in the case at bar the defendant company cannot be held guilty of negligence because of the failure of its crew to leave their train and engage in the work of extinguishing the fire started on lands adjoining its right of way. To enforce this measure of duty would be to impose too heavy a burden on the company and one that would seriously interfere with the rights, not only of the company, but of the public as well. The delay incident to the movement of trains would be intolerable.

For another reason it is equally true that there could be no recovery by the plaintiffs in this case. The negligence alleged is the negligence of the train crew in not extinguishing the fire. This duty was not within the scope of employment of the train crew. They were employed for the purpose of operating the train and moving it from one destination to another. Their employment related wholly to the movement of the trains. Their duties were confined to this and to this alone. It could not be successfully alleged that the terms of their employment contemplated the performance of any such duties as that of extinguishing fires. It is a well-recognized principle of the law of negligence that an employer is not liable for any act or omission of the employee that is not within the scope of his employment. Guille v. Campbell, 200 Pa. 119, 55 L.R.A. 111, 86 Am. St. Rep. 705, 49 Atl. 938, 10 Am. Neg. Rep. 459; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Rosenzweig, 113 Pa. 519, 6 Atl. 545, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 79; Rudgeair v. Reading Traction Co. 180 Pa. 333, 36 Atl. 859, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 523.

The assignments of error are not sustained, and the judgment is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of railroad company for failing to aid in extinguishing fire set by its engine without negligence.

Other cases concur with the conclusion reached in the reported case (GINTER v. PENNSYLVANIA R. Co. ante, 505) that, in view of the duty which a railroad owes to the public, the failure of the crew of a train, operated on schedule, to leave their train and assist in extinguishing a fire set by an engine without negligence, does not render the railroad liable. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Brough (1907) 168 Ind. 378, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 401, 81 N. E. 57; Mississippi Home Ins. Co. v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. (1892) 70 Miss. 119, 12 So. 156; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Chittim (1902) 31 Tex. Civ. App. 40, 71 S. W. 294; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Donaldson (1889) 73 Tex. 124, 11 S. W. 163.

In Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Brough (Ind.) supra, where a fire started off the defendant's right of way from sparks from an engine, and it was contended that, although it was started without the defendant's negligence, the company was liable because the train crew failed to attempt to extinguish it, an instruction was held erroneous that if it started from a locomotive, and the defendant's servants discovered it in time to extinguish it by the use of ordinary care, and prevent it from doing damage to others, and negligently failed to do so, the company would be liable, the court taking the view that a regular train crew was not bound to leave its train and neglect its duty to the public to fight fires, and stating that the instruction made the company liable without regard to the duty it owed the public. It further said: "The primary duty of a railroad company is to the state. It is to operate its railroad with reasonable speed, at regular times, to accommodate passengers and shippers. It owes this duty to the state, and its obligation to discharge it is the consideration for its charter. . . . Stopping or delaying a train to put out a fire, which may have been set by a locomotive engine of the company, might throw the train out of its schedule time, and thus interfere with the schedule time of other trains, and greatly inconvenience, and even endanger, the lives of passengers on such trains."

And in Mississippi Home Ins. Co. v. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. (1892) 70 Miss. 119, 12 So. 156, where the fire apparently started off the defendant's right of way, an instruction was held properly refused that a railroad was liable for damage resulting from a fire set by its engine without negligence, if the spreading of the fire might have been prevented by its employees. The court said: "Fires from running trains are always to be apprehended, and if it is the duty of those in charge of a running train to stop its progress to put out a fire set by the engine without negligence, it would be equally their duty to see that all sparks and cinders, from which danger from fire might reasonably be anticipated, were extinguished. If the company is under a duty to extinguish non-negligently set fires when known to exist, it must be under the same duty in reference to such fires of the same character as the circumstances show will or may probably spring up. Under the principle of this instruction, railroad companies would be responsible absolutely for all fires set out by their engines, or would find immunity only upon condition of keeping constant and instant supervision over every foot of their road over which a train was passing, or had recently passed. It is manifest that the duty which these companies owe to the public, and which can only be discharged by running their trains upon schedules at stated intervals, could not be performed at all if the persons in charge of trains should be required to give their attention to fires along the way, and that the danger to life and property intrusted to them would be greatly increased by requiring trains to be stopped at all times and places, in order that the servants of the company may engage in putting out fires, whether the same be negligently or accidentally set out."

And the rule that because of its duty to the public a regular train crew is not bound to leave its train to put out a fire set on the company's right of way by a locomotive, without negligence, was also recognized in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Donaldson (1889) 73 Tex. 124, 11 S. W. 163.

And in Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Chittim (1902) 81 Tex. Civ. App. 40, 71 S. W. 294, although it was held that a railroad must take prompt steps to prevent the spread of a fire set by its locomotive without negligence, it was held that a train crew was not bound to leave their train to extinguish fires. The court, after quoting from the Platzer Case (1889) 73 Tex. 117, 3 L.R.A. 639, 15 Am. St. Rep. 771, 11 S. W. 160, set out, infra, said: "We think the amount of diligence required of a railway company, under the state of facts in this case, would be such as would be required of an ordinarily prudent man under like circumstances; and this duty would not be incumbent on the train crew, but must be placed on other agents or employees of appellant, not engaged in that or any like public duty. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Donaldson (Tex.) supra. The jury may have concluded from the charge of the court in this case that the train crew should have left the train and should have engaged in extinguishing the fire, and that the railroad company would be liable if 'prompt, proper and adequate means' were not used by them to extinguish the fire. As soon as information reached the employees whose duty it was to attend to such matters, it was incumbent on them to use such care to extinguish the fire as a prudent man would, under like circumstance, have exercised." It is not clear in this case whether or not the fire started on the railroad's right of way.

As to the crew of a train not operated on schedule, however, a different conclusion has been reached.

Thus, in Rolke v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1870) 26 Wis. 537, in an action to recover for damages resulting from a fire set by the engine of a gravel train an instruction was held correct that, if the engine set a fire on the roadway adjoining the plaintiff's premises and the defendant's servants in charge of the train knew of the fire, they were bound to use ordinary care to extinguish it, and that if they used no effort to extinguish it, but went away and left it burning, such conduct was evidence of negligence and ought to be considered in determining whether the train was managed with care with regard to fire. The court said: "It appears that the train in question was a gravel train, engaged in the repair of the roadbed, and had about twenty-eight men on the train. And even if it had been prudent and necessary for the train itself to move off to the proper station as soon as it was unloaded, in order to avoid collision with other trains, what difficulty was there in leaving behind a sufficient number of men to put out the fire? It was a dry time in the summer, when a fire kindled upon the track of the road would very likely spread to the adjoining premises. Men of ordinary care would, under such circumstances, use proper diligence to prevent the fire from communicating to the property of others. And if, according to the hypothesis upon which the instruction is framed, the employees of the company knew that a fire had been kindled on the track by means of the locomotive, they were certainly bound to use ordinary care and diligence to extinguish it; and if they used no efforts whatever to extinguish it, but went away and left it burning, such conduct, we think, would amount to gross negligence. These remarks are made with reference to the character and condition of the train in question. It was a gravel train, and there could be no difficulty, even if the train moved off, in leaving behind a portion of the men to look after the fire. In the case of an ordinary freight or passenger train, even if the employees knew the locomotive had kindled a fire upon the track, yet it might not be possible to stop the train and put it out, or leave behind anyone for that purpose. The safety of the train and passengers would be a matter of first importance, and negligence could not necessarily be imputed if the servants left the fire burning without using any efforts to extinguish it. But the instruction, when applied to the facts of this case, raises quite a different question; and that is, whether, when a fire has been set by a gravel train, which has a large number of men on the train who know about the fire, they can all go away, leaving the fire to spread and destroy the property of others, without being guilty of negligence. It seems to us that such conduct on the part of the servants of the company would almost deserve the warm language used by Judge Breese, in Bass v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (1862) 28 Ill. 9, 81 Am. Dec. 254, as being 'unworthy of civilized and Christian men.' At all events, if the jury found from the evidence that the supposed facts were established, we have no doubt the company would be liable for the loss occasioned by the fire." Negligence in starting the fire was, however, alleged in this case, and while the court states the duty to use care to extinguish fires broadly, and does not differentiate between those started negligently and others not so started, it is not entirely clear that it intended its remarks to cover cases where there was no negligence in starting the fire.

Duty of employees other than trainmen.

With respect to railroad employees other than trainmen, the view has been taken in some cases that no duty rested on them to aid in extinguishing fires set by locomotives without negligence.

Thus, in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Shipley (1873) 39 Md. 251, evidence that none of the railroad's section hands were present, assisting in putting out a fire started by its engine, apparently off of its right of way, was held inadmissible for the purpose of showing negligence by the company, the court holding that the words, "without negligence," used in a statute imposing the burden of proof on the company to show that a fire was occasioned without negligence, meant the exercise of reasonable care to have its engines properly constructed and operated, but that it was not obliged to station men along its line to extinguish fires that might happen.

And in Indianapolis & C. R. Co. v. Paramore (1869) 31 Ind. 143, where wood placed near a railroad track was burned by fire originating from sparks from an engine, the company was held to owe no duty to keep a watchman to guard the wood against fire. The court said: "It was the duty of the company to use reasonable precaution by providing properly constructed machinery, and the duty of its servants to use reasonable care and diligence in its use, to avoid the communication of fire to the shed and wood; but no reason is received why the company was under any more obligation than the plaintiff to be at the expense of keeping a watchman stationed there, to protect the shed and wood and extinguish any fire that might be kindled by unavoidable accident. Every proprietor adjoining a railroad may lawfully deposit his property or goods, or erect valuable buildings on his own premises, in close proximity to such road; but in doing so he takes upon himself the risk of danger of fire being communicated thereto without the fault of the railroad company or its servants. And the existence of such danger does not impose on the company any obligation to incur the expense of a guard. The establishment of such a principle would require railroad companies to station guards along the whole line of their roads. The principle applicable to such cases is that a party in the exercise of his legal rights must use reasonable and proper care to avoid injury to others. But if such care be

And in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Haggard (1914) 161 Ky. 317, 170 S. W. 956, it was held that if the railroad did not negligently start a fire which resulted from sparks from its locomotive, and which, when discovered, had spread beyond its property, its failure to put it out imposed no liability upon the company. The court said: "If the defendant's negligence started the fire, it was answerable for the injury the plaintiff sustained therefrom, whether it used proper care to put it out or not after it had notice of it. If the defendant negligently failed to put out the fire when it could have done so, this added nothing to its liability if it negligently started the fire. If it had not negligently started the fire, its failure to put it out imposed no liability upon it. The fire had burned beyond its premises before it had notice of it, and while it was under a moral duty to protect the property of its neighbors, its duty in this regard was the same as that of the other neighbors. All the evidence on this subject should have been excluded, as the defendant's liability turned simply on the question whether it negligently started the fire."

In Kenney v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1876) 63 Mo. 99, there is an obiter statement that, even if the defendant's engine which set a fire was properly equipped and carefully managed, it was liable for the damage resulting from the fire if its section men saw the fire in time to extinguish it by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence before it extended to the plaintiff's property, the court stating that it was gross negligence on their part to suffer the fire to escape when it could readily have been prevented.

But on a subsequent appeal of this case (1879) 70 Mo. 243, a contrary view was taken, and with reference to the prior statement, the court said: "The record did not present the question of the liability of the company for the neglect of its section hands to extinguish the fire, and, therefore, the remarks on that subject are not authoritative, but only entitled to that consideration which is due to any observation on legal questions falling from the able and learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court. With due deference to him, we hold that the company is not liable because its servants neglected to extinguish the fire when they discovered it on the track. It was their duty as citizens to prevent the spread of the fire, and by their conduct on the occasion, as testified to by one of their number, they manifested a cruel and brutal indifference to the destruction of a neighbor's property; but it was not in the line of their employment, and was no more their duty to extinguish the fire than that of any other person who saw it. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Shipley (1873) 39 Md. 251. To illustrate, if a fire should originate on A's premises through no fault of his, and should extend to B's and consume his property, A, if not liable for the occurrence of the fire, would not be liable on the ground that carpenters whom he had employed in repairing or building on his premises, or laboring men whom he had employed to dig a ditch through his farm, had neglected to extinguish it. If not liable for the origin of the fire, he cannot be held so on account of the neglect of a social duty by persons in his employment in a business not connected with origin of the fire, or imposing any duty to extinguish it in addition to that which every citizen owes to society."

But since the passage of a statute in Missouri making railroads liable for fires set by sparks from their engines notwithstanding any precautions they may have exercised, it has been held that, although a fire set by a locomotive was not due to any negligence of the company, it was nevertheless the duty of its agents and servants to prevent the spread of such a fire. Lemen v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. (1910) 151 Mo. App. 511, 132 S. W. 13. The question at issue in this case was as to the admissibility of evidence that a conductor of a train which had set out a fire notified a station agent

In Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Benedict Pineapple Co. (1906) 52 Fla. 165, 42 So. 529, a count in an action against a railroad for damages for destruction by fire of canvas covering for pineapples, ignited by an engine, was held defective in failing to allege negligence, and in confining the defendant's alleged negligence to the permissive or negligent act of allowing the canvas covering to be burned, without any showing of a duty upon it to put out a fire which was not caused by its carelessness or negligence.

Those of the preceding cases which announce the broad rule that a railroad owes no duty to extinguish fires set by its engine without negligence are in conflict with the result which has been reached in other jurisdictions.

Thus, in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Platzner (1889) 73 Tex. 117, 3 L.R.A. 639, 15 Am. St. Rep. 771, 11 S. W. 160, it was held that notwithstanding the fact that an engine which set out a fire was properly equipped and managed, the railroad owed a duty to exercise such care as the circumstances of a given case would indicate to a prudent man was proper, to prevent its spread to other property. The court said: "The rule that a railway company owes no duty looking to the safety of property of persons situated on or near to its line, other than to use a high degree of care to prevent the kindling of fires through the escape of fire from their engines, seems to us a narrow rule. The business is conducted for the benefit of the company, and is of great advantage to the public, but there is no hardship in requiring them not only to use a high degree of care to prevent kindling of fires, but to extinguish them when they have their origin in the conduct of the company's business, if this can be done by the exercise of ordinary care. Every person has the right to kindle a fire on his own land for any lawful purpose, and if he uses reasonable care to prevent its spreading and doing injury to the property of others no just cause of complaint can arise; yet, although 'the time may be suitable and the manner prudent, if he is guilty of negligence in taking care of it, and it spreads and injures the property of another in consequence of such negligence, he is liable in damages for the injury done. The gist of the action is negligence, and if that exists in either of these particulars and injury is done in consequence whereof the liability attaches, it is immaterial whether the proof establishes gross negligence, or only a want of ordinary care on the part of the defendant. . . . ' If one who had kindled a fire on his own land should see it spreading under the influence of a strong and unexpected wind, without which it would not have spread, should then use every possible effort to extinguish it before it reached the line of his own land, but be unable to do so, could he then cease his efforts and be heard to say that he had discharged the entire duty cast upon him by law and the clearest principles of right, and was not liable for the destruction of his neighbor's house or barn by the fire of his own kindling, if it appeared that by ordinary diligence he could have arrested the fire soon after it crossed his own line, and before it seriously injured his neighbor? We think not; for, having put in motion the destructive element, nothing short of the exercise of due care to prevent injury from it ought to relieve him from responsibility. He could not be heard to say that the limit of his obligation was fixed by and as narrow as the boundaries of his land. A failure under such circumstances to follow the fire across the line between him and his neighbor, and to extinguish it whenever he could, could not be said to be only the neglect of a social duty. If this be true as to an individual who in the exercise of the highest care has kindled a fire on his own land for a lawful purpose, and who has no suspicion that thereby his neighbor's property is imperiled, what must be the rule with a railway company claiming, as all do, that the business it is conducting is necessarily, when conducted with the utmost care, attended with danger to property along its line? The very groundwork on which the two charges given by the court, and together before quoted, stand, is that to conduct the business of such companies successfully they must use fire in engines from which, with the use of the highest care, fire will sometimes escape, and property through this be destroyed. The cases show that it is not important whether the origin of a fire be in negligence, and that liability exists on the ground that the failure to use proper care to prevent the spread of fire lawfully kindled is negligence as clearly as is an originally unlawful kindling from which injury to another results. The kindling of a fire by the escape of sparks or coals from an engine, when the utmost care has been used to prevent their escape, and to prevent their kindling when they do escape, whether the fire arise on the company's right of way or on contiguous lands, cannot be more lawful or the obligation to extinguish less than it is when done by an individual on his own land, and it cannot be said without doing violence to reason and right that as high an obligation does not rest on a railway company to extinguish a fire when kindled under such circumstances as rests on the owner of land when fire lawfully kindled by him spreads. The kindling in the one case is absolutely lawful, while in the other it is lawful by permission if due care be used to control it, on the theory that engines on railways cannot be operated successfully without some danger of scattering fire. Without entering into any discussion as to the degree of care a railway company should use to extinguish a fire caused by the escape of fire from its engines, we feel constrained to hold that the duty does exist, however careful such companies may be to prevent the escape of fire from their engines, and that the failure to exercise such care as the circumstances of a given case would indicate to a prudent man was proper will give cause of action for an injury resulting." The question of what employees owed a duty to extinguish a fire was not dealt with in this case.

The decision in this case was held conclusive in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Donaldson (1889) 73 Tex. 124, 11 S. W. 163, where it was held the duty of railroad employees, other than trainmen, to use ordinary care to extinguish a fire set on or near the track by locomotive without negligence.

And in Ball v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (1866) 16 U. C. C. P. 252, it was held that where a fire was kindled on the defendant's track by coals which, without negligence, fell from its engine, and its trackmen saw it and neglected to put it out at a time when it was likely to spread to the plaintiff's premises, the company was liable for the damage caused by its subsequently spreading to the plaintiff's property. The court stated that the rule was clear that anyone may kindle a fire, or, finding it kindled on his own land, may let it burn, if he pleases, to any extent, provided it does not injure his neighbor, but that if it be likely to spread so as to injure his neighbor he is bound to put it out, or at least to use his best endeavors to prevent its spreading, and that if he does not he is liable. The view was apparently taken in this case that if a fire resulted on the plaintiff's premises from an engine without negligence by the defendant, it would not be liable for a failure to assist in putting it out.

And in Eighme v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. (1890) 32 N. Y. S. R. 757, 10 N. Y. Supp. 600, where the engine was properly equipped and managed and it appeared that the fire started in inflammable material on the defendant's right of way and spread to the plaintiff's house, the company was held chargeable with the duty of using reasonable care to extinguish the fire, and the evidence was held to show negligence, where the fire started near a station and the agent saw it soon after, and in time to prevent it spreading to the plaintiff's house, but assumed that boys whom he saw putting it out would be successful, and failed to do anything until it was too late. There appears, however, to be an element of negligence present in this case, that is, the allowing of inflammable material on its right of way.

In Van Dyke v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (1911) 84 Vt. 212, 78 Atl. 958, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 640, where a statute imposed liability on a railroad for fires set by its engines, unless it affirmatively showed that it was free from negligence, the view was apparently taken that although the railroad was not negligent in setting the fire it still owed a duty to take precautions during a dry season to employ extra men to assist in putting out fires, and the failure to take such precautions, considered in connection with other conduct, was held in this case to authorize a recovery against the company.

And in Simmonds v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (1884) 52 Conn. 264, 52 Am. Rep. 587, where a statute made railroads insurers against the consequences of fire communicated from their locomotives regardless of negligence, the court stated that in so doing the law implied in them the right and duty to put out fires when communicated. The railroad in that case contended that the act of one on whose land the fire started, in requesting its section men to allow the fire to burn, was the proximate cause of the damage sustained by the plaintiff to whose land it finally spread, but the court refused to take this view, and stated that the duty which the company owed could not be excused by any arrangement made with a third person.

The view was apparently adopted in Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Keiser (1900), 25 Ind. App. 417, 58 N. E. 505, that a duty rested on the company to extinguish a fire, although it might have been started by its engine without negligence, but nothing is said relative to what servants the duty extended. The point discussed in the case was as to whether there was a conflict between a general verdict and answers to special interrogatories relating to contributory negligence on the part of the person whose property was burned.

UNITED STATES, Plff. in Err.,

HERMAN H. OPPENHEIMER et al.

(242 U. S. 85, 61 L. ed. 161, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 68.)

Judgment — res judicata — dismissal of indictment.

1. A judgment dismissing an indictment on the ground that the offense charged is barred by the Statute of Limitations is a bar, irrespective of any question of former jeopardy, to a second prosecution under a new indictment for the same offense.

Appeal — by government in criminal case — sustaining plea in bar.

2. A judgment of a Federal district court quashing an indictment because of a previous adjudication upon a former indictment for the same offense that it was barred by the Statute of Limitations is one sustaining a special plea in bar, within the meaning of the Act of March 2, 1907, governing the right of the government to a review in a criminal case, although the defense was presented by demurrer and motion to quash, and the court granted what was styled the motion to quash.

— extent of right.

3. The clause of the Act of March 2, 1907, giving a writ of error to the United States to review a decision of a Federal district court in a criminal case sustaining a special plea in bar, when the defendant has not been put in jeopardy, is not limited, like the earlier clauses of that statute, to judgments based on the invalidity or construction of the statute upon which the indictment is founded.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review a judgment quashing an indictment because of a previous adjudication that a former indictment for the same offense was barred by the Statute of Limitations. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Charles Warren, Assistant Attorney General, and A. J. Clopton, for plaintiff in error:

The so-called "motion to quash" filed by the defendant was in fact and in law a special plea in bar.

2 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. 1913, p. 623; United States v. Kissel, 218 U. S. 601, 610, 54 L. ed. 1168, 1179, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 124; 10 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 569; Durland v. United States, 161 U. S. 306, 314, 40 L. ed. 709, 712, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 508; United States v. Pond, 2 Curt. O. C. 265, Fed. Cas. No. 16,067; Archbold, Crim. Pr. & Pl. Pomeroy's Notes, 8th ed. 318.

The defendant was not placed in jeopardy under the former indictments, nor did the decision of Judge Thomas on the pleas to those indictments become res adjudicata. The erroneous decision that the indictments were barred by the one-year Statute of Limitations was rendered upon preliminary pleas which were interposed before any submission to or the swearing of a jury, and under such condition jeopardy could not attach or the case be finally determined on its merits.

The first ground of the pleading, termed "motion to quash," really renewed the defense of the one-year bar of limitation embodied in § 29b of the Bankruptcy Act which had been sustained to the former indictments, and necessarily involved a construction of the Conspiracy Statute under which the indictment here involved was brought.

A decision upon a special plea in bar when the defendant has not been put in jeopardy is subject to review here, whether or not it involves the construction of the statute upon which the indictment is based.

United States v. Keitel, 211 U. S. 370, 398, 399, 53 L. ed. 230, 244, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 123.

The indictment alleges that an additional overt act was committed by the defendant in error less than one year before it was brought, and as limitation begins to run from the commission of the last overt act, and not from the date of the formation of the conspiracy, the decision of Judge Thomas discharging the defendants under the former indictment, on the plea of the one-year bar can have no application, and necessarily cannot become the law of the case or constitute res judicata.

Messrs. Benjamin Slade, Abram J. Rose, and L. Laffin Kellogg, for defendants in error:

The pleadings below were entitled and adjudicated as "demurrer" and "motion to quash." They were not "a plea in bar." St. Tr. 538; District of Columbia v. Brewer, 32 App. D. C. 388; Oglesby v. Attrill, 14 Fed. 214.

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error and others were indicted for a conspiracy to conceal assets from a trustee in bankruptcy. Act of July 1, 1898, chap. 541, § 29, 30 Stat. at L. 544, 554, Comp. Stat. 1913, §§ 9585, 9613, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 509, 844. The defendant Oppenheimer set up a previous adjudication upon a former indictment for the same offense that it was barred by the one-year Statute of Limitations in the Bankruptcy Act for offenses against that act, § 29d,—an adjudication since held to be wrong in another case. United States v. Rabinowich, 238 U. S. 78, 59 L. ed. 1211, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 682. This defense was presented in four forms, entitled, respectively, demurrer, motion to quash, plea in abatement, and plea in bar. After motion by the government that the defendant be required to elect which of the four he would stand upon, he withdrew the last-mentioned two, and subsequently the court granted what was styled the motion to quash, ordered the indictment quashed, and discharged the defendant without day. The government brings this writ of error, treating the so-called motion to quash as a plea in bar, which in substance it was. United States v. Barber, 219 U. S. 72, 78, 55 L. ed. 99, 101, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 209.

The defendant objects that the statute giving a writ of error to the United States from the decision or judgment sustaining a special plea in bar, when the defendant has not been put in jeopardy, Act of March 2, 1907, chap. 2564, 34 Stat. at L. 1246, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 1704, 6 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 149, is limited like the earlier clauses to judgments based on the invalidity or construction of the statute upon which the indictment is founded. But that limitation expressed in each of the two preceding paragraphs of the statute is not repeated here. The language used in United States v. Keitel, 211 U. S. 370, 399, 53 L. ed. 230, 245, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 123, had reference only to the construction of the indictment and to its sufficiency upon matters not involving a statute, in cases brought up by the United States under the earlier clauses of the act. That quoted from United States v. Kissel, 218 U. S. 601, 54 L. ed. 1168, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 124, so far as material, also meant that the sufficiency of the indictment would not be considered here upon a writ of error to the allowance of a plea in bar. In view of our opinion upon the merits, we do not discuss the preliminary objections at greater length.

Upon the merits the proposition of the government is that the doctrine of res judicata does not exist for criminal cases except in the modified form of the 5th Amendment, that a person shall not be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; and the conclusion is drawn that a decision upon a plea in bar cannot prevent a second trial when the defendant never has been in jeopardy in the sense of being before a jury upon the facts of the offense charged. It seems that the mere statement of the position should be its own answer. It cannot be that the safeguards of the person, so often and so rightfully mentioned with solemn reverence, are less than those that protect from a liability in debt. It cannot be that a judgment of acquittal on the ground of the Statute of Limitations is less a protection against a second trial than a judgment upon the ground of innocence, or that such a judgment is any more effective when entered after a verdict than if entered by the government's consent before a jury is impaneled; or that it is conclusive if entered upon the general issue (United States v. Kissel, 218 U. S. 601, 610, 54 L. ed. 1168, 1179, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 124), but if upon a special plea of the statute, permits the defendant to be prosecuted again. We do not suppose that it would be doubted that a judgment upon a demurrer to the merits would be a bar to a second indictment in the same words. State v. Fields, 106 Iowa, 406, 76 N. W. 802; Whart. Crim. Pl. & Pr. 9th ed. § 406.

Of course, the quashing of a bad indictment is no bar to a prosecution upon a good one, but a judgment for the defendant upon the ground that the prosecution is barred goes to his liability as matter of substantive law, and one judgment that he is free as matter of substantive law is as good as another. A plea of the Statute of Limitations is a plea to the merits (United States v. Barber, 219 U. S. 72, 78, 55 L. ed. 99, 101, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 209), and however the issue was raised in the former case, after judgment upon it, it could not be reopened in a later prosecution. We may adopt in its application to this case the statement of a judge of great experience in the criminal law: "Where a criminal charge has been adjudicated upon by a court having jurisdiction to hear and determine it, the adjudication, whether it takes the form of an acquittal or conviction, is final as to the matter so adjudicated upon, and may be pleaded in bar to any subsequent prosecution for the same offense. . . . In this respect the criminal law is in unison with that which prevails in civil proceedings." Hawkins, J., in Reg. v. Miles, L. R. 24 Q. B. Div. 423, 431. The finality of a previous adjudication as to the matters determined by it, is the ground of decision in Com. v. Evans, 101 Mass. 25, the criminal and the civil law agreeing, as Mr. Justice Hawkins says. Com. v. Ellis, 160 Mass. 165, 35 N. E. 773; Brittain v. Kinnaird, 1 Brod. & B. 432, 129 Eng. Reprint, 789, 4 J. B. Moore, 50, Gow, N. P. 164, 21 Revised Rep. 680. Seemingly the same view was taken in Frank v. Mangum, 237 U. S. 309, 334, 59 L. ed. 969, 983, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 582, as it was also in Coffey v. United States, 116 U. S. 436, 445, 29 L. ed. 684, 687, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 437.

The safeguard provided by the Constitution against the gravest abuses has tended to give the impression that when it did not apply in terms, there was no other principle that could. But the 5th Amendment was not intended to do away with what in the civil law is a fundamental principle of justice (Jeter v. Hewitt, 22 How. 352, 364, 16 L. ed. 345, 348), in order, when a man once has been acquitted on the merits, to enable the government to prosecute him a second time.

Judgment affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Discharge of accused under a limitation statute as a bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same offense.

General rule.

Where an accused person is discharged by virtue of a statute providing a special limitation of time within which no prosecution may be had for certain designated crimes, offenses, or misdemeanors, such discharge will operate as a bar to subsequent prosecutions for the same offense, although under a later indictment. UNITED STATES v. OPPENHEIMER (reported herewith), ante, 516.

This rule is more frequently applied to cases construing statutes which require the discharge of the accused unless the action against him is tried within a designated time after his arrest, and it is held that under such statutes the discharge of the accused will constitute a bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same offense, especially where the statute in effect provides that the accused shall be discharged and acquitted of the offense if not tried within a stated time after arrest or imprisonment. Denny v. State (1849) 6 Ga. 491; Durham v. State (1851) 9 Ga. 306; Kerese v. State (1851) 10 Ga. 95; Jordan v. State (1855) 18 Ga. 532; Holt v. State (1858) 38 Ga. 187; Brown v. State (1890) 85 Ga. 713, 11 S. E. 831; McGuire v. Wallace (1886) 109 Ind. 284, 10 N. E. 111; State v. Wear (1898) 145 Mo. 162, 46 S. W. 1099; Hester v. Com. (1877) 85 Pa. 139.

The foregoing Georgia cases construed a provision of the Georgia Code to the effect that where the accused demands a trial after the lapse of a stated time, if he is not tried within a given time thereafter he shall be absolutely discharged and acquitted of the offense. Jordan v. State (1855) 18 Ga. 582; Holt v. State (1868) 38 Ga. 187; Brown v. State (1890) 85 Ga. 713, 11 S. E. 831.

As suggested, the foregoing rule has been applied where the statute in effect provides for the discharge and acquittal of the accused for failure to prosecute him within a designated time after his arrest. It would seem, however, that it is not essential that the statute should, in express terms, provide for the acquittal of the accused in order that his discharge for failure to prosecute him may operate as a bar to further prosecution for the same offense. Thus, in McGuire v. Wallace (1886) 109 Ind. 284, 10 N. E. 111, in construing a statute which provided in effect that no defendant shall be detained in jail without a trial on a criminal charge beyond a designated period of time, and that if he is he may make application for his discharge, the court said that if the delay was not occasioned by any one of the matters within the exception, and if the trial court is satisfied that there is evidence for the state which reasonable diligence did not enable it to procure, and that there is just ground to believe that such evidence may be procured by the next term of court, it shall continue the case, and remand the prisoner. In such case, if the state fails to bring the accused to trial at the next term, he is entitled to his discharge, and this discharge amounts to an acquittal of the offense.

In Johnson v. State (1884) 42 Ohio St. 207, it is said that "in former times, persons were in many instances confined in prison for years, under various pretexts, without being brought to trial. Nothing could be more subversive of liberty. To prevent such abuse in this country, it is ordained in our Constitutions, Federal and state, that the accused shall be entitled to a speedy public trial, and statutory provisions have been enacted . . . in aid of that clause of our state Constitution. But it was not the purpose of the Constitution or the statute to screen guilty men from punishment, or to require of courts or officers things physically impossible. Of course, when it appears that the statute has been disregarded the accused is entitled to a discharge. But it must be remembered that the discharge is equivalent to a verdict of acquittal with judgment thereon. . . . Again, the court of common pleas is a tribunal of superior jurisdiction, its record importing absolute verity, and the orders made in a cause pending in that court are, in the absence of anything appearing to the contrary, presumed to have been rightly and properly made. And, besides, an error in refusing to discharge for such cause can never be properly presented in this court until there has been a conviction . . . and here it is admitted that, aside from this alleged error, the prisoner was properly convicted. For these reasons, we are clear that in order to authorize this court to reverse a conviction on such ground, and order a discharge, the accused must come prepared to show that his case is plainly within the terms of the statute."

In State v. Wear (1898) 145 Mo. 162, 46 S. W. 1099, the prosecution was dismissed because the accused was not tried within the time prescribed by a statute, in effect providing that if any person indicted for any offense and held to answer should not be brought to trial by the end of the third term following his arrest, etc., he shall be entitled to be discharged so far as relates to such offense. Under these circumstances, it was held that the subsequent prosecution under a later indictment was barred by the prior discharge.

In Henwood v. People (1914) 57 Colo. 544, 143 Pac. 373, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 1111, it is apparently assumed that a discharge would constitute a bar to further prosecution where obtained under a statute providing in effect that if a person committed for certain crimes shall not be tried on or before a certain time thereafter, he shall be set at liberty by the court unless the delay shall have been on the application of the prisoner. It was, however, held that where the prisoner was accused of committing two murders at the same time, his discharge from imprisonment in one of the cases was no bar to his prosecution in the other case. The court said that, "generally speaking, the plea of autrefois acquit is a plea by the defendant that he had been formerly tried and acquitted of the same offense charged in the information to which the plea is made. Such a plea, when sufficient and established, is upheld by virtue of the provisions of our Bill of Rights, and the principle of the common law to the effect that a person shall not be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. Conceding, but not deciding, that the plea alleged facts from which it appears the crimes charged in the two informations constitute one and the same offense, we will consider the contention on behalf of defendant that setting him at liberty in the Von Phul case was equivalent to an acquittal by a jury, or barred a prosecution for the murder of Von Phul, and was therefore a bar to the prosecution for the murder of Copeland. The proceeding setting the defendant at liberty in the Von Phul case was in no sense a trial on the merits; neither does it appear therefrom that he has been placed in jeopardy in that case. It was not the purpose of our statute to enable the guilty to escape, but to prevent unnecessary delays on the part of the prosecution, so that the utmost which can be claimed for the statute, generally speaking, is that it was thereby intended to give effect to that provision of our Bill of Rights which guarantees one accused of a criminal offense a speedy trial, and therefore, when one charged with a crime brings himself within its provisions, he is entitled to be set at liberty, and cannot afterwards be committed or held for the same offense, when charged therewith in a second indictment or information."

But in Ex parte Clarke (1880) 54 Cal. 412, the statute construed provided for the dismissal of prosecution of persons not indicted within a designated time. It was held that such a dismissal did not bar a subsequent prosecution for the same offense under a later indictment. The court said that the order dismissing the prosecution ends the action commenced by the complaint upon which the respondent was imprisoned. It ended the action, however, not by any judgment upon the merits of the case, but by an order in the nature of nonsuit, in effect amounting merely to a simple opinion of the court that that proceeding ought not to be further prosecuted. Inasmuch as there was no limitation of time applicable to prosecution for murder, and as the defendant has in his favor no order dismissing the action, he had never been put in jeopardy within the meaning of the Constitution. A new action on behalf of the people may, in such case, be initiated at any subsequent day.

In State v. Garthwaite (1851) 23 N. J. L. 143, the statute construed provided that every indictment should be tried at the term or session in which issue was joined, or the next term thereafter, and if such indictment is not so tried the defendant shall be discharged. A discharge granted under this statute was held not to bar a prosecution for the same offense commenced under a subsequent indictment.

In Byrd v. State (1834) 1 How. (Miss.) 163, in construing a statutory provision that if such prisoner is not prosecuted by indictment and trial within the stated time, he shall be discharged from further imprisonment, etc., the court said that the utmost extent to which this law can be carried was to a total discharge from imprisonment for the same offense, and cannot go to bar a prosecution for the crime charged. A discharge upon motion under this section can have no greater effect than a discharge for the same cause upon a writ of habeas corpus, which only goes to free the prisoner from imprisonment for the same cause unless, by the order of a court of competent jurisdiction, he shall be ordered into custody.

In Hester v. Com. (1877) 85 Pa. 139, a prosecution for murder was nolle prossed immediately before the hearing of the motion in behalf of the accused for his discharge. Although the discharge was three days after the expiration of the second term following the indictment, the court said it was unnecessary to consider what the effect of a discharge under the statute prescribing the two-term rule would have been, since the motion for discharge was not grounded on that rule.

In State v. Deslovers (1917) 40 R. I. 89, 100 Atl. 64, where the state nolle prossed the indictment to avoid dismissing the defendant under a statute providing in effect that persons indicted and imprisoned for certain crimes shall be tried or bailed out within a designated time, it was held that the defendant was subject to trial upon a new indictment, notwithstanding such nolle pros. The court said that this statute made no express provision and contained no language from which any inference could be drawn as to the effect of such failure to try a prisoner, or bail him within the time specified, upon the subsequent status of a defendant, with reference to his further prosecution for the crime; hence it was reasonable to assume that it was intended under such conditions that the defendant was to be left to his remedy to be released from imprisonment by habeas corpus, without thereby affecting the right to further prosecute him for the crime.

Where statute limits effect of discharge.

On the other hand, the statute may expressly provide that the effect of a discharge shall be so limited that it will not operate as a bar to a further prosecution.

For example, a statute providing that the court shall order a criminal prosecution to be dismissed where no indictment was returned within a designated time, and that the order of dismissal shall be a bar to any other prosecution for the same offense if it is a misdemeanor, but not if it is a felony, the dismissal of the prosecution for homicide for failure to file an information within a designated time is not a bar to a subsequent action. Re Butts (1918) 19 Ariz. 318, 170 Pac. 792. v.

STATE OF TEXAS.

(79 Tex. Crim. Rep. 129, 184 S. W. 810.)

Judgment — collateral attack — right of one invoking jurisdiction.

1. A judgment of divorce, void for want of jurisdiction in the court rendering it, cannot be collaterally attacked by the one who invoked the jurisdiction for the purpose of rendering his wife incompetent as a witness against him in a prosecution for perjury.

Appeal — recognizance after expiration of term — sufficiency.

2. A convict who fails to make the statutory recognizance for his release pending appeal, at the term at which he was convicted, does not oust the appellate court of jurisdiction by making the recognizance and securing his liberty at the next term of court, although the statute merely provides that if, after appealing, he fails to make recognizance during the term of court, he may be permitted to give bail and obtain his release by giving, after the expiration of such term and in vacation, his bail bond to the sheriff.

Perjury — effect of court's want of jurisdiction.

3. One is not relieved from liability for perjury in falsely swearing to residence to give the court jurisdiction of his suit for divorce, by the fact that the court had no jurisdiction because he had not in fact acquired the necessary residence.

On the first hearing, Prendergast, P. J., stated the facts as follows: The term of court at which appellant was convicted, both as a matter of fact and as fixed by law, convened July 5th and adjourned October 2, 1915. The trial occurred, and the verdict was rendered and the judgment thereon entered, September 24, 1915. Within that term and in proper time appellant made his motion for a new trial, and by leave of the court within term time filed an amended motion. These were heard and overruled by the court on October 1, 1915, at which time the appellant gave notice of appeal to this court, which was duly then and there entered on the minutes of the court. Immediately thereafter he was properly sentenced. In overruling his said motions, the court, as a part of that order, fixed the amount of appellant's recognizance at $2,000, and he, being present and in custody, was committed to jail until the decision of his case on appeal by this court. The sentence also is to the same effect.

Appellant did not enter into a recognizance at that term of court, nor attempt to do so, so far as this record discloses, but the sheriff, by virtue of said orders and the law, then having him in custody, properly confined him in the county jail. The next term of that court convened on Monday, October 4th, and continued in session for that October term, the time required and authorized by law. On October 8th, during that October term, in open court, appellant attempted to gain his liberty, and did so, by on that date, in open court, entering into a recognizance pending his appeal here. That recognizance, both in substance and in form, follows the statute (Code Crim. Proc. art. 903). Under that recognizance he was discharged by the sheriff from jail and from his custody, and he has continuously since then been at liberty and still is.

Messrs. Robert B. Allen and Charles A. Phippen for appellant.

Mr. C. C. McDonald, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Harper, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On a former day of this term this cause was dismissed because appellant, after the adjournment of the term of court at which he was convicted, entered into a recognizance at the next term of the court, it being held that after the adjournment of the court for the term at which appellant was tried, the statute only authorized the giving of a bail bond, and, he having given a recognizance, the jurisdiction of this court was ousted when he was allowed to go at large after giving a recognizance,—he would, in law, be regarded as having escaped confinement. At the time the case was originally before the court, the writer at that time suggested this was not the construction that should be given the statute, but, instead, the proper construction of it was that if the court was in session, a recognizance was authorized to be taken, and a bail bond could be given only when the court was in vacation. The articles governing this matter are articles 901-903, and 904. That the recognizance given is in accordance with article 903 is not questioned, but it is contended that the proper construction of these articles is that, if a recognizance is given, it must be at the term at which the trial was had, and if not then given, a person can secure his release only by giving a bail bond, in lieu of a recognizance; and it is claimed this is the proper construction of article 904, which reads: "If, for any cause, the defendant fails to enter into and make the recognizance mentioned in article 903 during the term of court, but gave notice of and took an appeal from such conviction during such term, he shall, notwithstanding such failure, be permitted to give bail and obtain his release from custody by giving, after the expiration of such term of court and in vacation, his bail bond to the sheriff, with two or more good and sufficient sureties," etc.

To the writer's mind, this article was clothed in such language as to be subject to either construction, and while he thought that perhaps the better construction would be that, if the court was in session, a recognizance should be given, and a bail bond was only authorized to be taken when the court was in vacation, and, therefore, no recognizance could be entered into, yet, after discussing it with the other members of the court, as it was only a matter of procedure, he said he would not dissent from such holding, as he thought it better to get a settled construction. Since the original opinion has been handed down, we have been led to a further study of the question, and we find that when the criminal procedure required, when the court was in session, that a defendant, when arrested for a felony, enter into a recognizance in open court, and a sheriff was authorized to take bond only when the court was in vacation (articles 325 and 326, White's Anno. Proc.), it was held that if the court be in session, either at the term at which the indictment was returned or at a subsequent term, the sheriff could not take a bail bond, but the defendant was required to enter into a recognizance. Kiser v. State, 13 Tex. App. 201; Gragg v. State, 18 Tex. App. 295; Le Rose v. State, 29

Tex. App. 215, 15 S. W. 33. The legislature, apparently on account of these decisions and the inconvenience sometimes caused, in 1907 amended this article of the statute, now article 337, and authorized the sheriff to take a bail bond even though the court be in session; but it took an act of the legislature to authorize a sheriff to take a bail bond when the court was in session, whether at the term at which the indictment was returned, or a subsequent term. At the same session of the legislature, in 1907, the act was passed which, for the first time, authorized a person convicted of a felony to give a recognizance or bail bond on appeal, if the punishment assessed did not exceed fifteen years' confinement in the penitentiary. Sess. Acts 1907, chap. 19. In the emergency clause to this bill, the legislature declares: "The large amount of costs incurred by keeping the defendant in the custody of the sheriff during a trial, when he is charged with felony, and during the appeals taken from felony convictions, and the frequent hardships endured by the defendants who are not guilty of a violation of law, and the liberty of the citizen, as well as the interests of the state, create an emergency and an imperative public necessity requiring that the constitutional rule requiring bills to be read on three several days be and the same is hereby suspended, and that this act take effect from and after its passage, and it is so enacted."

The purpose of the legislature is made manifest by this act, to save costs of keeping the prisoners confined, to the counties, and to keep innocent people from being punished by confinement in the county jails. But in thus providing they wanted the court to have a supervision and see that adequate sureties were given, and if the court was in session a recognizance must be given so that he might investigate the solvency of the sureties; if the court was not in session, a bail bond could be executed, but the amount of this bail bond must be fixed by the trial judge, and he must approve the bond, in addition to the sheriff—that he might inquire of the sheriff as to the investigation he had made as to the solvency of the sureties. At this session of the legislature, they dealt with both bail bonds and recognizances before conviction and after conviction, and in one instance (before conviction) they provided that a sheriff might take a bail bond even though the court was in session; but, after conviction, the only instance in which a sheriff was authorized to take a bail bond was (and they use the words) in vacation, and then provided, before the prisoner is released, the bond must be presented to the court trying the cause, and be approved by him. To the mind of the writer, it was the clear intent and purpose of the legislature, after conviction, to only authorize the sheriff to take a bail bond while the court was in vacation, and if the court was in session, even though at a subsequent term, a recognizance must be entered into in open court. This construction is in accordance with the construction of the former act, which applied to prisoners before conviction, and which the legislature amended at this session, and which it must in consequence have had in mind, and for this reason the writer thinks the cause should be reinstated; but, as hereinbefore stated, it is but a matter of procedure, and if a majority of the members of this court think the proper construction is that, even though the court at which one is convicted is in session at a subsequent term, a bail bond only will confer jurisdiction on this court, he will acquiesce in such construction, and dissent no further.

And being of the opinion that the case should be reinstated, he will proceed to pass on the questions raised in the record.

In the first place, we do not think there was any error in overruling the motion to quash the indictment.

The defendant, as plaintiff, brought suit in the civil district court of Dallas county for a divorce from his wife, Mrs. Jessie Laird, alleging that, at the time of the institution of the suit, he had been a resident of Texas for twelve months. In the indictment in this case this is alleged to be false and untrue, and appellant seemingly contends that, if he had not been in fact a resident of Texas twelve months, the district court of Dallas county would have no jurisdiction of the cause of action, and, therefore, if he swore falsely in such suit, no indictment for perjury would lie. The petition was introduced in evidence, in which it is alleged "that plaintiff is a resident of Dallas, Dallas county, Texas, and has been for more than twelve months next preceding the filing of the petition." If the defendant, Mrs. Jessie Laird, had appeared in that cause and filed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court and in abatement of the suit, alleging that appellant, plaintiff in that cause, had not been a resident of this state for twelve months, the court would have had jurisdiction to hear and determine that question; and if appellant, on the hearing of that plea, had been sworn, and testified he had been a resident of Texas for twelve months, yet, upon hearing the other testimony, the court had found his testimony false, and dismissed the suit for want of jurisdiction to hear the cause, yet an indictment for perjury would lie, because the testimony was given in the course of a judicial proceeding, in a court which had jurisdiction to hear and determine that question. And in as much as Mrs. Laird did not appear, and in order to get the court to hear and entertain the suit and grant him a divorce, if appellant testified he had been a resident of Texas for twelve months in order to obtain a decree of divorce from his wife, and such testimony was in fact untrue, an indictment for perjury based thereon will lie, and the court did not err in so holding. Cordway v. State, 25 Tex. App. 405, 8 S. W. 670; Anderson v. State, 24 Tex. App. 705, 7 S. W. 40; Higginbotham v. State, 24 Tex. App. 505, 6 S. W. 201; Etheridge v. State, 76 Tex. Crim. Rep. 198, 173 S. W. 1031. And it has been held that assignment of immaterial matter, in connection with material matter, does not vitiate the indictment. Dorrs v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 40 S. W. 311; Jefferson v. State, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 49 S. W. 88.

But the next question presented is one of more difficulty. Appellant contends that, even though perjury could be assigned on his testimony given on the divorce trial, the judgment and decree of divorce entered therein is absolutely void, and, if void, the woman from whom he was adjudged a divorce in that decree is his legal wife, and she cannot, therefore, be used as a witness against him. Appellant, according to this record, came to Texas from New York in December, 1913, leaving a wife and child in New York. In September, 1914, following, he filed a suit for divorce in the sixty-eighth district court of Dallas county, Texas, alleging that he had been a resident of Texas for twelve months, and making allegations in respect to his wife. In the petition he alleged he did not know the address of his wife, and she was cited by publication. When the case came on to be heard Judge Whitehurst testifies appellant took the stand as a witness and testified he had been a resident of Texas for twelve months immediately preceding the filing of the petition for divorce, and testified to the truth of the allegations upon which he sought a divorce. Judge Whitehurst, on the testimony of appellant, granted the divorce, and a decree was entered, granting him an absolute divorce from Mrs. Jessie Laird, the decree reading: "A jury being waived, and the court, having heard the pleadings and the evidence, and the argument of counsel, is of the opinion that the material allegations in plaintiff's petition are true. It is, therefore, ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the bonds of matrimony heretofore existing between said defendant, Jessie Laird, and plaintiff, W. H. Laird, be and the same are hereby annulled and dissolved, and that each party hereto is hereby restored to the status of single persons."

Appellant's contention is that, although he may have brought this suit, testified as stated above, and obtained to be decreed and entered this decree of divorce, as he had not been in Texas twelve months, the decree is a nullity and void, and, therefore, Mrs. Jessie Laird was not and is not a competent witness against him. One must bear in mind, in passing on this question, that there is nothing in the record of the proceedings in the sixty-eighth district court which would render the judgment void, or tend to show that he had not been a resident of Texas for twelve months. On the face of the pleadings and by the entire record made in that case, the jurisdiction of the district court is shown, and the regularity of its decree.

If the decree is either void or voidable, it must be shown by evidence aliunde the record. Now, so long as this record stands and no suit is brought to set it aside, can it be collaterally attacked, and especially can it thus be attacked by the person who caused and at whose instance it was entered? Upon the decision of this question rests the question of whether or not Mrs. Jessie Laird was a competent witness against appellant. If she was not a competent witness the case must be reversed, because she gave very material testimony to show the falsity of the testimony said to have been given by appellant on the trial of the divorce suit.

Now, the evidence, and all the evidence, shows that appellant brought the divorce suit, and procured that judgment of divorce to be entered. Under the Constitution and laws of this state, the district court of the sixty-eighth district had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit—the granting of divorce. Const. art. 5, § 8. Having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, the appellant in his petition alleged a state of case which invoked that jurisdiction, and on the record, as made in that court, the decree is valid and binding on all the world, and especially binding on appellant. In the case of Martin v. Robinson, 67 Tex. 368, 3 S. W. 550, Judge Stayton, speaking for the supreme court, says: "Such a court must determine whether the facts exist which make it lawful for administration to be granted in the county in which the court sits, and if in this respect, having power to make the inquiry, it comes to an erroneous conclusion, its decree founded on such conclusion is voidable, but not void,"—citing Lynch v. Baxter, 4 Tex. 431, 51 Am. Dec. 735; Burdett v. Silsbee, 15 Tex. 604; Giddings v. Steele, 28 Tex. 733, 91 Am. Dec. 336. So, in this case, when appellant's petition in the district court, he being plaintiff in the action for divorce, came on to be heard, he having cited his wife by publication, the court, in accordance with the provisions of law, appointed an attorney to represent the defendant, the absent wife. This attorney filed a general denial, which put plaintiff to strict proof of his allegations. After this evidence, the court may have erred in the conclusion he came to, yet under the evidence offered the court came to the conclusion that plaintiff had been a resident of Texas for twelve months, and such judgment cannot be collaterally attacked; but the only way to nullify it is to bring a direct suit for that purpose. As said by our supreme court in Crawford v. McDonald, 88 Tex. 631, 33 S. W. 325: "The general rule is well established, that a judgment rendered by a court even of general jurisdiction is void, if it had, at the time of the rendition of the judgment, no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant or the subject-matter of the litigation. This principle is self-evident, because, until the court acquired jurisdiction, it has no power to proceed to investigate and determine private rights. Logically, it can make no difference as to the validity of the judgment, whether the lack of jurisdiction of the person or the subject-matter appears from the face of the record, or is made to appear by evidence aliunde. For if, for instance, no service was had upon the defendant, he not appearing in the case, the court, having no jurisdiction whatever over his person, is absolutely without power to bind him by an adjudication that he had been in fact duly served; and, logically, this want of power is the same, whether the lack of jurisdiction appears on the face of the record or not. There is, however, another rule of law equally well settled upon principles of public policy, which precludes inquiry by evidence aliunde the record, in a collateral attack upon a judgment of a domestic court of a general jurisdiction, regular on its face, into any fact which the court rendering such judgment must have passed upon in proceeding to its rendition. Therefore, it is well settled that where a personal judgment has been rendered against a defendant by a domestic court of general jurisdiction, and under the same his property has been seized and sold, he will not, in a contest over the title to the property, be allowed to show by evidence dehors the record that the judgment was rendered without any service whatever upon him. Logically, the judgment is in fact void, but on grounds of public policy the courts, in order to protect property rights, apply the rule aforesaid, which precludes inquiry into facts dehors the record, for the purpose of showing the invalidity of the judgment; and, therefore, for all practical purposes, in such collateral attack, the judgment is held valid. This rule is analogous to, and probably as important as, the rule forbidding the introduction of verbal testimony to vary or contradict the terms of a written contract, except in a proceeding instituted for the purpose of correcting, reforming, or annulling the same. These principles have long been acted upon by this court, as applicable to judgments of the district, probate, and justice courts, and have become settled rules of property in this state. Murchison v. White, 54 Tex. 78; Williams v. Ball, 52 Tex. 603, 36 Am. Rep. 730; Brown v. Christie, 27 Tex. 73, 84 Am. Dec. 607; Heck v. Martin, 75 Tex. 469, 16 Am. St. Rep. 915, 13 S. W. 51; Fowler v. Simpson, 79 Tex. 611, 23 Am. St. Rep. 370, 15 S. W. 682; Martin v. Burns, 80 Tex. 677, 16 S. W. 1072; Hardy v. Beaty, 84 Tex. 562, 31 Am. St. Rep. 80, 19 S. W. 778. Whether an exception has been ingrafted upon this rule by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565, and if so, what is the effect thereof, is foreign to this discussion. Martin v. Burns, 80 Tex. 676, 16 S. W. 1072; Hardy v. Beaty, supra.

"Since the rule of public policy above referred to precludes inquiry in a collateral attack into even a jurisdictional fact, when the evidence thereof does not appear from the face of the record, it must follow, for stronger reasons, that the judgment in this case, affirming the sale, cannot be attacked collaterally by evidence dehors the record, to the effect that the sale was not in fact made at the place required by law. The court in confirming the sale will be conclusively presumed in this collateral attack to have investigated and determined correctly that the sale was made at the proper place, and no evidence aliunde to the contrary will be permitted to impeach the correctness of the judgment. The only relief, if any, permitted by the rules of law against an improper determination of such question by the court in rendering such judgment of confirmation, is to be found in a direct attack upon the judgment, where the court has full power to adjust the equities of the parties litigant. We are, therefore, of the opinion that this judgment cannot be attacked by the evidence dehors the record of the probate court that the sale was not made at the courthouse door of Grayson county. Brown v. Christie, 27 Tex. 73, 84 Am. Dec. 607.

But were the above not the general rule our supreme court has settled the question that appellant, having instituted the civil suit, and prosecuted it to judgment, cannot collaterally attack it. In Heffron v. Cunningham, 76 Tex. 312, 13 S. W. 259, it was held: "One in whose favor a judgment is rendered in a suit brought in his name by counsel employed by him to sue, cannot be heard in a collateral proceeding to attack the jurisdiction of the court, so long as he resorts to no means to correct or annul the judgment." This is not only the rule in this state, but Cyc. vol. 23, p. 1067, says: The rule forbidding the collateral impeachment of judgments applied to all persons who were parties to the action in which the judgment was rendered,—citing cases from many different states.

In Century Dig. vol. 30, under title, Judgments, § 931, is cited a list of authorities which hold that a collateral attack on a judgment for want of jurisdiction of a party thereto, which must be shown by facts outside the record, can only be made by one not a party to the judgment. Thompson v. McCorkle, 136 Ind. 484, 43 Am. St. Rep. 334, 34 N. E. 813, 36 N. E. 211; Valentine v. McGrath, 52 Miss. 112; Hess v. Smith, 16 Misc. 55, 37 N. Y. Supp. 635; People's Bank v. Williams, — Tenn. —, 36 S. W. 983, and cases cited.

It is thus seen that the rule of law is, that if the court rendering the judgment has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the record as made would show that its jurisdiction had been properly invoked, the judgment is not void, but voidable only, and cannot be collaterally attacked by the person securing the judgment to be entered, but must be set aside by direct proceedings, if it is to be avoided.

And as in this case appellant had procured a decree of divorce to be entered in a court having jurisdiction of divorce proceedings, annulling the bonds of matrimony existing between him and Mrs. Jessie Laird, he cannot collaterally attack that judgment, and, as the divorced wife is permitted under our law to testify, the court did not err in permitting her to do so.

The only other question presented in the brief is one of some difficulty to the writer. The petition filed by appellant to obtain the divorce, and the answer of the attorney appointed by the court to represent the absent defendant, whose residence was alleged to be unknown, and who was cited by publication, and the judgment decreeing a divorce, were properly admitted in evidence, and the admissibility of this testimony is not contested by appellant, but he contends the court erred in not limiting the purpose for which the jury might consider such testimony. The general rule is as contended by appellant. He says:

"On the trial of the defendant herein, the state introduced in evidence the original petition for divorce filed in the district court for the sixty-eighth judicial district of Texas in the case of W. H. Laird v. Jessie Laird, No. 18,000-C, and also introduced in evidence the judgment entered in said cause as of March 1, 1915. Said petition and said judgment were competent and admissible to show inducement in the matter assigned as perjury and for the purpose of showing that a trial was had in the district court for the sixty-eighth judicial district of Texas, of matters over which said court had jurisdiction, and for the purpose of showing the materiality of the particular matters assigned as perjury in this case.

"While said testimony was admissible for the purposes stated, it is well settled by an unbroken line of decisions in this state that the court in his charge must limit and restrict the purpose or purposes for which same can be considered by the jury in arriving at their verdict. 'Wherever extraneous matter is admitted in evidence for a specific purpose incidental to, but which is not admissible directly to prove, the main issue, and which might be taken, if not explained, to exercise a wrong and undue or improper influence on the jury as injurious and prejudicial to the rights of the party, then it becomes the imperative duty of the court to so limit and restrict it as that such unwarranted results cannot ensue; and a failure to do so will be radical and reversible.' 'In perjury, the judgment and record of the trial in which the perjury was committed are legitimate as evidence by way of inducement, though not to prove the perjury, and it is error for the charge not to limit and restrict said evidence,'—citing Davidson v. State, 22 Tex. App. 372, 3 S. W. 662; Washington v. State, 23 Tex. App. 836, 5 S. W. 119; Maines v. State, 23 Tex. App. 568, 5 S. W. 123; Littlefield v. State, 24 Tex. App. 167, 5 S. W. 650; Higginbotham v. State, 24 Tex. App. 505, 6 S. W. 201; Kitchen v. State, 26 Tex. App. 165, 9 S. W. 461; Foster v. State, 32 Tex. Crim. Rep. 39, 22 S. W. 21; Estill v. State, 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 255, 42 S. W. 305."

The writer thinks these cases correctly announce the law in holding that when the record of the proceedings in the case in which it is contended the perjury was committed is introduced, such evidence must be limited, as contended by appellant, when that is the only purpose for which such testimony is legitimately admissible.

But appellant, by objecting to Mrs. Laird testifying when called as a witness, rendered the testimony admissible for another purpose. It became compulsory on the state to show that a decree of divorce had been granted, and under said decree she was no longer the wife of appellant, and when he sought to collaterally attack this decree as being void, on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction, it became compulsory on the state to show that the decree was entered in a court having jurisdiction to grant divorces, at the instance and request of appellant, and the record in that cause became admissible for that purpose as well as a matter of inducement, and to show the materiality of the alleged false testimony. Appellant, by objecting to Mrs. Laird testifying, compelled the state to procure and introduce this testimony to render her a competent witness, and he cannot be heard to complain that such testimony was only admissible as a matter of inducement. He, by his objection, had rendered it admissible for another and different purpose, and compelled its introduction to render a witness a competent witness, and this perhaps is the reason the trial court did not in his charge seek to limit the testimony.

However, appellant contends that the testimony was of such a nature that it could be used by the jury in establishing his guilt, and it was not admissible for that purpose. Appellant is correct in his contention that the petition and judgment were not admissible on the issue of his guilt of the charge of perjury; but would or could it have an undue influence in establishing appellant's guilt? The petition was an ordinary petition for divorce, in which it alleged appellant's residence, that the residence of Mrs. Laird was unknown, and, among other grounds, alleged that Mrs. Laird was an immoral woman, and had been guilty of immoral conduct. The charge of perjury is based on the allegation that appellant, on the trial of the divorce suit, testified to the truth of such allegations, and that the testimony so given by him was false and known by him to be untrue when he so testified. The petition or the judgment could and would have no bearing in proving the falsity of such testimony. In fact, if such testimony had any bearing on that issue, which we doubt, its tendency would be to show that such testimony was in fact true, because the court had so found in the divorce suit, and adjudged a divorce on those grounds. So, on that issue, the falsity of his testimony could not have any bearing to the hurt of appellant, but would rather have been helpful.

On another issue in the case, however, we cannot say such testimony would have no tendency to establish its truth. The indictment alleged that on the trial of the divorce suit appellant had testified: "1. On September 11, 1914, I did not know the address or whereabouts of the defendant, Mrs. Jessie Laird. 2. On March 1, 1915, I did not know the address or whereabouts of the defendant, Mrs. Jessie Laird. 3. On September 11, 1914, I had been a resident of the state of Texas for twelve months next preceding the filing of my suit for divorce. 4. On September 11, 1914, I had been an actual bona fide inhabitant of the state of Texas for twelve months next preceding thereto. 5. From the 11th of September, 1913, to December 1, 1913, I was not an inhabitant or resident of the state of New York. 6. On or about September 1, 1913, I came to Texas, accompanied by my wife, Mrs. Jessie Laird, who lived with me in Texas until on or about December 1, 1913, at which time she, the said Mrs. Jessie Laird, left me at San Marcos, Texas, and left with another man for parts unknown to me. 10. Mrs. Jessie Laird was unfaithful to me and associated with immoral people."

It was incumbent upon the state to prove (1) that appellant had so testified in the trial of the divorce case, and (2) that said testimony was false, and known by appellant to be untrue when he so testified. As before said, on the second of these issues, the falsity of such testimony, the petition and judgment could and would have no bearing to the detriment of appellant, but on the first of these issues, that he had so testified, the petition and decree might and probably would have some tendency to prove that he had so testified. When appellant pleaded not guilty to the charge of perjury, before he could be adjudged guilty, the state was required to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, both that appellant had so testified and that such testimony was false; and as the petition and judgment could and might have some tendency to prove that appellant had so testified, or might be so construed by the jury, the court in his charge should have instructed the jury that such testimony could not be considered by the jury in passing on the guilt of appellant on the charge of perjury. Having said that much, we come now to consider whether or not a failure to so instruct the jury requires a reversal of the case at our hands. If it could have worked any injury to appellant, we should not hesitate to reverse the case, and upon this issue the writer has hesitated and been slow to arrive at a conclusion. Had the appellant on the trial of the perjury case offered any testimony that he had not so testified in the trial of the divorce case, the writer would not agree to an affirmance of this case, because the petition and judgment in that case might have had some tendency to prove that he had so testified. But inasmuch as appellant offered no testimony that he did not so testify, and the testimony and all the testimony introduced on that issue in the perjury trial was that appellant had so testified in the divorce suit, the jury, without the introduction of the petition and judgment, would not have been authorized to find that he had not so testified, or have grounds, under the evidence on the perjury trial, for a reasonable doubt that he had so testified, under such circumstances we have come to the conclusion that, in the absence of any testimony he had not so testified, we, under the decisions of this court, are not justified in reversing the case because the court failed to limit such testimony. The testimony was admissible, as admitted by appellant, on some issues in the case, and as to the issue on which he claims it should not have been considered by the jury, appellant offers no testimony, while the state offered testimony upon which the jury could not have found otherwise, if the petition and decree had not been introduced in evidence. Trent v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 251, 20 S. W. 547; Elliott v. State, 39 Tex. Crim. Rep. 242, 45 S. W. 711; Marsden v. State, 59 Tex. Crim. Rep. 38, 126 S. W. 1160; Fitzpatrick v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 20, 38 S. W. 806. In the case of Franklin v. State, 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 348, 43 S. W. 85, the court held that if the record introduced would not tend to show the falsity of the testimony alleged to have been given, it was not error to fail to limit the testimony.

In this case, after a careful review of the decisions of this court, we have arrived at the conclusion that the petition and judgment were admissible, not only for the purposes of showing inducement and materiality of the testimony alleged to be false, but was also admissible for another purpose, to show the competency of the witness, Mrs. Laird; and as said testimony would and could have no bearing on whether the alleged testimony, if given, was false, and from the further fact that the testimony and all the testimony adduced on the trial of this case shows that appellant did testify, as alleged, in the divorce suit, no such error is presented by the failure of the court to limit the purposes for which the petition and judgment were admitted as to authorize a reversal of the judgment.

In my opinion the case should be reinstated and affirmed.

Prendergast, P. J. concurring:

The opinion dismissing this cause was correct, and was agreed to expressly by both my associates before it was handed down, though Judge Davidson was absent the day it was handed down. But as it is merely a matter of practice for the first time established, though wrong, I will not further discuss it.

In my opinion the petition in the divorce case was admissible in this, as an admission or statement by appellant, just as any other admission or statement by him would have been, and the court did not err in not limiting, as it is claimed by appellant it should have been.

Judge Harper's opinion, otherwise, is correct, and unquestionably the law of, and applicable to, this case.

The authorities and principles cited by Judge Davidson in his dissenting opinion, are wholly inapplicable to this case, and the questions decided therein.

Davidson, J., dissenting:

I do not purpose to discuss the question of reinstatement, but wish to say that I agree with the conclusion reached by Judge Harper that the dismissal was error. I deem it unnecessary to give my own views in regard to the reasons. His conclusion is correct.

I am persuaded that this judgment ought to have been reversed. Making a brief statement, the record discloses that appellant came to Texas from New York, leaving there on the 11th day of December. On the 11th of the following September he filed his petition for divorce in one of the district courts of Dallas county, being in Texas only nine months. This case was one of perjury, based upon appellant's testimony in that case, in which he stated that he had been a bona fide resident of Texas for the required twelve months and in the county of Dallas for the requisite six months. A divorce judgment was thereupon entered. It seems, further, that the wife had not been in Texas, but was a resident of New York at the time the petition for divorce was filed. She was cited, it seems, by publication.

Article 4632, Revised Statutes, as amended by the Act of the Legislature 1913, page 183, provides that no divorce shall be granted in this state unless the party is a bona fide resident of this state, and has been for twelve months prior to instituting divorce proceedings, and of the county in which the suit is filed for six months prior to filing the suit. So far as the writer has been able to ascertain, a judgment of divorce obtained in this state is a nullity, and therefore void, without the necessary residence. I do not purpose to discuss the case cited by Judge Harper wherein the judgment was had in a probate court, and under which subsequently a sale of property occurred, and that property became involved in litigation. The court held the probate judgment could not be attacked in collateral proceedings under the facts stated in that case. Those interested in reading the opinion he cites may do so, but it has no application to this case, as will be evidenced by its perusal. It has been always regarded an essential difference between the judgments of those courts of competent jurisdiction which in some way improperly act, and those courts which have no jurisdiction. Such judgments are placed on different footings. I do not purpose now to discuss that question.

It is the law that wherever a citizen of one state seeks to secure a divorce in another state, he must become a bona fide resident of the state in which he seeks the divorce for the length of time and under the circumstances provided by the statutes of that state; and until this has been done no divorce proceedings can be instituted, and if instituted and judgment is obtained, it is a nullity. I will cite some of the authorities along this line. 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 734, and for cases collated, see note 2. I also refer to 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 741, 742, and notes for collated authorities. I also refer to 7 Standard Enc. & Proc. 739 and 740, as to what it takes to constitute a resident and citizenship. I also refer to 7 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 146, as to what it takes to constitute an appearance. I also cite Emery v. State, 57 Tex. Crim. Rep. 423, 136

Litowich, 19 Kan. 451, 27 Am. Rep. 145; Folger v. Columbian Ins. Co. 99 Mass. 267, 96 Am. Dec. 747. These matters were pretty thoroughly investigated and discussed in Emery v. State, supra, in an opinion by this court, and the same conclusion reached there that the writer believes to be correct, and here maintains.

It will be observed, with reference to such divorce matters, that they must be governed by state laws. The acts of Congress have no force and are not applicable,—I mean as applying to granting divorces. It may be further stated that the state control of these matters is limited to citizens. The courts of Texas cannot grant a divorce to citizens of other states. There must be not only residence, but a bona fide domicil. On this question see cases collated in 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pages 741, 742, in note 1. Also, as to domicil being the test, see page 742, supra, and page 743, and also 7 Standard Enc. & Proc. pages 739, 740. It may also be stated in this connection that appearance, merely, does not confer jurisdiction. Statutory requirements must be fully met and complied with, or the judgment is a nullity. 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 746, and notes. It would be useless to follow this question as to what it takes to constitute appearance. Consent cannot confer jurisdiction. Such decrees are void. Douglas v. State, 58 Tex. Crim. Rep. 122, 137 Am. St. Rep. 980, 124 S. W. 933; Stuart v. Cole, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 478, 92 S. W. 1040; 7 Standard Enc. & Proc. 807, note 23.

Without amplifying this phase of the matter further, I turn to another line of authorities which ought to be deemed now as fully settling the question adversely to the state. Ex parte Degener, 30 Tex. App. 566, where a great number of cases are collated; the opinion having been written by Presiding Judge White; Ex parte Taylor, 34 Tex. Crim. Rep. 591, 31 S. W. 641; Ex parte Kearby, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 531, 34 S. W. 635; Ex parte Kearby, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 634, 34 S. W. 962; Ex parte Duncan, 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 661, 62 S. W. 758; Ex parte Tinsley, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 517, 66 Am. St. Rep. 818, 40 S. W. 306; Ex parte Lake, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 656, 66 Am. St. Rep. 848, 40 S. W. 727; Ex parte Parker, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 12, 29 S. W. 480, 790; Ex parte Juneman, 28 Tex. App. 486, 18 S. W. 783; Ex parte Snodgrass, 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 359, 65 S. W. 1061, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 400. These cases lay down the proposition that three things must concur and are absolutely necessary to the jurisdiction of the court, or as jurisdictional matters: First, the court must have jurisdiction of the person; second, of the subject-matter; and third, power to render the particular judgment rendered, otherwise prosecution will be void, as will also the judgment. All of these cases hold the jurisdiction of the person is essential to the validity of the proceedings, otherwise it is a nullity and void. This rule has been followed in Texas in all its history, commencing with Fleming v. Nall, 1 Tex. 246; see also Tulane v. McKee, 10 Tex. 335; Glass v.

Smith, 66 Tex. 548, 2 S. W. 195; Mitchell v. Runkle, 25 Tex. Supp. 132; Horan v. Wahrenberger, 9 Tex. 313, 58 Am. Dec. 145; Thouvenin v. Rodrigues, 24 Tex. 468; Foster v. Andrews, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 429, 23 S. W. 610. In 12 Encyclopedia of Pleading and Practice, page 179, this rule is stated: "It is an elementary principle, recognized in all the cases, that to give binding effect to a judgment of any court, whether of general or limited jurisdiction, it is essential that the court should have jurisdiction of the person as well as of the subject-matter; and that a judgment which appears upon the face of the record to have been rendered without jurisdiction of the subject-matter or of the person, or which may be shown to have been so rendered in cases where evidence upon the question is admissible, is absolutely void, no matter in what proceeding or in what action it may thereafter be set up or relied upon." This is supported by a great number of cases cited in the footnotes from many of the states in the Federal Union. Some of these are collated in Emery v. State, supra. This rule has been held to apply, also, where the court has not acquired jurisdiction of the person under necessary process or pleading, although in fact the accused was tried,—citing Wilson v. State, 27 Tex. App. 47, 11 Am. St. Rep. 180, 10 S. W. 749; Garrett v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 198, 38 S. W. 1017, 39 S. W. 108; Lawrence v. State, 2 Tex. App. 479. This is the settled rule where the court has not the authority to try the case. Cases supporting this proposition are also collated in Emery v. State, supra.

Under all these authorities the proposition may be safely asserted that, if the court had not acquired jurisdiction of the person or the subject-matter, the judgment will be void. Article 4632, Revised Statutes, as amended by the legislature, 1913, says that no judgment for divorce shall be granted in this state unless the party seeking the divorce is a bona fide inhabitant for twelve months in the state, and in the county six months. The evidence in this case demonstrates that appellant had been in the state but nine months at the time the suit was instituted, therefore the court was without jurisdiction as to his person and the subject-matter, and, of course, could not render a judgment.

There is another case I might notice in this connection, against the proposition that the judgment is only voidable and cannot be attacked in collateral proceedings. Ex parte Parker, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 12, 29 S. W. 480, 790. It is unnecessary to review that case at length, or to state the matters in full. Parker was tried in Nueces county and convicted of homicide, his punishment being confinement in the penitentiary for the term of his life. In that case it was held that a writ of habeas corpus could be used to attack the validity of the judgment of the court, and that it is competent, notwithstanding the recitals in the judgment, to go behind the judgment, and probe into the very truth of the matter as to whether an act done during the term was in fact done during the time recited by the record. Parker had been convicted, and the contention was made on trial of the writ of habeas corpus that the verdict was rendered after the adjournment, by law, of the term at which he was convicted. The writ was granted, the case tried, and the matter investigated, all of which is shown by the report of the case. These matters I have set out a little more fully than I anticipated. One of the main questions in the instant case turned on whether the wife of the defendant, who testified in this case, was a competent witness against him. The majority opinion is based upon the theory that the court did not have jurisdiction; that is, appellant had not been a citizen for twelve months, and, therefore, the testimony of appellant to that effect before the court granting a divorce was false, and constituted a basis for perjury. If the court had jurisdiction, it was not perjury, because appellant would have lived the requisite twelve months in Texas before exhibiting his application for a divorce. The perjury is predicated on appellant's testimony in the divorce case, to the effect that he had lived in Texas the necessary statutory time in order to get the divorce. If it was true he had been a citizen of Texas, as required by statute, the state has no case; there could be no perjury. The majority opinion holds that his testimony was false in showing jurisdictional facts; that the court had no jurisdiction to try the divorce case, or to entertain it; and yet it holds that the party is guilty of perjury in a proceeding over which the court had no authority or jurisdiction. If the judgment was valid, the divorce was properly granted, and the wife could testify, because no longer his wife. Her competency as a witness against her husband is predicated alone upon the proposition that appellant's testimony was the basis of the judgment. This being true, the wife was not divorced. There could be no divorce under the facts. She still labored under the incapacity as a witness, being the wife of the accused. Objection was interposed on the trial of the perjury case for the reasons stated. The court below should have sustained these objections, and this court should have reversed the case because the court below did not sustain objections to the wife's competency as a witness. The wife cannot testify in Texas against her husband in perjury cases. She did not testify in the divorce case. She was not in Texas; she was in New York. The judgment is a nullity, first, because the court had no jurisdiction of the person, and his voluntary appearance under all the authorities did not confer jurisdiction. Consent could not confer jurisdiction. The sine qua non was the requisite residence. In order to have jurisdiction in this case the facts must be true that appellant had lived in Texas the necessary time. Second, it had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter. The divorce proceedings were not maintainable in the district court until the party had lived here the necessary time. The court did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter. There was no cause of action, and none could exist until the expiration of the twelve months; and, third, not having jurisdiction of the person or subject-matter, the court was powerless to render a judgment on the facts. The authorities all sustain these propositions, so far as I am aware, and the question of the judgment being voidable does not enter into this case. It was void.

These are some of the reasons upon which I base my conclusions that the majority opinion is wrong in the affirmance.

I therefore respectfully enter my dissent.

I. General rule.

The party at whose instance a judgment is rendered is not entitled, in a collateral proceeding, to contend that the judgment is invalid. Neither want of jurisdiction, defect of procedure, or any other ground of invalidity can be availed of collaterally, by the party who is responsible for the existence of the judgment.

The reason or principle on which these decisions rest is not technically the doctrine of estoppel, in the ordinary signification and acceptation of that term, but the principle that a person, having invoked the jurisdiction of a court, and submitted himself thereto, cannot be heard thereafter to question, in a collateral proceeding, the jurisdiction of that court, and to claim the nullity of the judgment or decree, the rendition of which he asked. See the cases cited throughout this note.

Thus, in Bledsoe v. Seaman (1908) 77 Kan. 679, 95 Pac. 576, the court said: "A party cannot invoke the jurisdiction and power of a court for the purpose of securing important rights from his adversary through its judgment, and, after having obtained the relief desired, repudiate the action of the court on the ground that it was without jurisdiction. The question whether the court had jurisdiction, either of the subject-matter of the action or of the parties, is not important in such cases. Parties are barred from such conduct, not because the judgment obtained is conclusive as an adjudication, but for the reason that such a practice cannot be tolerated. People who invoke the action of a court, and, through negligence or falsehood, mislead the court as to the existence of the facts upon which its jurisdiction depends, and obtain a judgment for relief, will not afterward be heard to deny the validity of such judgment."

In the case of Re Morrison (1889) 52 Hun, 102, 5 N. Y. Supp. 90, affirmed in (1889) 117 N. Y. 638, 22 N. E. 1130, the court said: "The position does not rest upon the doctrine of estoppel, as such term is ordinarily used, but upon a principle which has been repeatedly recognized by the courts, that, where a party has gone into a court and invoked its jurisdiction, he cannot subsequently attack the decree of the court obtained at his instance, because of the want of jurisdiction of somebody else."

The closely related maxim of law, that "No man should take advantage of his own fraud," has been held to be applicable in two instances. Elliott v. Wohlfrom (1880) 55 Cal. 384; Hess v. Smith (1896) 16 Misc. 55, 37 N. Y. Supp. 635.

II. Illustrations of rule.

a. In general.

In Bowne v. Mellor (1844) 6 Hill (N. Y.) 496, it was held that one who had procured an attachment to be issued was not at liberty to show an irregularity in the process, for the purpose of defeating an action on the attachment bond.

In McDermott v. Isbell (1854) 4 Cal. 113, the court, stating that it had frequently held that a party who had availed himself of the process of an inferior court could not escape the responsibility of his own act on the ground that the tribunal had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter in controversy, held that a party who had sued out a writ of replevin from a justice of the peace, having no jurisdiction, and had obtained the property, could not, in an action on the replevin bond, set up as a defense the want of jurisdiction.

In Stevenson v. Miller (1822) 2 Litt. (Ky.) 306, 13 Am. Dec. 271, it was held that a defendant in an action on an injunction bond, on whose application the injunction was issued, was estopped to question the authority of the justices to grant the injunction. In holding that the act of the justices should be regarded as a de facto injunction, and valid on collateral attack, the court said: "If this rule applies in any case, it ought in the present, where the procurement of the acts of these justices was entirely the act of the party who now tries to avoid it. He meant to stop the progress of law and subject his adversaries to the costs and expense of a suit, by this proceeding. Before he could do this, he was bound, by the direction of the justices, to do an act for the benefit of and to secure his adversary. This he did, and now he attempts, after having effected his purpose, to tell his adversary it was all a sham. He has reaped the benefit of the acts done for his own use, but the opposite side is precluded from making him responsible, because he himself had gotten his injunction from persons who had no authority to grant it. The admission of such a plea may have more extensive evil consequences than at first blush can be seen; and it was, therefore, erroneous to sustain the demurrer for this cause in the court below."

In Russell v. Gray (1851) 11 Barb. (N. Y.) 541, it appeared that the defendants, on the trial of a replevin suit, recovered judgment for the property or its value, and collected the judgment, on the ground that the sheriff had delivered it to the plaintiff. It was held, in an action against them by the plaintiff in replevin for the subsequent conversion of the property, that they could not deny the title of the plaintiff, acquired by virtue of the judgment in replevin.

In Robertson v. Smith (1891) 129 Ind. 422, 15 L.R.A. 273, 28 N. E. 857, it was held that where a plaintiff filed a complaint and bond, and procured an injunction to issue from a court of general jurisdiction, he was, when sued on the bond, estopped to say that the court granting the injunction was without jurisdiction, on the ground that it did not lie in the mouth of one who had affirmed the jurisdiction of a court in a particular matter, to accomplish a purpose, afterwards to deny such jurisdiction in order to escape a penalty.

In Sammons v. Newman (1867) 27 Ind. 508, a suit on a replevin bond, it was held that neither the plaintiff in replevin, who had obtained possession of the property, nor the sureties on the replevin bond, could allege that no writ of summons had ever issued in the replevin suit, and that therefore the suit had not begun when the bond was delivered. The court said: "To allow them to avoid liability on their bond upon that ground would be to give judicial sanction to the perpetra-tion of a palpable fraud upon the other party. By the bond, the plaintiffs in that suit obtained the possession of the property. Shall they now be permitted to say: 'We had no replevin suit pending, the sheriff had no right to take the property and deliver it to us, the bond was unauthorized, and we are not bound?' Nor are the sureties in any better position in law to controvert the pendency of the replevin suit. The bond itself shortly recites, or rather assumes, that that action was then pending."

In Bates v. Williams (1867) 43 Ill. 494, an action on a replevin bond, the main objection taken to the declaration was that it did not aver that the justice of the peace, before whom the action of replevin was tried, had jurisdiction of the case. The court held, however, that when it was considered that the obligor himself sought that jurisdiction, and executed the bond in suit in order to avail himself of it, he could not make such an objection, as he was estopped by his own act and admission.

And in Fahnestock v. Gilham (1875) 77 Ill. 637, following the foregoing decision in Bates v. Williams, it was held that the defendants in the action on a replevin bond were estopped from insisting that the justice of the peace had no jurisdiction of the case. They had, the court said, filed an affidavit, obtained the process of the court, had it executed, and executed the bond, all the time claiming and insisting that the court had jurisdiction, and hence, later, when sued on the bond, they could not be heard to say that the process of the court, which they had caused to be issued and served, was without the jurisdiction of the justice.

In Harbaugh v. Albertson (1885) 102 Ind. 69, 1 N. E. 298, an action on a replevin bond, the surety of the plaintiff in the replevin suit claimed in his answer that the replevin bond, executed by him to enable that plaintiff to obtain possession, as by means thereof he did, of the property, was invalid and void, and of no binding force on the surety, because of the relationship of the justice to the parties to the suit, disqualifying the justice from taking and approving the bond. The court held that the surety could not be permitted to avail himself of such a defense to defeat an action on the replevin bond, saying: "In the case at bar, we are of opinion that the appellee is and ought to be estopped, in equity and good conscience, from setting up the facts stated by him in the second paragraph of his answer, in bar of the appellants' action. Having, by his execution of the bond in suit, enabled his codefendant to get possession of, and convert to his own use, the appellants' wheat, the appellee ought not to be permitted to escape liability for the value of such wheat, upon the ground stated in such second paragraph of answer, when the record shows that his co-obligor and principal in such bond had voluntarily submitted his person to the jurisdiction of such justice of the peace. It is well settled that a party may voluntarily submit the jurisdiction of his person to a justice of the peace, who has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit; and that, when this has been done, such party will not be permitted afterwards to controvert the justice's jurisdiction of his person."

In Van Koughnet v. Dennie (1893) 68 Hun, 179, 22 N. Y. Supp. 823, the plaintiff recovered a judgment before a justice of the peace. The answer consisted of a general denial and a plea of a former adjudication of the same subject-matter by another justice of the peace, wherein the husband of the present plaintiff was the plaintiff against the present defendant. That case resulted in an allowance of the portion of the claim then presented by the husband, but it was more than overcome by the counterclaim set forth and proved by the defendant, the result of all which was an affirmative judgment in favor of the defendant against the husband, which was not reversed or disturbed. The court stated that the judgment in the former action, by the husband of the plaintiff against this defendant, was not a former adjudication, technically so-called, because that action was not between the parties to this record or their privies. But it appeared that the plaintiff in the present action was active and mainly instrumental in prosecuting the action brought by her husband, and in establishing the claims therein which were allowed to him by the justice of the peace. At the trial of the present action she testified that she attended the trial of the former action; that she conducted her husband to the justice's office and back again, because he was blind; that she heard plainly all that was said in the room; that she was sworn and gave evidence as a witness; that she knew her husband was going to bring that suit before it was brought; that she went to the justice's office on the return day, took note of the proceedings, and, there being a bill of items demanded by the defendant for certain portions of a claim made in the husband's complaint, the same was actually prepared and made up by this plaintiff herself. She testified that the items for $21 for moneys loaned were, she supposed, the same as those mentioned on the trial of her husband's case, and that the work, for which this action was brought to recover compensation, was the same work which formed the basis of a portion of the complaint in the other action. Under these facts, notwithstanding the formal assertion by her that she did not know and was not informed that her claims made in this action were litigated and determined in the former action, the court held that the plaintiff was conclusively estopped by her acts which procured the judgment in the former case.

In Hess v. Smith (1896) 16 Misc. 55, 37 N. Y. Supp. 635, an action for conversion, the proof showed that the plaintiff had brought suit for the same claim on contract, and had collected a portion of the judgment by default recovered by her therein. In this second action, she sought to avoid the effect of the former judgment on the ground that the person serving the process was not shown by the record to have been authorized to make the service. The court held, however, that, under the rule of law that no person could take advantage of his own wrong, the plaintiff could not show that a judgment which she had herself obtained was void because of fraud or want of jurisdiction over the person.

In Brooks v. Tinsley (1913) 13 Ga. App. 263, 79 S. E. 160, it appeared that a husband and father, and the beneficiaries of a homestead exemption allowed by a judgment of the ordinary under the Constitution of 1877, had been in possession and enjoyment thereof for a period of nineteen years. It was held that the wife and children were estopped from collaterally attacking the validity of the judgment setting apart the homestead, on any merely technical grounds. The court said: "It does not appear that any creditors of the applicant objected to the setting apart of the homestead, or that there were any creditors interested in the matter. The wife, who still is living, had notice of her husband's application for the homestead for her benefit and that of her minor children. She should not now be heard, after nineteen years of possession of this homestead by herself and her family, to complain that the original proceedings, setting it apart for her and her children, were void. If her husband were in life, after having acquired the homestead for himself and family and after having enjoyed the benefit of the homestead which he had asked the ordinary to set apart, he certainly could not be heard to attack its validity; and if he would be estopped, it would seem that his wife, who was privy with him in the application, should likewise be estopped."

In Lowe v. Equitable Mortg. Co. (1897) 102 Ga. 103, 29 S. E. 148, the question was whether minors could attack collaterally a judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, in an action brought in their name by one purporting to be their next friend, there being nothing on the face of the record suggesting fraud or want of good faith, or that the action was instituted by the plaintiff therein without authority, or with any intention other than a bona fide purpose to protect the interest of the minors. The court held that, the judgment being apparently regular and legal, and the attack merely collateral, to allow it to prevail under such circumstances might result in great injustice to third persons, who had in good faith acquired rights under and by virtue of the original judgment.

In Roberts v. Hill (1894) 137 Ind. 215, 36 N. E. 843, the trustees of a Masonic lodge sued the defendant for the reformation of a deed and to quiet the title to certain real estate. In his answer, the defendant pleaded a former recovery by the plaintiffs, in a cause prosecuted to final judgment by them for the reformation of the same deed and to quiet title to the same real estate. To this answer, the plaintiff trustees replied that the former action was prosecuted by them without authority, "by reason of the fact that their certificate of election as such trustees had not been recorded in the recorder's office of the county where the real estate was situated," as required by the statute [Rev. Stat. 1894, § 5019 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 3819)]. The court held that the plaintiff trustees were estopped from thus collaterally attacking the former judgment, as their acts were, at least, those of officers de facto, if not de jure.

In Heffron v. Cunningham (1890) 76 Tex. 312, 18 S. W. 259, a person in whose favor a judgment had been rendered claimed that the suit was brought without his knowledge or consent by an attorney. The court held that, the decree having been rendered in his favor, so long as he permitted it to stand and took no steps to set it aside, he could not be heard, in a collateral action, to deny that it was prosecuted for him and by counsel employed by him, or that the court did not have jurisdiction over the parties or the subject-matter.

The general rule that a person procuring a judgment may not attack it collaterally, has been frequently applied in actions for divorce, where the decree was obtained in one state and afterwards attacked in another.

In Bledsoe v. Seaman (1908) 77 Kan. 679, 95 Pac. 576, an action to recover damages for the alienation of the affection of the plaintiff's husband, it appeared from the averments of the pleadings that the husband commenced an action in another state to obtain a divorce. The wife appeared in that action, and filed an answer and cross petition, in which she asked for a divorce, for the custody of their infant child, and for alimony. The prayer of the cross petition was granted, and she obtained the decree requested. This decree was entered more than seven years before the present action, and the plaintiff had, since its entry, retained the possession and control of the child. The judgment for alimony still stood in her favor. The court held that the plaintiff could not attack this judgment on the ground of want of jurisdiction of the parties, by reason of the lack of the required residence in the state granting the divorce, on the theory that one who had invoked the action of the court, and, through negligence or falsehood, had misled it as to the existence of the facts on which its jurisdiction depended, would not afterwards be heard to deny the validity of the judgment obtained, granting the desired relief. While the rule applied in this case, the court stated, did not rest on the doctrine of estoppel as that term was ordinarily understood, yet there were some facts present which indicated that an ordinary estoppel might be applied. The plaintiff complaining of the defendant for having alienated the affections of her husband, when the divorce was procured by the plaintiff, the defendant, having knowledge thereof, had, the court held, a right to assume that the plaintiff no longer had, or claimed, any right to the affections or society of her former husband, and that any relations which she might assume with him thereafter would not in any way infringe on the rights of the plaintiff. The conduct of the plaintiff in this respect, the court held, was almost tantamount to an express withdrawal of objection to the illicit relations existing between the defendant and the plaintiff's husband at the time of the divorce. But for the decree, the court stated, these relations might have ceased; by it, they were probably encouraged.

In Elliott v. Wohlfrom (1880) 55 Cal. 384, an action of ejectment, the defendant claimed title under a deed by a wife, and the plaintiff claimed under a title deraigned from her former husband. Some year prior to the dates of those deeds, the husband filed a complaint for a divorce against his wife in another state, in which the latter appeared by her attorney and answered the complaint, and a divorce was granted to the husband. It was proved that the attorney who appeared for the wife in the suit for divorce had no authority from her so to appear, and that in fact she had no knowledge of the proceedings. The court held that the judgment of divorce was voidable at most, and stated that it knew of no principle on which the plaintiff in that action could be permitted to impeach the judgment rendered in it, for the purpose of recovering property from the defendant in that action, which he could recover on no other ground than that he had obtained the judgment by fraud. The court stated that the maxim of the law was that "no man should take advantage of his own wrong," and that, while fraud rendered any transaction voidable at the election of the party defrauded, the party by whom the fraud was perpetrated had not that election. Hence, the court held that neither the former husband, nor the grantee, could attack and avoid the divorce judgment in a collateral action.

In the case of Re Ellis (1893) 55 Minn. 401, 23 L.R.A. 287, 43 Am. St. Rep. 514, 56 N. W. 1056, an appeal from an order appointing a second wife administratrix of the husband's estate, the first wife offered to prove, in order to impeach and avoid a judgment of divorce obtained by her from the intestate in another state, that she was compelled to bring the action by the intestate's conduct towards her. She offered to prove that during the period of two years he abandoned her at different times, at first for a week at a time, gradually lengthening the periods of absence until they became three months at a time, leaving her unprovided with the necessaries of life, and threatening, whenever he returned, that he would continue that course of conduct unless she consented to bring the action, and that unless she so consented he would run away, and leave her without a penny; and also to prove other acts of his of a similar character, all of which had such effect on her that she was not a free agent in bringing the action. The court stated that it would not undertake to say whether at any time, and especially whether after she had received and enjoyed the fruits of the action, and had acquiesced for years, until the defendant had married again, and had died, and there was left solely the matter of distributing his property, a woman plaintiff could, because of such facts, obtain any relief in the same action; but held that it certainly would be no ground for assailing the divorce judgment in a collateral proceeding at any time. The court also held that it was proper to exclude evidence of the first wife that, at the time she brought the action for divorce in the other state against the intestate, neither party was a resident of that state. The court said: "It may seem anomalous that a judgment of divorce can be so far effectual between the parties as to extinguish all rights of property dependent on the marriage relation, without being effectual to protect them from accountability to the state for their subsequent acts. One reason why they ought not to be permitted, by going into another state and procuring a divorce, to escape accountability to the laws of their state, is that their act is a fraud upon the state, and an attempt to evade its laws, to which it in no wise consents, and it may therefore complain. But the parties do consent, and why should they be heard to complain of the consequences to them of what they have done? Why should they be permitted to escape those consequences by saying: 'It is true that by false oath made by one of us, and connived at by the other, we committed a fraud in the Wisconsin court, and induced it to take cognizance of the case; but now we ask to avoid its judgment, by proof of our fraud and perjury, or subornation of perjury.' Because we do not think it can be done the parties must, so far as their individual interests are concerned, abide by the judgment they procured that court to render; and, of course, what will bind them will bind those who claim through them, or either of them."

In the case of Re Morrison (1889) 52 Hun, 102, 5 N. Y. Supp. 90, affirmed in (1889) 117 N. Y. 638, 22 N. E. 1130, it appeared that a husband, who had always regarded himself as a resident of another state, procured a divorce therein from his wife, without any intent to evade the laws of the state wherein he was then living, or of avoiding giving notice to the defendant of the proceeding. It was held that the husband could not be heard to claim the nullity of this decree, he having invoked the jurisdiction of the court, and asked its rendition, and that the administrators of his estate occupied precisely the same position the husband would have occupied, had he been living.

In Starbuck v. Starbuck (1903) 173 N. Y. 503, 93 Am. St. Rep. 631, 66 N. E. 193, reversing (1901) 62 App. Div. 437, 71 N. Y. Supp. 104, an action for dower, the defendants offered in evidence an exemplified record of a decree of divorce, obtained by the plaintiff from her husband in another state. This decree was excluded from evidence, on the objection of the plaintiff. The court held that the decree should have been received in evidence, saying that while the plaintiff could not avail herself of a void decree, which she had procured to be entered, the defendants had the right to avail themselves of it, on the principle that, where a party had procured a judgment or decree to be entered, submitting himself to the jurisdiction of the court, he cannot thereafter be heard to question the jurisdiction of the court which entered the judgment or decree.

affirmed in (1902) 172 N. Y. 651, 65 N. E. 1122, it appeared that the plaintiff invoked the jurisdiction of the court of another state to free herself from all marital relations with the decedent, and that, having accomplished her object, she returned to the original state, and married another man, to whom she bore a child. On her application for letters of administration on her former husband's estate, she attempted to call in question the jurisdiction of the court which had granted the divorce decree. The court said that while it probably was not technically correct to assert that the plaintiff's acts constituted an estoppel, within the ordinary acceptation of that term, for the reason that they were not designed to, and did not, influence the husband to do anything which he would not otherwise have done, yet a somewhat similar principle was applicable, which was that where a party had invoked the jurisdiction of any court, and submitted himself thereto, he could not thereafter be heard to question that jurisdiction.

In People ex rel. Shradly v. Shradly (1905) 47 Misc. 333, 95 N. Y. Supp. 991, it appeared that the defendant had gone to another state and instituted divorce proceedings against his then wife. On obtaining a decree of absolute divorce, he returned to the original state and married another woman, the complainant in a subsequent proceeding against him for nonsupport. In that proceeding, it was held that he could not contend that the divorce which he himself had obtained in the other state was null and void for the reason that the court of that state had no jurisdiction of the parties.

In Buxbaum v. Mason (1905) 48 Misc. 396, 95 N. Y. Supp. 539, an action against a husband for the value of goods furnished his wife while he was separated from her, it was held that, the assumed wife having obtained a decree of divorce in an action brought by her against the defendant in another state, this decree fixed her status, and she could not assert the contrary, notwithstanding the defendant might have been in a position to assail the decree for lack of jurisdiction as to him. To meet this situation, the plaintiff offered in evidence a decree of the same court, made seven years later, setting aside the decree of divorce on the wife's application and on the defendant's default. The court held, however, that the papers did not alter the wife's status, but, at best, established the fact that the one-time wife had asserted elsewhere that which she would not be permitted to assert for her own benefit before a court in the original state,—that the decree of divorce which she had obtained was invalid.

In Lacey v. Lacey (1902) 88 Misc. 196, 77 N. Y. Supp. 285, an action for divorce, it was held that the plaintiff, having invoked the jurisdiction of another court, should not, in all equity and good conscience, be permitted to attack the authority of the decree which her own acts induced that court to grant her.

In Simmonds v. Simmonds (1912) 78 Misc. 571, 188 N. Y. Supp. 689, an action for divorce, it appeared that the plaintiff, while living in another state, retained an attorney there to procure a limited divorce. He procured an absolute divorce, the decree declaring the plaintiff to be "divorced from the bonds of matrimony." The defendant married another woman, with whom he was living at the time of the trial. The court held that, having invoked the jurisdiction of the court of another state, and obtained a judgment of divorce in that court, the plaintiff could not now be heard to question its jurisdiction.

In Yoke v. Platt (1905) 48 Misc. 273, 96 N. Y. Supp. 725, it appeared that the plaintiff, having obtained a judgment of separation from her husband, removed to another state. She there secured a decree of absolute divorce from him on his default, the judgment rendered dissolving the marriage, and releasing and discharging the parties "from all the rights and privileges, duties and obligations, of said marriage contract and relations as fully and completely as if the same had never existed." The plaintiff then remarried. On the death of her former husband, the plaintiff brought an action to recover her dower in real estate, of which the husband was seised at the time of the marriage with the plaintiff and prior to the date of the divorce, claiming to be his widow. The court held that the validity of the divorce judgment could not be questioned by the plaintiff, as she, at least, was bound by it. The court stated that it placed its decision on the ground that a woman who obtained in a foreign state a judgment of divorce a vinculo against her husband, who was a resident of the original state, on a ground not sufficient to justify such a divorce in that state, could not, after the death of the husband, claim dower in his real estate there situated.

In the reported case (LAIRD v. STATE, ante, 522), a prosecution for perjury, the divorced wife of the defendant was introduced as a witness against him. He contended that the divorce which was procured by him was absolutely void, as he had not been in the state the required length of time, and, being void, the woman from whom he was adjudged a divorce in that decree was still his legal wife. The court holds that the judgment of divorce could not be collaterally attacked by the defendant, the only way to nullify it being by a direct suit for that purpose.

In Asbury v. Powers (1901) 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1622, 65 S. W. 605, an action to settle an estate, it was alleged that the wife of the intestate employed counsel to bring suit for maintenance against her husband; that the attorney, without her knowledge or consent, instituted the suit in another county than that in which she and her husband resided, and sought a decree of divorce from bed and board, and alimony; and that afterwards, without her knowledge or consent, an amended petition was filed seeking an absolute divorce from the husband, which was granted against her desire, on default of answer and in the absence of proof. The court held that the wife was estopped to question the judgment and decree of the court after the lapse of more than twenty-five years, since it was obtained at her instance.

661, an action for dower, the answer pleaded a judgment of divorce obtained by the plaintiff from the defendant, by which, in pursuance of an agreement made between the husband and wife with respect to her alimony, it was ordered and decreed that the plaintiff should execute to her husband a quitclaim deed, releasing her dower in all the real estate which was then or might thereafter be owned by the husband; and in default of such conveyance the decree should so operate. The plaintiff's reply admitted the decree and the payment of the alimony thereunder, but alleged that that part of the decree which related to the release of her dower was void for want of jurisdiction, and was entered without her knowledge or consent. The court held that she could not, in a collateral proceeding, be released from the obligations of the judgment, on the plea that she was ignorant of its provisions as entered of record, or that her attorney was without authority to have it so entered.

In Ellis v. White (1888) 61 Iowa, 644, 17 N. W. 28, an action to partition lands, the plaintiff claiming a dower interest therein, the defendants alleged that the plaintiff had prosecuted against her husband a proceeding for a divorce and alimony, wherein a decree of divorce was had, and alimony was allowed to the plaintiff. It was shown that the amount allowed as alimony was paid by the husband to the attorney for the plaintiff who prosecuted the action, and that she had had full notice of all the proceedings, and had received the money allowed her. The plaintiff, in reply, alleged that the divorce proceedings were prosecuted without her knowledge, and that she never authorized the attorney appearing for her in the action to institute and prosecute it; and denied the receipt of any sum as alimony. She pleaded that the proceedings were void for want of jurisdiction of the court in which they were prosecuted. The court held that, without deciding whether the divorce court had had jurisdiction, the plaintiff was estopped to insist on the want of jurisdiction in that court.

In McLeod v. McLeod (1915) 144 Ga. 359, 87 S. E. 286, it appeared that a married man was convicted of a felony and sent to the penitentiary. While he was there, his wife brought a suit for divorce against him. The entry of service by the sheriff stated that the defendant was not to be found in the county, but was said to be in the penitentiary, and that the sheriff had left a copy at the residence of the defendant's wife in a named city. An absolute divorce was granted. After being discharged from the penitentiary, the defendant married another woman and later died, never having attacked the decree. The court stated that, under these circumstances, the divorce would not be declared void at the instance of his son by his first wife, on a collateral attack, in a contest over the grant of letters on his estate, on the ground that the service and all subsequent proceedings were void.

In Miltimore v. Miltimore (1861) 40 Pa. 151, an action for dower, the plaintiff alleged a judgment of divorce procured by her to have been void, because she herself caused and procured the subpoena to be issued in vacation and twelve days before the ensuing term, whereas the statute required the interval to have been at least thirty days. It was held that the decree, being voidable only, could only be reversed for error by a direct proceeding, and not collaterally.

But in Holmes v. Holmes (1870) 4 Lans. (N. Y.) 388, reversing (1871) 57 Barb. 305, an action for divorce a vinculo matrimonii, the plaintiff demurred to the defendant's answer, wherein she alleged that the plaintiff, claiming to be a resident of another state, instituted proceedings for and obtained a decree of divorce from her, personal service of due notice of such proceedings having been made on her in the state of their domicile. The court held that the personal service of notice, out of the state wherein the proceedings were brought, was a nullity, that the judgment of divorce was void, and hence that the plaintiff was not estopped from denying the validity of the divorce obtained by him.

And in People v. Chase (1882) 27 Hun (N. Y.) 256, the New York rule against the recognition of a divorce granted in another state upon constructive service of process, without appearance, against a resident of New York, was applied, in a prosecution for bigamy, to a decree of divorce obtained by the defendant prior to the first marriage charged in the indictment; with the result that the conviction was reversed. There was, however, no discussion of the right of the defendant to impeach collaterally a decree which he had himself obtained.

In Williams v. Williams (1885) 63 Wis. 58, 53 Am. Rep. 253, 23 N. W. 110, an action for dower, the plaintiff claimed to be the widow of one Williams. It appeared that six months after her marriage with Williams the plaintiff brought an action against one Jones, who had previously married her, for a divorce on the ground of desertion, and obtained a judgment therein. It was urged that she was thereby estopped from maintaining that she was never the lawful wife of Jones, or that she was ever the lawful wife of Williams. The court held that the marriage between the plaintiff and Jones was absolutely void ab initio, without any judgment of divorce or other legal proceeding, by reason of his incapacity to contract a valid marriage, as he had a former wife living at the time; and hence that the marriage between the plaintiff and Williams was valid and binding. This being the case, the court held that the plaintiff was not estopped by the subsequent judgment of divorce, from showing by facts de hors the divorce record that she was never the lawful wife of Jones, but was the lawful wife of Williams.

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Androscoggin County for the opinion of the full bench in an action brought to recover commissions for the alleged sale of real estate. Judgment for defendant Ella J. Blanchard.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. McGillicuddy & Morey for plaintiff.

Messrs. E. E. Richards, Frank W. Butler, and W. H. Judkins, for defendant Ella J. Blanchard:

Plaintiff is not entitled to any commission until he produces a party able, ready, and willing to purchase, and a sale is actually completed, or a binding contract entered into. The broker must bring the minds of the seller and purchaser together in a sale or contract for a sale; until that is done his right to compensation does not accrue.

Rep. 441; Kingsley v. Kressly, 60 Or. 167, 111 Pac. 385, 118 Pac. 678, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 746; Friendly v. Elwert, 57 Or. 599, 105 Pac. 404, 111 Pac. 690, 112 Pac. 1085, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 357; Coleman v. Applegarth, 68 Md. 21, 6 Am. St. Rep. 417, 11 Atl. 284; Tilton v. Sterling Coal & Coke Co. 28 Utah, 173, 107 Am. St. Rep. 689, 77 Pac. 758; Agar v. Streeter, 183 Mich. 600, L.R.A.1915C, 196, 150 N. W. 160, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 518; Pollock v. Brookover, 60 W. Va. 83, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 403, 53 S. E. 795; Pom. Spec. Perf. § 387; Mier v. Hadden, 148 Mich. 488, 118 Am. St. Rep. 586, 111 N. W. 1040, 12 Ann. Cas. 88.

The contract between the parties amounted simply to an option to be accepted on or before August 1, 1916.

Ide v. Leiser, 10 Mont. 5, 24 Am. St. Rep. 18, 24 Pac. 695; Wardell v. Williams, 62 Mich. 50, 4 Am. St. Rep. 814, 28 N. W. 796; Maynard v. Tabor, 53 Me. 511.

There was and could be no sale or legal contract for a sale whereby the plaintiff had earned his commission, until the offer to sell for cash had been accepted, either by a tender of the amount in cash or a written acceptance on which an action could be maintained.

Potts v. Whitehead, 23 N. J. Eq. 512; Stembridge v. Stembridge, 87 Ky. 91, 7 S. W. 611.

Where an option has been given on land which has not been converted into a binding contract of sale by acceptance in accordance with its terms, specific performance cannot be maintained.

Stembridge v. Stembridge, supra; Pollock v. Brookover, 60 W. Va. 75, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 403, 53 S. E. 795.

Although an option to purchase is not, strictly speaking, a contract of sale, because it is an executory unilateral agreement, yet an option is a contract by which the owner of property agrees with another that he shall have the right to buy the property at a fixed price within a certain time designated; in such case, time is always of the essence of the contract.

Spear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for the recovery of commissions for the alleged sale of real estate and comes up on report. Oramandal Blanchard makes no defense. But Ella J. Blanchard defends upon the ground that the plaintiff did not make a sale or procure a purchaser, in accordance with his contract of brokerage. The first contract between the plaintiff and defendants was of the following tenor:

Stratton, Me., March 28, 1916.

In consideration of ($10) ten dollars we, Mrs. Blanchard and Mr. O. Blanchard, give William Hanscom an option until July 1, 1916, on our land, known as the Hedgehog land and Bemis land, at ($10) ten dollars per acre, as the deeds call for about 2,270 acres, with all buildings thereon, and agree to go show the lines and timber to any customer he gets. We agree to pay Wm. Hanscom as a commission whatever he furnishes a customer for over the said $10.

She contends this was not a contract for commission, but an option to buy. Construing this instrument with reference to all its phraseology, although it is somewhat mixed and inconsistent in its language, we are of the opinion that it for a commission on a sale above $10 per acre. The language, "to any customer he gets," and to pay "as a commission whatever he furnishes a customer for over the said $10," seems to quite clearly indicate that the defendant understood that the plaintiff was to realize his commission from a sale to another, and not from a purchase by himself, under the word "option" as used in the first part of the instrument. The subsequent action of the parties also goes to show that this was their understanding, since the defendants, by virtue of parties being introduced under this agreement, did proceed to make an option to the parties thus produced.

Without question, the plaintiff by virtue of the above instrument brought parties to the defendants who were desirous of purchasing the tracts of land described therein and with these parties the defendants themselves made a contract for a disposal of the lands described. The interpretation of this new instrument determines the rights of the parties in this case. If it was a contract of sale, by which the parties were mutually bound, then the plaintiff would be entitled to his commission. Veazie v. Parker, 72 Me. 443. It was the duty, however, of <sup>—right to commission.</sup> the broker in the first instance to procure a purchaser who was ready and willing to meet the exact terms of his contract to make a sale. Even an offer of better terms will not suffice. 4 R. C. L. 313, § 52. But if a broker <sup>—change in terms of contract—effect.</sup> introduces parties with whom the seller makes a different contract, resulting in a sale, he is entitled to his commission. Veazie v. Parker, supra; Ward v. Cobb, 148 Mass. 518, 12 Am. St. Rep. 587, 20 N. E. 174; Roche v. Smith, 176 Mass. 595, 51 L.R.A. 510, 79 Am. St. Rep. 345, 58 N. E. 152; Johnson v. Holland, 211 Mass. 363, 97 N. E. 755; 4 R. C. L. 413, § 52. See also exhaustive note to Hoadley v. Savings Bank, 44 L.R.A. 321.

The present case, however, does not fall within either of the above rules entitling a broker to his commission. The contract between the parties to the alleged sale, upon which the plaintiff claims his commission, was not one by which the parties were mutually bound; it was unilateral. The vendor alone was bound. The character of this contract appears from an observation of its terms. It describes the parties, the tracts of land to be conveyed, the terms of payment, the price per acre, the time of performance, and the consideration which is to be allowed as an initial payment upon the consummation of the contract. The concluding paragraph of this instrument is as follows: "In the event that the party of the second part shall fail to fulfil the agreements herein entered into, then the sum of $1,000 already acknowledged as paid shall be forfeited to the party of the first part."

This clause, read in connection with the rest of the contract, clearly confines the contract to the exercise of an option on the part of the vendees. For definition, see "Option," 6 Words & Phrases; 3 Words & Phrases, 2d ed.

An agreement in writing to give a person the option to purchase lands within a given time, at a named price, is neither a sale nor an agreement to sell. It is simply a contract by which the owner of property agrees with another person that he shall have the right to buy his property at a fixed price at a given time. The rights of a broker in case of an option granted by his principal to a would-be purchaser are well stated in 4 R. C. L. 315, § 53:

"Where a broker is engaged to negotiate a transfer or sale of certain real or personal property, the mere procurement of a prospective purchaser, who enters into an option to buy the property in question, but never in fact does so, is not sufficient to constitute a performance by the broker of his contract of employment, and he is not entitled to his commissions, nor even to a percentage of the earnest money deposited by the defaulting optionee. The fact that the employer consents to entering into a conditional or optional contract to purchase cannot be construed as a waiver by him of the original terms of employment, and an acceptance of such services as a complete performance on the part of the broker. It is a matter of common knowledge that sales are frequently effected through options. By granting the option, the owner is merely helping to bring about the sale which he employed the broker to make. It is a step in that direction. It is not the end, but rather the means to an end. Consequently such action on the part of the owner does not imply that he has made a new contract with the broker, by which he agrees to pay for something different from the services he originally contracted for, but merely indicates a desire upon his part to aid the broker in the performance of the original agreement."

It is, therefore, evident as a matter of law that an optional contract to purchase land is not a compliance with a broker's contract to sell land. A broker has not found a purchaser, so as to be entitled to compensation, until the option has been exercised and the contract completed.

There is no claim that the option in the present case has been completed by a sale of the property in accordance with its terms. But the fact that an option for the purchase of real estate has not been exercised does not, per se, conclude the broker. It is well settled that if the optionee is ready and willing to exercise the option, but is prevented by the refusal of the owner to comply with the terms of the agreement, the broker is then entitled to his compensation. The rule is stated in 4 R. C. L. 315, § 53, as follows: "While, as above shown, according to the great weight of authority the mere procuring of one to take an option does not entitle the broker to commissions if the optionee elects not to exercise the same, yet it is apparently well settled that the broker is entitled to his commissions if the option is actually exercised, or the optionee is willing to exercise it, but is prevented from so doing by the refusal of the —election to exercise option.

See also 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 94, note.

This brings us to the one question of fact involved in the case: Who was in fault in refusing to abide by the terms of the option? It is not our purpose to discuss the evidence in detail, as it is so fragmentary as to just what the optionees were able to do after getting the option as to practically preclude such discussion. In the first place, it is apparent that the optionees were not able to finance the proposed purchase. They were evidently trying to find someone whom they could induce to finance it for them. But the evidence fails to show that anyone appeared who was ready or offered to comply with the terms of the option. But in order to hold the option this must be done. It is as much incumbent upon an optionee to comply with the terms of his option as upon a direct contractee in an agreement of sale to comply with the terms of his agreement. And we have before seen that such compliance is minutely required. 4 R. C. L. 315, § 52, supra. The option provided that "on or before the 1st day of August, 1916, the parties agree to meet at Farmington," where they were to carry the agreement into effect. Nothing was done at this time. The optionees did not appear. On the 31st day of July, one of them, Mr. Mason, met the defendant on her way to Farmington and said to her:

I have been unable to raise this money, but I have a new proposition, which is a cash deal. I have an explorer by the name of Mr. West with me, and I have some bankers that are interested, and upon the report of Mr. West, if his report is favorable, I can put in the money for the whole tract, and I would like a little more time.

Q. What answer did you give him?

A. I told him that I was on my way to Farmington to carry out my part of this agreement, and in event this deal didn't go through and he wanted—no, I asked how much time that he wanted. He stated: "Let me see. It will take two or three days to explore the land, a day to return to Lewiston, a day to make my report," he says, "Mrs. Blanchard, one week is sufficient."

She gave Mr. Mason one week.

That is an entirely new contract, proposed by the optionee, Mr. Mason, and relieved the defendant from the charge of any default in not being present at Farmington on the 1st day of August, to carry out the terms of the option. This option, declared on in the plaintiff's writ, and upon which he relies as the contract of the parties procured by him, became invalid after August 1st, both by lapse of the time and by the substitution of a new contract. But the new contract was to run a week, and nothing being done within this time, all the contractual relations of the optionee and the defendant early in August came to an end. The evidence of Mrs. Blanchard is fully corroborated by Mr. John C. West, the very party referred to by Mr. Mason in the conversation above testified to by Mrs. Blanchard. Mr. West had been approached by Mason and O'Brien to finance this proposed purchase. He accordingly in September had an interview with Mrs. Blanchard in regard to the matter, which on direct examination he recites as follows:

—default—failure to be at designated place.

Q. What did she say to you at this time that you had this conversation with her?

A. I talked with her about financing the deal and taking it up on a cash basis. I had parties that had the money, and had a proposition to finance it, to take up the whole tract, as well as other tracts there that we have under consideration. And I explained it to her, and she said that—well, she didn't know but she would look at it favorably, but she wanted to consult someone; and I told her that I wanted her to. I says, "It means a cash deal, if I can have the deeds in a certain way." I explained it.

He saw her again the next day. In answer to the question, "What did she say then?" he testified:

A. She said that she couldn't consider it; it was only a drag-out, or something like that, and it was all off; and I told her under those circumstances I wasn't going to say any more about it—probably the other parties would have something to say, but as far as I was concerned, I should stop.

Neither the testimony of Mrs. Blanchard nor Mr. West is in any way contradicted or modified. It is accordingly clear that the optionees were never prepared to comply with the terms of their option. Nor did they furnish anyone who was. They were working upon an entirely new scheme of trading upon a cash basis, to which the defendant was willing to accede, and gave an option, on a cash basis, for a week. It accordingly results that the optionees, in their agreement of July 5th, failed to comply with its terms, and that their option was lost by their own fault, and not the fault of the defendant Ella J. Blanchard.

Judgment for defendant Ella J. Blanchard.

NOTE.

The question as to when an instrument for the purchase of land may be regarded as a contract of sale, and when as a mere option, is discussed in annotation beginning on page 576, in which it is pointed out, that while, as in the reported case (HANSCOM v. BLANCHARD, ante, 545), contracts have been held to be mere options on the ground that they did not bind the second party to purchase, the fact that a contract does not formally bind such party to make payment is not conclusive of its character, and that where it is held, as a matter of construction, to bind him to complete the purchase, it is more than an option.

D. C. STELSON, Plff. in Err.,

v.

ARTHUR W. HAIGLER, Doing Business under the Firm Name and Style of Haigler Realty Company.

(— Colo. —, 165 Pac. 265.)

Option — contract — purchase or option.

1. An option and not a contract to purchase is effected by an agreement to sell real estate for payments to be made at specified times and providing for forfeiture of money paid upon failure to make payment, where the purchaser does not agree to purchase, to make payment, or to bind himself in any way other than the forfeiture of payments made.

Broker — commission — willingness to purchase.

2. Readiness and willingness to make the first payment on a contract to purchase real estate is not sufficient to entitle a broker to a commission which is to be paid out of the first payment if it is not paid or tendered.

Vendor and purchaser — failure to make payment — excuse.

3. One having an option to purchase real estate is not justified in refusing to make the first payment because of defects in the abstract of title, if the contract gave a reasonable time to cure such defects and they were cured within such time.

Option — effect.

4. An option gives the right to purchase within a limited time without imposing any obligation to purchase.

[See 6 R. C. L. 603.]

Broker — option contract — right to commission.

5. One employed to sell real estate or find a purchaser for it does not earn his commission by procuring a mere option contract.

ERROR to the District Court for El Paso County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover an amount alleged to be due as a real estate broker's commission. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. R. L. Chambers and Robert Kerr, for plaintiff in error:

The understanding and intention of the parties was that the contract was an option, and if there were any doubt, this intention must control.

Scott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action is by the Haigler Realty Company to recover from Stelson the sum of $5,000, alleged to be due as a real estate broker's commission for the sale of Stelson's ranch. The commission is claimed both under a written contract and as the value of the services rendered. The record discloses that Stelson gave the Haigler Realty Company a written agreement, which both agree was intended as a contract of employment to sell the ranch to Stelson. Later the Haigler Realty Company presented R. F. Kloeke, a real estate broker of Omaha, Nebraska, who received from Stelson the following memorandum of agreement, omitting so much thereof as is immaterial in this proceeding:

"The party of the first part sells and agrees to convey to the party of the second part by warranty deed and abstract brought down to date of transfer, the same to show marketable title, the following described lands and water rights: [Here follows description.]

"The full purchase price for the above-described lands and water rights being $131,000, to be paid as follows: One thousand dollars to be placed in escrow with the Exchange National Bank of Colorado Springs, to be turned over to the party of the first part upon the finding of marketable titles by party of the second part; $30,000 on or before December 1, 1912; $100,000 March 1, 1918, the same to be evidenced by promissory note bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, to be secured by first mortgage covering the aforesaid lands and water rights.

"Tenth. That he will execute warranty deed showing marketable titles free and clear of all liens and encumbrances as above set forth covering the above-described land, conveying the said lands and water rights to the party of the second part, his heirs or assigns, or to anyone whom said party of the second part may direct upon the payment of the said $30,000 and the execution of note and mortgage as above set forth, the same to be paid and executed on or before December 1, 1912.

"It is further agreed between the parties hereto that should there be any defects in the title covering above-described lands and water rights that the party of the second part gives the party of the first part reasonable time through the courts to have such defects set aright.

"It is mutually agreed that the time of payment shall be an essential part of this contract, and in case of failure of the said party of the second part to make either of the payments above mentioned this contract shall be forfeited and determined, at the election of the said party of the first part, and the said party of the second part shall forfeit all payments made on this contract, as liquidation of all damages to party of the first part.

"Colo. Springs, Colo., Sept. 2, 1912.

"Received of R. F. Kloke, Omaha, Neb.—$1,000 to apply as part payment on the land mentioned in contract between myself and R. F. Kloke, copy of which is attached hereto.

"Should the said R. F. Kloke not find the abstracts covering the lands and water rights marketable as mentioned in the said contract, I do hereby agree to return to said R. F. Kloke the $1,000 paid to me on this date; and said $1,000 being paid to me in lieu of the $1,000 which is to be placed in escrow in the Exchange National Bank, Colorado Springs, Colorado, as recited in said contract.

"[Signed] D. C. Stelson."

Haigler testifies that the receipt above set forth was a modification of the preceding agreement. Verdict and judgment were rendered against the plaintiff in error in the full sum of $5,000.

It is contended by the defendant that the agreement between Stelson and Kloke was a mere option, and not an agreement of sale and purchase; that the option did not ripen into a sale, and therefore the plaintiff did not produce a purchaser ready, able and willing to purchase the lands, and for such reason is not entitled to a commission. The contention of the plaintiff is that the agreement was an absolute contract of purchase and sale.

There were no further payments made by Kloke, nor was there any tender of payment. It is true that Kloke testified that he was ready and willing to make the first payment at the time it became due, but if this be true, it was not sufficient, in view of the fact that he did not make the payment nor offer to do so.

commission—willingness to purchase.

He further says that he came to Colorado Springs and saw Haigler and told him that he was ready to pay, but he did not see Stelson, nor seek to see him, and immediately returned to Omaha.

We said in Bailey v. Lay, 18 Colo. 405, 33 Pac. 407: "The averment that Cummings and Olcott and the Iron Mask Company were ready and willing to accept the premises and make payment is not equivalent to an averment of payment or of an offer to pay. In a case of this kind, when the time for payment has actually arrived, mere readiness and willingness to pay are immaterial; such readiness and willingness, without more, will not discharge contract obligations. An averment of readiness and willingness to pay presents nothing tangible or substantial; it involves little more than the state of mind of the party presenting the plea; and the determination of an issue taken thereon would not decide the rights of the parties. On the other hand, an averment of payment or of an offer to pay is an averment of an overt act, an important and substantial fact; and the determination of an issue taken thereon would, subject to other issues in the case, be decisive of the controversy."

Kloke was a real estate broker, and it is plain from the record that he did not intend to make a purchase of the premises, but rather to secure an option that he might have opportunity to sell the lands. It is also made clear that Kloke did not come to Colorado Springs on December 2, 1912, for the purpose of making the payment, or any tender of the same. This appears from a night-letter telegram from Haigler to Kloke sent on the evening of November 29th, with but one intervening day before time for payment. This telegram was as follows:

To R. F. Kloke, Omaha National Bank Bldg., Omaha, Neb.

Letter received. Stelson demands $1,000 for extension of contract for twenty days to apply on purchase price, but according to terms of contract we think if you get abstracts here with your requirements on title by December 2d that it would continue in force until he furnished marketable title therefor. Do not fail to get abstracts here with your requirements by December 2d. Answer.

Kloke appears to have come to Colorado Springs in response to this telegram, bringing the abstracts with him, and returned to Omaha without even advising Stelson of his presence. It is palpable that the purpose was to secure time, and not to make either payment or tender. The plaintiff's agreement specifically recites: "The title is to be marketable and good and sufficient warranty deed to be executed and delivered by the said D. C. Stelson to the Haigler Realty Company, their heirs or assigns, on or before the 1st day of December, 1912, together with abstract showing marketable title, provided the $1,000 is tendered or paid on or before the 3d day of September, 1912, and $30,000 is tendered or paid on or before the 1st day of December, 1912. If the said payment as above mentioned is not paid or tendered on or before the dates mentioned above, then this contract is to be void and of no effect, and both parties are released from all obligations therein, and in that event the said $1 paid on this date is to be held by D. C. Stelson as liquidated damages."

And: "If sale is made as above stated, I agree to pay Geo. W. Morse $1,000 and the Haigler Realty Company $5,000 out of the $30,000 payment above mentioned."

It will be seen from this that the $30,000 payment must be either tendered or paid on or before the 1st day of December, 1912, and that such tender or payment was a condition precedent to the execution of the deed and its delivery with the abstracts, and that, if not so tendered or paid, the agreement was to be void, and both parties to stand released therefrom; again, that the compensation to the Haigler Realty Company in any event was to be made from the first or $30,000 payment.

It is agreed that this sum was not paid nor tendered, nor any part thereof, as stipulated, nor at all. It is clear, therefore, that unless such first payment or tender was excused, or made unnecessary by the acts and conduct of Stelson, the plaintiff cannot recover; for this was the result which the Haigler Company agreed to produce in consideration of the commission. But, independent of this express provision, it was the duty of Kloke to make the first payment provided in his agreement. It was held in the case of Bailey v. Lay, supra, that:

"The gravamen of the complaint is that defendants Lay, Mallory, and Brown refused to make and deliver a deed of conveyance of their certain mining property to the Iron Mask Mining & Smelting Company, as by said agreement in writing they had contracted to do. According to the terms of the written agreement, the defendants were to deliver the deed to the mining property at the time of the first payment of $250,000. . . .

"The agreement in regard to the first payment and the agreement to deliver the deed were to be performed at the same time; they were mutual and dependent agreements; and performance or an offer to perform in respect to first payment was necessary to make it incumbent upon the defendants to deliver the deed. Englander v. Rogers, 41 Cal. 420; Bakeman v. Pooler, 15 Wend. 637; 2 Parsons, Contr. 528; Chitty, Contr. 11th ed. 1082."

The record does not disclose that Stelson at any time refused to comply with this written agreement, but, on the contrary, and for a long time after December 2, 1912, when the first payment became due, and even up to the commencement of this action, he still offered to make the sale upon the terms stated in the agreement.

Stelson, after December 1, 1912, wrote letters both to the Haigler Realty Company and to Kloke urging that the matter be closed up as it was important to prepare for the approaching season's work on the ranch. As late as March, 1913, more than four months after the first payment became due, Kloke wrote Stelson asking for an extension of time, and declared that "the chances are that nothing can be done for some little time in the way of closing it up."

The plaintiff below undertakes to excuse the payment of the $30,000 and the completion of the contract by Kloke, upon the ground that the title to the premises was defective, and was not a marketable title. Very soon after, or perhaps at the time of, the signing of the Kloke agreement, Stelson turned over the abstracts of title to Haigler, who in turn delivered them to Kloke for examination. These were not returned to Stelson until after December 1, 1912, and after the first payment was due, whereupon Stelson delivered them to H. W. Wing, an attorney of Colorado Springs, with experience in titles and abstracts, together with certain objections of Kloke's attorney, for the purpose of having irregularities in the title corrected so as to meet these objections. The plaintiff below offered the testimony of Wing to support its contention as to defective or non-marketable title.

Wing testified that he proceeded at once to, and did, have the defects remedied. He says that the objections were by Ramsey, the Omaha attorney of Kloke, and were about 150 in number; that in great part they dated back from forty to fifty years, and were technical in character, many being matters of identification where names appeared by initials and with the full Christian name; that there were some apparent defects in case of tax titles, some of which he proceeded to have cleared through court action; that there were no legal or valid defects in the titles or any of them; that Stelson and his grantors had been in open and actual ownership and possession of the premises for about twenty-six years to his personal knowledge; that he caused all the objections to be satisfied; and that in his opinion the title to the premises and to all water rights connected therewith was a marketable title at the time the abstracts were placed in his hands.

It appears from this testimony that about three months were required to clear up all of the irregularities complained of. It does not appear that Kloke made any objection to the abstracts thereafter, though he asked for an extension of time to make the payment.

No other testimony was offered concerning the question of title, and there is no testimony in the case which tends to show any valid defect therein to any of the lands or water rights involved. The irregularities complained of were not suggested to Stelson until after the date when the first payment was to be made, and these appeared to have been cured with all reasonable diligence.

It was expressly agreed in the contract given to Kloke that: "It is further agreed between the parties hereto that should there be any defects in the titles covering above-described lands and water rights that the party of the second part gives the party of the first part reasonable time through the courts to have such defects set aright."

Under the facts thus disclosed and in view of this express agreement, there was no sufficient justification for Kloke to refuse or neglect to make the tender of payment as provided in the agreement because of defective title. Indeed, he made no such objection until after the expiration of the time for payment.

Neither Kloke nor Stelson claim any rights under the agreement as between themselves. But under all settled rules of construction the agreement between Stelson and Kloke was an option to purchase, and not a contract of sale. Nowhere in the agreement does Kloke agree to purchase, not to make any payment, or to bind himself in any other respect, aside from the forfeiture of the amount paid at the time the contract was made. Both Stelson and Kloke treated and construed the agreement as an option at the time, and at all times since.

In letters of both each refers to and speaks of the agreement as an option, and Kloke in his deposition testified as follows:

Q. But was it a sale, or was it an option, from your point of view?

A. I consider it a contract to purchase and with a forfeiture clause, without any liability in case I did not come across or he did not come across.

Again he says: "Of course I will admit, as purchaser, that I took this precaution that in case any unforeseen accident should happen I was not bound, but he was. I did not have to comply with my part of the contract if I did not want to, and he did."

And he further testified: "My understanding, so far as I was concerned, was that in case I did not want to take the property, did not want to fulfil my contract, naturally I would have to lose what I put up."

So that upon the face of the agreement it was unilateral in character, and fully intended by the parties as an option only.

It may be laid down as an established rule of law that, unless the contract contains language which may reasonably be construed as an agreement on the part of the vendee to purchase the property, or to assume some obligation thereunder, it will be an option contract, and not an agreement of sale and purchase. It is impossible to conceive of an agreement of sale and purchase without obligation on the part of the vendee to purchase. On the other hand, the absence of such obligation is the distinctive characteristic of an option contract. A contract of sale creates mutual obligations on the part of the seller to sell, and on the part of the purchaser to buy, while an option gives the right to purchase, within a limited time, without imposing any obligations to purchase. James, Option Contr. § 105, and authorities cited; Hessel v. Neal, 25 Colo. App. 300, 137 Pac. 72.

An agent employed to sell or find a purchaser has not performed the contract by negotiating a mere option contract and therefore is not entitled to recover the agreed or any compensation for such services. Fox v. Denargo Land Co. 37 Colo. 203, 86 Pac. 344; Brown v. Keegan, 32 Colo. 463, 76 Pac. 1056. See also James, Option Contr. § 205, and authorities cited. We must hold, therefore, that under the facts and circumstances of this case the Haigler Realty Company is not entitled to recover.

The questions here considered were properly raised by demurrer, by instructions tendered and refused, and by instructions given and objected to. There are other assignments of error which we do not deem important to consider.

The judgment is reversed.

NOTE.

The question as to when an instrument for the purchase of land may be regarded as a contract of sale, and when as a mere option, is discussed in annotation beginning on page 576, in which it is pointed out that while, as in the reported case (STELSON v. HAIGLER, ante, 550), contracts have been held to be mere options on the ground that they did not bind the second party to purchase, the fact that a contract does not formally bind such party to make payment is not conclusive of its character, and that where it is held, as a matter of construction, to bind him to complete the purchase, it is more than an option.

HARRY R. SOLOMON

JACOB SHEWITZ, Appt.,

JUSTICE R. PIERSON et al.

(185 Mich. 620, 152 N. W. 196.)

Option — contract — sale or option.

1. An agreement between one having an option to purchase real estate and another that the former agrees to sell and the latter agrees to buy the property is a contract of sale, and not an option.

2. One having an option to purchase real estate has a legal right to enter into an executory contract to sell the property.

Real property — contract to sell — time as essence.

3. The mere insertion in a contract to sell real estate, that the deal is to be consummated within thirty days, does not make time of the essence of the contract.

[See 6 R. C. L. 898; 23 R. C. L. 1330.]

Vendor and purchaser — bona fide purchaser — who is.

4. One who has sufficient notice of an outstanding contract by his vendor to sell real estate which he intends to purchase, to put him on inquiry before he pays the purchase money, cannot claim the rights of a bona fide purchaser.

5. One having an option to purchase real estate and contracting to sell it to a third person cannot prejudice the rights of the vendee by taking the deed to himself and wife.

Husband and wife — duty of wife to release dower.

6. A wife cannot be compelled to release her dower in land which her husband has contracted to sell.

Party — specific performance — wife.

7. A woman with notice of a contract by her husband to sell real estate at the time a deed was executed to him and her under an option contract is a proper party to a suit to compel specific performance of the contract. [See 20 R. C. L. 679.]

Specific performance — discretion of court.

8. Application for specific performance of a contract to convey real estate is addressed to the sound discretion of the court.

9. Specific performance against the husband alone will not be decreed where, having an option to purchase real estate, he contracted to sell it to a third person and then took title under his option to himself and wife, since it would change the contract between the parties and compel the vendee to accept an imperfect title which he had not in mind when he agreed to purchase.

APPEAL by defendant, cross complainant, from a decree of the Circuit Court for Wayne County in Chancery in favor of complainant in a suit to quiet title to certain real property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Fred W. Smith and Benjamin & Betzoldt for appellant.

Messrs. Louis Smilansky and Harold H. Smilansky for defendants Pierson.

Stone, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts in this case are somewhat involved. On January 16, 1913, the title to the premises (consisting of two and one half lots in Hunt & Leggett's subdivision of certain lands in the city of Detroit) was in John W. Leggett. Mr. Leggett had previously given Justice R. Pierson an option to purchase said premises, which option would expire some time in March, 1913. While this option was in force, and on January 16, 1913, the agreement (Exhibit 2) was made by Justice R. Pierson with Jacob Shewitz, as follows:

Memorandum of agreement, made and entered into this 16th day of January, 1913, by and between Justice R. Pierson and Bessie L. Pierson, his wife, parties of the first part, and Jacob Shewitz, party of the second part, all of the city of Detroit, county of Wayne, and state of Michigan.

Said parties of the first part agree to sell and said party of the second part agrees to buy the property situated and being in the city of Detroit, county of Wayne, and state of Michigan, to wit: Lots two hundred forty-seven (247), two hundred forty-eight (248), and the east twenty (20) feet of lot two hundred forty-six (246), Hunt & Leggett's subdivision of the south half of the south half of quarter section twenty-four (24), 10,000-acre tract, Hamtramck, being on the northwest corner of Harmon and Oakland avenues, as recorded in liber ten (10), page 40 of Plats.

The purchase price to be three thousand and fifty ($3,050) dollars, payable as follows: One hundred dollars ($100) upon the date hereof, the receipt of which is hereby confessed and acknowledged by the parties of the first part; four hundred ($400) dollars upon the examination of a Burton abstract of title, brought down to date, showing good and merchantable title in said vendors, and upon the execution of a Union Trust form land contract, the balance of two thousand five hundred and fifty ($2,550) dollars in semiannual payments of one hundred ($100) dollars or more each, and interest at the rate of six (6%) per cent per annum, payable semi-annually, the full purchase price to be due and payable on or before three (3) years from the date of said land contract.

Said parties of the first part hereby sell the above-described property free and clear of all and any restrictions, and further agree to obtain a quitclaim deed from John W. Leggett and Grace F. Leggett, his wife, releasing the property from the following restrictions, to wit:

"That no saloon or store shall be erected on said premises or that no dwelling house of the value of less than $1,500 or less shall be erected 15 feet from the street line upon said premises within ninety-nine years from the date of a certain warranty deed given by the said Leggetts to Charles H. Green and William W. Snyder, to wit, September 21, 1895."

Said party of the second part agrees to pay parts two, three, and four of the Harmon avenue paving tax, due in the amount not exceeding two hundred and fifty ($250) dollars.

Said parties of the first part are hereby given the privilege of mortgaging the above-described premises in any amount not exceeding fifteen hundred ($1,500) dollars. Deal is to be completed and consummated within thirty (30) days from date thereof. Possession to be given immediately upon said consummation.

In witness whereof, the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands and seals at the city of Detroit this day and year first above written.

Justice R. Pierson. [L. S.]

Jacob Shewitz. [L. S.]

About March 1, 1913, Pierson exercised his option with Mr. Leggett, paid the amount named in the option, and took a warranty deed of the premises to himself and wife. On the same day Pierson and wife sold and joined in a deed conveying the property to Harry R. Solomon for $3,375; the latter assuming a $1,500 mortgage which Pierson had given to the bank. The contract between Pierson and Shewitz was placed on record in the office of register of deeds, after the deed from Leggett to Pierson and wife was recorded, but before the deed from Pierson to Solomon was recorded.

On April 24, 1913, Solomon filed a bill of complaint in the Wayne circuit court, in chancery, against defendant Shewitz, claiming to be a bona fide purchaser for value by deed from said Pierson and wife of said premises, and that said agreement above set forth was of no force, and to have the said agreement between Pierson and Shewitz declared to be a cloud upon his title, and to have the same declared null and void, and discharged of record.

The defendant Shewitz filed a petition to the end that Justice R. Pierson and Bessie L. Pierson be made parties cross defendants in said cause, and that process issue to bring them in. The petition was granted, and said parties were brought in. Thereupon said defendant Shewitz answered the bill of complaint, among other things, denying that complainant Solomon was a bona fide purchaser for value of said premises, and claiming the benefit of a cross bill against said Solomon and Justice R. Pierson and Bessie L. Pierson. He set up his said agreement with said Pierson, stated that he had paid the $100 therein specified; that early in February, 1913, he informed said Justice R. Pierson that he was ready to carry out his part of the agreement, and instructed his attorney to prepare the necessary land contract and have the same in readiness for its execution, and arranged with said Pierson to close the transaction at a time and place named; that said Pierson appeared, and said defendant and cross complainant made a tender to said Pierson of the $400 provided for in the said agreement, but that said Pierson refused to sign said contract, claiming that he desired a short delay to perfect a mortgage before closing said deal, unless cross complainant desired to pay the entire purchase price in cash; that cross complainant consented to a delay of a couple of weeks in order that said mortgage might be perfected, but since that time, although frequently requested, said Pierson had at all times refused to carry out his part of said agreement; that on March 3, 1913, cross complainant, having heard that said Pierson was attempting to sell said property to someone else, made an affidavit confirming the purchase aforesaid, and attached the same to the original agreement, and had the same recorded on the 4th day of March, 1913, at 9:30 A. M. in the office of the register of deeds of said county; that at that time there was no change in the record title which might have affected his interest; that he was informed and believed that said Solomon had knowledge of the contract between cross complainant and said Pierson, when he purchased said premises, but that said Solomon claimed and considered cross complainant's interest in said property as an expired option, which was not the fact; that any interest which the said Solomon obtained by virtue of the deed mentioned in his bill of complaint was subject to the rights of this cross complainant, by virtue of said agreement; that the deed from said John W. Leggett and wife to said Pierson and wife was recorded March 4, 1913, at 9:45 A. M.; that said cross defendant Bessie L. Pierson had no interest in said property other than her dower interest. The cross complainant prayed that it might be decreed that the said deed from said Pierson and wife to said Solomon be held void and of no effect as to said cross complainant, and that said Solomon be decreed to quitclaim any interest he may have obtained to said property to said Pierson and wife, and, should said Solomon refuse so to do, that said decree might have the effect and force of a quitclaim deed; that it be decreed that said Pierson and wife specifically perform said agreement above set forth, and execute the proper conveyance to said cross complainant, upon the payment of the balance in full of the purchase price of said property in accordance with the terms and conditions of said agreement; and that it may be decreed that said Pierson and wife deliver to cross complainant a Burton abstract of title, brought down to date, showing a good and merchantable title in themselves, free and clear of all liens and encum-brances, and that, in default thereof, cross complainant be allowed a sufficient amount to have such abstract made. There was also a prayer for general relief.

The said complainant Solomon, as cross defendant, and the said Justice R. Pierson and Bessie L. Pierson, cross defendants, answered said cross bill reiterating the allegations of the bill of complaint, and denying that said cross complainant had any interest in said property, and denying most of the allegations of the cross bill. The answers admit, however, that defendant Bessie L. Pierson, at the time of answering, had no interest in said property, but claim that on January 26, 1913, she and her said husband became owners in the entirety of said property.

The case, being at issue as to all of the parties, was heard upon testimony taken in open court. Complainant Solomon, among other things, testified as follows on his direct examination: "I learned of the existence of an alleged claim of the defendant on this property the day I made the first payment of $200, on the 27th day of February. Mr. Pierson, from whom I purchased the property, told me he had given a sort of option to the defendant, whom I had never seen and did not know, but that the option had expired; that he had asked the defendant to live up to this particular option, but he refused to do so, and he was at liberty to dispose of it.

Mr. Pierson explained it to me very thoroughly. I bought the property and accepted the deed in good faith, and paid my money for it. . . . I left the deed with the bank on Saturday, the 1st day of March, the day that the mortgage was put on there by Mr. Pierson in the bank, and Mr. Borgman suggested that I leave the deed with him so that he would put the mortgage on record before the deed went on record. I know from examination of the record that Mr. Pierson came into possession of the title the day he transferred it to me."

On cross-examination complainant Solomon testified, in part, as follows:

About the same time I paid the $200 I heard about the contract between Pierson and Shewitz. I had not departed from the place; it was right there at the time of the transaction. Mr. Pierson brought it up. I do not remember, before or after the paper was signed, but it did not make any difference to me whether it was signed before or afterwards, or whether I had knowledge of the fact that there had been a paper existing before I signed the paper, but relied upon Mr. Pierson's explanation. He stated to me that some man by the name of Shewitz had been given an option on this property, and that the option had expired a week or ten days before, and that Shewitz did not live up to his part of the agreement. . . . I don't know what Shewitz had agreed to pay for the place, but Mr. Pierson had told me approximately the same amount I was to pay. I never made any attempt to see the paper that was signed by Shewitz and Pierson, and I never made any attempt to find out who the man Shewitz was, as I did not think there was any occasion to, either before I paid the $200 or afterwards. I did not care what sort of paper he had. I was willing to rely upon Mr. Pierson's word, irrespective of what papers were signed by the parties. I took Mr. Pierson's word for it. Mr. Pierson said it was an agreement, but that it had expired. The deal was closed the 1st day of March.

Q. Who paid for the expense of this litigation, you or Mr. Pierson?

A. Why, at the time Mr. Pierson tendered the $100 back to Mr. Shewitz, he refused to take it, and Mr. Pierson wanted to return the money, and he refused to take it, and he said he would turn it over to his attorney. Mr. Pierson had given a warranty deed, and he stated he would be willing to clear up the matter.

Q. The suit was primarily in your name, but Mr. Pierson's proceeding?

3 A.L.R.—36.

The Court: That is the inference I will have to draw.

A. It was not part of my understanding and agreement with Mr. Pierson that I would buy the property with the understanding that Mr. Pierson would clear up the defect, as he claimed. I did not consider that there was any defect, and, as soon as I found out that the contract had been placed on record, I took it up with Mr. Pierson.

Justice R. Pierson was sworn as a witness for complainant. He testified that he did not own the property on January 16, 1913, but had an option on it from Mr. Leggett, the record owner. That witness subsequently acquired title jointly with his wife, and sold it to Mr. Solomon. On cross-examination he testified as follows: The option was given to me personally, but I did not take the deed in my own name because Mrs. Pierson was furnishing some money to finance it, and the deed was made jointly. It was just a question of turning the property from Leggett over to Solomon, and it would not have made any difference whether it was in my name alone, as I lost all interest in the property as soon as it was sold to Solomon. I did not have a land contract, though I told Mr. Shewitz I had a contract from Mr. Leggett, and that the deed would have to come from Mr. Leggett in the form of a quitclaim, for he would not make a warranty deed and release the restrictions that were on the property at that time.

The contract or agreement with Shewitz had expired before I had an opportunity to sell it for cash. My option was a ninety-day option for $1,710, describing the property to be sold for cash, in which I had ninety days to accept, and which privilege I took advantage of. I did not take advantage of the option until Mr. Shewitz's option had expired, but I took advantage of it within the three months.

This witness further testified that, at the time he made the contract with Mr. Shewitz, the option from Leggett was in his name; that, under the terms of the contract, he was to get a release of the restrictions, but he never made a tender of it to Mr. Shewitz, and never got it until after his (Shewitz's) option had expired; that he got the deed from Mr. Leggett, including the release, and did not make a tender to Mr. Shewitz after his option had expired; that he never submitted a contract and asked him for money; that witness asked Mr. Shewitz if he was ready to carry out the deal, and he said he was not; that witness never gave notice of forfeiture, except by oral statement that the time was up, and he would not go ahead with the deal. Witness denied that Mr. Shewitz told him that he (Shewitz) was ready to close the deal, and he denied that Shewitz ever made him any tender at all.

Jacob Shewitz testified that he saw Mr. Pierson five or six times during the deal, and that he (Shewitz) was always ready to consummate his part of the deal at any time when the restrictions were removed; that he made a tender of the $400 to Mr. Pierson; but thought it was after the thirty days; that Pierson asked for an extension, and said he could not take that much money; that witness should try to raise more money. Shewitz was corroborated by another witness as to the tender of the $400.

The trial court entered a decree in favor of complainant Solomon, holding that the agreement of January 16, 1913, was null and void and a cloud on the title of complainant, and that Shewitz delivered up the said instrument to be canceled, and that said Solomon was the owner of said land in fee simple by a title perfect as against said Shewitz, and costs were awarded to complainant. Shewitz has appealed.

We have read the entire record with much care, and are of opinion that the above-quoted instrument between Justice R. Pierson and Jacob Shewitz was not an option, as appears to have been claimed by Pierson, but was an executory land contract, valid and of binding force as to the parties thereto. Pierson had the legal right to make such contract.

We do not think that time was of the essence of the contract, and we are of opinion that such contract was in force at the time of the purchase of said premises by complainant Solomon.

Real property—contract to sell—time as essence.

By a preponderance of the evidence it appears that Shewitz had not forfeited his rights under such contract, but had made the tender claimed by him, and that complainant Solomon had notice of the existence of such contract at the time of his purchase, or at least sufficient notice to put him on inquiry as to Shewitz's rights, and that Solomon was not a bona fide purchaser of said premises for value before notice.

Vendor and purchaser—bona fide purchaser—who is.

Justice R. Pierson could not legally ignore his contract with Shewitz, and take a deed to himself and wife, to the prejudice of Shewitz.

He was precluded by his contract from so doing. In so far as he was concerned, the transaction should stand as though the deed had been made by Leggett to him. The right of Mrs. Pierson, then, would be an inchoate dower right in the land. She, never having joined in the contract with her husband to Shewitz, cannot be compelled to release her dower in the land. It is well settled in this state that the wife cannot be compelled to release her dower in lands which her husband has contracted to sell, and she is not a proper party to a bill by the purchaser for specific performance. Weed v. Terry, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 344, 45 Am. Dec. 257; Richmond v. Robinson, 12 Mich. 193; Buchoz v. Walker, 19 Mich. 224; Phillips v. Stauch, 20 Mich. 369.

fails to show that Mrs. Pierson had any notice or knowledge of the contract with Shewitz, when the deed was made by Leggett.

Party—specific performance—wife.

Had she had such notice or knowledge, she would have been a proper party. Daily v. Litchfield, 10 Mich. 29.

In Walker v. Kelly, 91 Mich. 212, 51 N. W. 934, specific performance, subject to the dower rights, was given, where the wife was not a party to the contract; the decree providing for compensation to complainant for present value of such contingent right of dower. However, it has frequently been held that the jurisdiction of a court of equity to decree the specific performance of contracts is not a matter of right in the parties to be demanded ex debito justitiæ, but applications invoking this power of the court are addressed to its sound and reasonable discretion, and are granted or rejected according to the circumstances of each case. Specific performance is frequently refused, although the defense is not such as would warrant the rescission of the contract at the suit of the defendant. 36 Cyc. 548, and note; Rust v. Conrad, 47 Mich. 449-454, 41 Am. Rep. 720, 11 N. W. 265, and cases cited; Chicago, K. & S. R. Co. v. Lane, 150 Mich. 162, 113 N. W. 22.

We think there are cogent reasons why specific performance of the Shewitz contract against defendant Pierson alone, with an abatement for the present value of the wife's dower interest, should not be decreed. One reason is that it changes the contract between the parties, and another is that it compels the vendee to accept an imperfect title, which he had not in mind when he agreed to purchase. See cases cited in Kuratli v. Jackson, 60 Or. 203, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1195, 118 Pac. 192, 1013, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 203.

We are of opinion that the circuit court erred in holding that the agreement of January 16, 1913, was null and void, and in ordering the same to be delivered up and canceled. We think, however, that Jacob Shewitz should be denied relief here, and should be relegated to a court of law for any relief in damages to which he may be entitled. His cross bill will be dismissed without prejudice to his right to sue at law for damages. The bill of complaint of Solomon will also be dismissed, and the decree below reversed, with costs to defendant Jacob Shewitz against Solomon. The defendant Bessie L. Pierson will recover her costs to be taxed against Shewitz.

NOTE.

The question as to when an instrument for the purchase of land is to be regarded as a contract, and when as a mere option, is discussed in annotation, beginning at page 576, in which it is pointed out that while a contract in which the second party binds himself unconditionally to pay the purchase price is often (as in the reported case SOLOMON v. SHEWITZ, ante, 557), held to be a contract of purchase, such a contract may nevertheless be an option, if, by reason of further stipulations therein, the purchaser may withdraw without incurring any liability other than the forfeiture of his initial payment or deposit.

J. E. ROSEBERRY et al., Appts.

Broker — commission — procurement of customer.

1. Plaintiffs employed defendants, who are real estate brokers, to find a purchaser for a farm. They procured a customer who entered into a written contract with plaintiffs by which plaintiffs agreed to sell and he agreed to purchase the farm for $12,000, a warranty deed to be executed by plaintiffs and deposited in escrow and delivered to the purchaser on payment of the balance. When the contract was executed he paid $500 on the purchase price, which was placed in the hands of the defendants as agents for the plaintiffs. There was a provision in the contract that if the purchaser failed to make the subsequent payment he should forfeit the $500, which should be retained by the plaintiffs as liquidated damages, and the parties were to be relieved from the further performance of the contract. Held, the contract is not an option but an agreement for a sale and purchase of lands.

2. Plaintiffs, having agreed to accept $500 in lieu of performance, cannot, as against the defendants, deny that the payment of that sum was equivalent to performance.

[See 4 R. C. L. 303.]

— amount of commission.

3. The defendants were entitled to their commission on the $12,000.

[See 4 R. C. L. 332.]

— commission on option contract.

4. A broker commissioned to sell real estate who secures an option contract with down payment, which is to be forfeited in case the purchase is not consummated, is entitled to his commission on the amount of the down payment in case the option is permitted to lapse.

— inability to pay — effect.

5. The inability of a customer produced by a real estate broker with whom a contract to purchase was made to pay, and the rescission of the contract by mutual consent because of such inability, does not deprive the broker of his right to commission in the absence of any express agreement to that effect.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Cowley County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the proceeds of a check collected by defendants, which plaintiffs alleged belonged to them. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Albert Faulconer for appellants.
Messrs. William P. Hackney, J. T. Lafferty, and L. D. Moore for appellees.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents a single question of law which arises on the pleadings. The plaintiffs sued to recover $500, the proceeds of a check collected by the defendants which the plaintiffs claim belong to them. The court sustained a motion for judgment on the pleadings and gave judgment against the defendants for the amount sued for. The defendants appeal.

The plaintiffs owned a farm and listed it for sale with the defendants, who are real estate agents. The answer alleged that the defendants procured M. L. Harris as a purchaser and brought him to the plaintiffs; that Harris was then and there able, ready, and willing to purchase the farm at plaintiffs' price, and that on the 13th day of December, 1913, the plaintiffs entered into a written contract with him for the sale of the farm. A copy of the contract was attached to the answer. The first payment on the purchase was $500, and this sum was paid to the defendants as agents of the plaintiffs. The defendants claim that they had earned their commission of $325, and in their answer alleged that they had tendered the plaintiffs $175, the balance above the commission. The case turns upon the question whether the contract entered into between the plaintiffs and Harris was a contract of sale or a mere option. The trial court held it to be an option, and that the defendants had not earned a commission on the purchase price.

The contract expressly states that the plaintiffs "agree to sell and do sell to party of the second part" the real estate (describing the same) for the sum of $12,000. There was the usual provision for furnishing an abstract, and it was agreed that upon the execution of the contract Harris should pay $500 of the purchase price, and that the contract, together with a warranty deed conveying the premises from the plaintiffs to him, should be deposited in escrow in a bank to be delivered to Harris upon his payment of the balance of the purchase price, $11,500, which payment was to be made on or before the 15th day of April, 1914. The contract in express terms recited that in consideration of the covenants of the parties of the first part Harris agreed to purchase the real estate at the price mentioned. Possession was delivered to him "on the 15th day of April, 1914, or as hereafter agreed upon." When the contract was executed Harris made the first payment of $500 by check to the defendants as agents for plaintiffs. Afterwards he declined to complete the purchase and submitted to a forfeiture of the $500. The decision of the question turns, however, upon the effect to be given to the following clause in the contract: "It is further agreed . . . that in the event party of the second part fails, neglects, and refuses to pay the balance of the purchase price, to wit, $11,500 . . . on or before the 15th day of April, 1914, then and in that event the . . . bank is hereby authorized to return to the parties of the first part the deed deposited with it conveying said described premises to party of the second part, and the amount of $500 paid . . . by party of the second part is hereby forfeited . . . as liquidated damages, said parties of the first part retaining said amount as herein provided, and the parties hereto relieved from the further performance of any of the covenants herein set forth, and this contract is to be held null and void and of no effect."

Plaintiffs rely very largely on the case of Aigler v. Carpenter Place Land Co. 51 Kan. 718, 33 Pac. 593. That case merely decides that where a broker, who agrees to produce a purchaser ready, able, and willing to take the land at the price named by the principal, produces a person who is unwilling to do that, but accepts a mere option to purchase, the broker is not entitled to his full commission. Of course, in a case of that kind he is entitled to the usual commission on the amount of the option forfeited. In the Broker-commission on option contract. Aigler Case the contract itself is not set forth, but the opinion states that it was treated "by the parties and the court below as only an option on the property," and that the person introduced as a purchaser "signed a written option contract to purchase the real estate" (p. 719) for a stated price. The opinion, therefore, is an authority no further than to hold, what may be conceded to be the law everywhere, that in such a case the agent is not entitled to a full commission. Was the contract between the plaintiffs and Harris a mere option?

The distinction between a sale, an agreement to sell, and an option to purchase lands, is well defined in the opinion in Ide v. Leiser, 10 Mont. 5, 24 Am. St. Rep. 17, 24 Pac. 695: "The first is the actual transfer of title from grantor to grantee, by appropriate instrument of conveyance. The second is a contract to be performed in the future, and, if fulfilled, results in a sale. It is a preliminary to a sale, and is not the sale. Breaches, rescission, or release may occur, by which the contemplated sale never takes place. The third, an option originally, is neither a sale nor an agreement to sell. It is simply a contract, by which the owner of property (real estate being the species we are now discussing) agrees with another person that he shall have the right to buy his property, at a fixed price, within a time certain. He does not sell his land; he does not then agree to sell it; but he does then sell something, viz., the right or privilege to buy at the election, or option, of the other party." p. 11.

The contract in the present case is an agreement to sell as well as one to purchase. It recites that the owners of the land (the plaintiffs) agree to sell and do sell the real estate (describing the same) for the sum of $12,000; that in consideration of the covenants made and entered into by the owners, Harris "agrees to purchase and does purchase . . . the real estate above described for the sum of $12,000, to be paid as set forth, to wit, $500 upon the execution of this contract," the balance to be paid to the bank for the benefit of the plaintiffs upon the delivery of the warranty deed, which was to be executed and deposited by the plaintiffs on the execution of the contract. While the contract was not a sale, it was an agreement to sell and an agreement to purchase at a stated price. If it had been a mere option there would have been no occasion for the execution and deposit of the title deeds. The plaintiffs' construction of the contract, which the trial court appears to have adopted, would look alone to the subsequent clause, which we construe to be nothing more than a provision attempting to liquidate the damage in case of the failure of the purchaser to comply with the agreement and make the subsequent payment. The defendants procure a person who was willing to enter into an enforceable contract with the principal for the purchasing of the lands at the price and terms agreed upon. The plaintiffs saw fit to provide in the contract that the payment of $500 should be equivalent to the performance of the contract by <sup>—commission—procurement of customer.</sup>

Harris. They are certainly not in a position now to deny that the payment of that sum is, as between themselves and the defendants, equivalent to any advantage they may have gained by the full performance of the contract. Upon what theory can plaintiffs claim the right to recover any portion of the $500 except for the services performed by the defendants in procuring Harris to enter into the contract in compliance of which he paid the money?

In Green v. Fist, 89 Kan. 536, 132 Pac. 179, the agent procured a person who entered into a contract with the principal to exchange properties, and a clause in the contract provided that in case of failure of either party to perform the contract he should forfeit to the other the property represented by the deed and bill of sale as damages. The trial court construed the contract as granting to each party a mere option to exchange, and instructed that plaintiff was not entitled to a commission. The judgment was reversed, and it was held that the mere fact that "by its terms the parties might be held to have attempted to liquidate the damages in case of a breach made it no less an enforceable contract." p. 537. It was further said in the opinion: "Whether the courts would declare the provision that in case of a breach of the contract the party in fault should forfeit all his property involved in the trade to the other, regardless of the actual damages sustained, was an agreement for liquidated damages or for a penalty, is not before us. All that we decide is that the contract was not an option, but an agreement for an exchange of properties, which was enforceable." p. 538.

In Betz v. Williams & W. Land & Loan Co. 46 Kan. 45, 26 Pac. 456, it was held that when the broker has procured a party with whom his principal is satisfied and who enters into a written contract to buy and is financially able to perform the contract, the commission has been earned, although the principal has the option under the contract to declare a forfeiture thereof if the instalments are not paid, and does declare the contract forfeited for such nonpayment; and the general rule which obtains everywhere is, that where the broker by his efforts has brought the parties together and procured a person ready, able, and willing to purchase, and their meeting results in the execution of an enforceable contract for the sale and purchase of the land, he has performed all he is called upon to do. It is no part of his duty to see that the terms of the contract are complied with (Beougher v. Clark, 81 Kan. 250, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 198, 106 Pac. 39), and the subsequent inability of the purchaser to pay and the re-

 —inability to pay scission of the con-—effect. tract by mutual consent because of such inability will not deprive the broker of his right to a commission in the absence of an express agreement to that effect (Hutton v. Stewart, 90 Kan.

602, 135 Pac. 681). In the case last cited the contract was held valid and binding because Stewart could have maintained an action thereon for specific performance or for damages. The same rule was applied where the principal kept the amount paid by the purchaser, and refused to sue for the balance under a binding contract. Ward v. Cobb, 148 Mass. 518, 12 Am. St. Rep. 587, 20 N. E. 174.

A quite similar situation arose in Gilder v. Davis, 137 N. Y. 504, 20 L.R.A. 398, 33 N. E. 599. In that case, too, the earnest money was paid to the broker, who insisted upon his right to retain a commission, and the action was brought by the owner of the land to recover the earnest money. The broker had negotiated the sale at the price named by the principal, $125,000. The agreement provided that $10,000 was to be paid to bind the transaction, and it was paid to the broker. The balance was to be paid within four months. There was a provision, however, that if the purchaser failed to make the $115,000 payment within that time, the $10,000 deposited should be forfeited, and no further liability of any kind should be incurred by the purchaser. By a subsequent arrangement between the principal and the broker the latter agreed that the commission on the sale should not be due until the final purchase money was paid. The purchaser did not take the property and forfeited the $10,000. The plaintiff demanded the whole of that sum from the broker, who refused to pay more than $9,500, claiming the balance as a commission on the $10,000. The trial court held that the principal was entitled to recover the $500, and directed a verdict. The court of appeals reversed the case, and held that the broker was entitled to the $500 commission, and in the opinion used this language: "While it is not necessary to be determined upon this appeal, it is by no means clear that when the contract was closed between the plaintiff and [the purchaser] the defendants were not entitled to their full commissions. They had then negotiated a contract of sale which was satisfactory to the plaintiff and which was approved and confirmed by him. If there had been no further agreement between the parties as to the commissions, it might be claimed, at least with some plausibility, by the defendants, that they were entitled to their commissions, as they would have been if they had negotiated a contract containing a stipulation for the payment of liquidated damages in case of failure of performance by either party." (Italics ours.) p. 509.

This case is cited by the defendants in their brief, but it does not decide the precise question, because it was not involved.

In Leete v. Norton, 43 Conn. 219, the broker procured a purchaser who entered into a contract which provided for a sum of money as liquidated damages in case the purchaser failed to take the property. It was held by the Connecticut court that the principal could not be allowed to deny that this money was an equivalent, as between himself and the broker, to the purchase money, and thus avoid payment of commissions, because the broker had rendered services for him which he agreed were an equivalent to procuring an exchange of the property.

We think the doctrine of the case just cited applies to the situation here, and that plaintiffs cannot be permitted, as against their agents, to deny that they were satisfied to accept the stipulated sum as equivalent to the performance of the contract. They are entitled, of course, to the balance of the deposit less the commission of $325, and the defendants upon the pleadings are entitled to judgment for costs.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

Mason, J., dissenting:

The writing signed by the parties appears to me to be, on the part of

Harris, a mere option rather than an enforceable contract to buy. Its character should be determined by its legal effect rather than by what the parties chose to call it. Essentially it amounts to this: Harris pays $500, in return for which he obtains the right to take the property on the terms stated, with the unrestricted privilege of refusing to do so if he shall so elect. If the money paid is regarded as liquidated damages in the event of his refusal or inability to carry out the deal, that does not affect the question. An agreement as to the amount of damages to be recoverable in such case would not prevent the specific enforcement of the contract. "The fact that by its terms the parties might be held to have attempted to liquidate the damages in case of a breach made it no less an enforceable contract." Green v. Fist, 89 Kan. 536, 537, 132 Pac. 179. The writing here involved, if enforceable at all, would support an action by the vendor for specific performance (36 Cyc. 565); but such proceeding is prevented by its concluding provision that if Harris refused to pay the stipulated price at a fixed time the parties were relieved from further performance of its covenants, and it was to be held null and void.

NOTE.

The question as to when an instrument for the purchase of land is to be considered as a contract of sale, and when as a mere option, is discussed in annotation beginning on page 576, in which it is pointed out that while an instrument in the form of a contract of purchase may nevertheless be an option, if by its terms the purchaser may withdraw without incurring any liability other than the forfeiture of his initial payment or deposit, such a provision will not make the contract a mere option to purchase where (as in the reported case, DAVIS v. ROSEBERRY, ante, 564), such provision is construed as making it optional with the vendor whether he will accept the stipulated damages or insist upon performance of the contract.

Tax — land contract — enforcement or penalty — option.

A contract to purchase land for a certain price with a down payment and balance to be paid at specified times when the deed shall be executed, with a right to forfeit the contract for default in payments and retain the amounts paid, is taxable as a credit, although the seller has an option to enforce the contract or rely upon his penalty for noncompliance, since that does not create an option on the part of the purchaser, which would not be taxable.

Statement by Deemer, J.:

This is an appeal from an assessment of omitted moneys and credits. Plaintiff was assessed by the treasurer of Polk county with omitted credits to the amount of about $15,000, and from such assessment appealed to the district court. Upon trial in that court the assessment was confirmed, and plaintiff appeals.

Messrs. W. L. Smith and E. P. Hudson, for appellant:

A contract granting an option to purchase land in the future on specified terms is not taxable against the grantor as a credit.

Messrs. Hewitt, Miller, & Wallingford for appellee.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The land contract upon which the assessment was based was entered into between Rampton, party of the first part, and Milne & Milne, party of the second part, on October 29, 1907. It is an ordinary contract for the sale of certain lands in Benton county, Iowa, for the agreed consideration of $34,560; the agreement of the first parties being to sell to the parties of the second part, on performance of the agreements of said second parties, by good and sufficient warranty deed, the premises described. The agreement of the second parties was as follows: "And the said party of the second part, in consideration of the premises, hereby agrees to and with the party of the first part to purchase all his right, title, and interest in and to the real estate above described for the sum of $34,560, and to pay said sum therefor to the party of the first part, his heirs, or assigns, as follows: Nine hundred 00-100 dollars on the execution of this agreement, and the party of the first part hereby acknowledges receipt of the same. Thirty-three thousand six hundred sixty dollars in two payments, to wit: First payment, 1st day of March, 1908, $28,660 cash, and by assuming a mortgage of $5,000 now against the premises, with interest thereon from March 1, 1908, all subject to a lease between first party and Powell Brothers, expiring March 1, 1909, which is to assign to second parties on March 1, 1908, with rent notes for the year 1908. Second party will insure the buildings on the premises, and if buildings should be damaged or destroyed by fire prior to March 1, 1908, second party shall be entitled to insurance collected, and shall accept same in full of damages done to premises. With interest from this date at the rate of — per cent per annum on all sums as shall remain unpaid, until all is paid, payable at Dysart Savings Bank, Dysart, Iowa."

And the agreement further provides: "And it is expressly agreed by and between the parties hereto that the time and times of payment of said sums of money, interest, and taxes as aforesaid is the essence and important part of the contract, and that if any default is made in any of the payments or agreements above mentioned to be performed by the party of the second part in consideration of the damage, injury, and expense thereby resulting, or that may be incurred by or to the party of the first part hereby, this agreement shall be void and of no effect, and the party of the second part shall have no claim in law or equity against the party of the first part, nor to the above-mentioned real estate, nor any part thereof; and any claim, or interest or right the party of the second part may have hereunder up to that time by reason hereof, or if any payments and improvements made hereunder, shall, on all such default, cease and determine, and become forfeited, without any declaration of forfeiture, re-entry, or any act of the party of the first part. And if the party of the second part, or any other person or persons, shall be in possession of said real estate, or any part thereof, he or they will peaceably remove therefrom, or, in default thereof, he or they may be treated as tenants holding over unlawfully after the expiration of a lease, and may be ousted and removed as such. But if such sums of money, interest, and taxes are paid as aforesaid, promptly at the times aforesaid, the party of the first part will, on receiving said money and interest, execute and deliver, at his own cost and expense, a warranty deed of said premises as above agreed. Possession reserved until March 1, 1909."

On the face of it, this contract was taxable as moneys and credits under a long line of authorities. See Talley v. Brown, 146 Iowa, 360, 140 Am. St. Rep. 282, 125 N. W. 248, and cases cited. But, to avoid its listing for taxation, Rampton and one of the Milnes took the stand and gave testimony which, it is claimed, shows that the contract was not taxable because it was a mere option. That we may have the testimony before us, we here quote:

Rampton testified, in substance:

Made a contract with Mr. Milne to sell the farm the 1st of March. Nine hundred dollars was paid.

Q. In case of nonpayment of the purchase price the 1st of March, what, if anything, was to happen?

A. I was to still hold the farm.

Q. This money that was to be paid, what was to be done with that?

A. It was to be forfeited. . . .

At the time of signing the contract to sell the farm to G. H. Milne and J. S. Milne, $900 was paid. The balance was paid according to the terms of the contract, shortly after March 1, 1908, and deed was executed to these parties in March, 1908. . . . I paid the taxes on the farm for 1906 and 1907. Mr. Milne paid the taxes for 1908, which became due January 1, 1909. He took possession of the farm in March, 1908, after the deal was closed up. . . . The place had been insured, and just run out, and I told him it would not pay me to get it insured. I was responsible for the building up to the 1st of March, because I owned the

enforcement or penalty—

farm up to the 1st of March. I supposed if the buildings burned he would not want to take the farm without me losing the buildings. I supposed he expected to take it.

Q. Do you wish the court to understand that Milne and his brother and yourself entered into a contract in good faith, which provided in substance that you were to receive from Milne the sum of $900 that you were to keep, that you were to give them any and all right that you might have in the proceeds of the insurance policy on the premises if the improvements would burn prior to the 1st day of March, 1908, and after the signing of the contract, and that you at the same time would have no right under the contract to compel Mr. Milne or his brother to carry out the provisions of them if they didn't want to?

A. Provisions of taking the place?

Q. Yes.

A. No, I could not compel them to take the place.

Q. That is what you wish the court to understand?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You were to keep the $900 in that event, and not give them any part of it?

A. That, according to contract.

Q. They were willing to give you $900 simply for the right to buy on March 1, 1908?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Without any rebate if they decided not to buy?

A. Yes, sir. I came right home and never saw the Milnes until I went back the 1st of March. . . . Received the purchase price on the farm on the 1st of March or thereabout, A. D. 1908.

Milne gave this testimony:

My brother and I bought Mr. Rampton's farm October 29, 1907, made the first arrangements for the purchase at Dysart. Found Mr. Rampton at his sister's at Dysart, talked the matter over there, and went uptown and drew up the contract. Henry Mohler, cashier of the Savings Bank, drew up the contract. . . .

Q. What was said or what was your understanding, in regard to this $900 that was paid, in case you failed to make further payments the 1st of March?

A. The way I took it, we was to lose it if we didn't make the terms.

Q. You was to lose it?

A. That is the way I had it figured out.

Q. And if you made the payment according to the terms, that was to apply on the purchase price of the farm?

A. Yes, sir. We got possession of the farm March 3, 1908, when we got the deed. We paid the money and got the deed March 3, 1908. Rampton paid the taxes due the 1st of January, A. D. 1908. The place was rented for a year, and we got possession subject to the one-year lease. . . . We talked over the terms first at the house, and then with Henry Mohler when he drew the contract. Nine hundred dollars was paid cash; the balance, the following March. Did not have the money on hand to pay for the farm. We borrowed a good part of it. We made arrangements to borrow the money to pay for the farm along in February. Did not make any arrangement in October, November, or December. Did not ask anybody to loan us the money at that time.

Q. When you signed this contract, you agreed to it, didn't you, to buy the farm?

A. In one way we did; if we could not meet it, we had a right to forfeit that.

Q. I am asking if, in the contract, you did not agree to buy the farm, and didn't Mr. Rampton agree to sell the farm to you?

A. Yes, he did; but at the same time we had a right to forfeit.

Q. I am asking if you did not agree to buy it by signing the contract. When you signed that contract, and your brother signed it, when you paid the $900, it was your intention to carry it out, wasn't it?

A. Yes, it was our intention.

Q. You had no other intention?

A. That was our intention. But at the same time, if we did not do it, we had a chance to forfeit the $900 and let it go.

Q. What was said about forfeiting the $900 if you did not?

A. If we didn't take the place, that was the last of it.

Q. Who said that?

A. I think the contract did.

Q. Who else said that? Did Rampton tell you before the contract was written that was to be the understanding?

A. It was the understanding between the three of us when he drew it up.

Q. How did you reach that understanding? What was said about it? That is what I want to know.

A. Because he wanted some kind of a bond he would get something out of it if we didn't take it.

Q. You had paid $900, and he was to keep it if you didn't carry out the contract?

A. That is the way I understand it.

Q. But you intended at the same time always to carry out the contract?

A. Yes, intended to if we could.

Q. You know that if there had been a fire at any time after October 29, 1908, that you and your brother would have been entitled to the proceeds of the insurance policy, don't you?

A. If we took the place.

Q. You knew you would have been entitled to it?

A. If we had took the place we would have; if we didn't, I don't suppose we would.

Q. Didn't you understand this part in case insurance money was paid by reason of a fire having occurred, in case it was paid to you at any time ahead of March 1, 1908, and you didn't take the farm, that you would pay all of the insurance money to Rampton, and he would keep your $900, and you would be out the insurance money and be out the $900, was that your understanding?

A. That was the way I understood it, yes.

Q. Did you have the money on hand with which to pay for the farm when the contract was signed?

A. Had to borrow a large part of it in the spring. We figured on selling another place we had in Tama county, and didn't get that sold. In case we could not have borrowed or sold, we would have had to forfeit the $900. There would have been no other way out of it.

This is the entire record, and it will be noticed that there is no testimony of any mistake in the drafting of the contract. The parties say it is just as they intended it to be, and about all they attempt to do in their testimony is to put a legal interpretation upon it. They say that if the Milnes did not make the final payment the $900 was to be forfeited; but if they did it was to be part of the purchase price. They do not say, nor could they, that this was a mere option secured by the Milnes. As a legal conclusion, they say that Rampton could not have enforced anything but a forfeiture; but this legal conclusion is not binding upon us. There was a binding contract of sale, which Rampton might have enforced at any time by suit, or, at his election, if the Milnes did not make the deferred payment, he could retain the $900 and still keep his land. An option of the seller to enforce his contract or to rely upon a penalty for noncompliance is something quite different from an option on the part of the buyer. In the one case there is a sale or valid agreement to sell, and in the other a mere option on the part of the buyer to buy or to enter into a contract of purchase. An "option" is not an actual or existing contract, but merely a right reserved in subsisting agreement. It is a continuing offer of a contract, and if the offeree decides to exercise his right to demand the conveyance or other act contemplated, he must signify that fact to the offerer. Rivers v. Oak Lawn Sugar Co. 52 La. Ann. 762, 27 So. 118;

Sizer v. Clark, 116 Wis. 534, 93 N. W. 539. An option is not a sale. It is not even an agreement for a sale. At best, it is but a right of election in the party securing the same to exercise a privilege, and only when that privilege has been exercised by acceptance does it become a contract to sell. Hopwood v. McCausland, 120 Iowa, 218, 94 N. W. 469. "An option is nothing more than a continuing offer to sell; but until it is accepted it does not become a contract of sale, for it lacks the element of an agreement between the minds of the parties. It is only when there has been an acceptance of a proposal to sell that the vendee becomes in any sense the equitable owner of the subject-matter of the option." Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co. v. Shea, 60 C. C. A. 103, 123 Fed. 9, 11. "There is a decided distinction between an 'option' to purchase, which may be exercised or not by the prospective purchaser, and an absolute contract of sale, where one of the parties agrees to sell and the other to buy certain property; the sale to be completed within an agreed time. In the latter case the mere lapse of time with a contract unperformed does not entitle either party to refuse to complete it, and therefore time is not of the essence of the contract; but where the contract is merely an option generally, without consideration, and especially as applied to mining property, of course . . . time is of its essence." Clark v. American Developing & Min. Co. 28 Mont. 468, 72 Pac. 978, 981, citing Snyder, Mines, § 1378.

The cases differ from Re Shields, 134 Iowa, 559, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1061, 111 N. W. 963, in that the parties to the contract both testified in that case that all they intended, understood, or agreed upon was an option, and that they so informed the scrivener, and supposed he had so written the contract. Upon their testimony, a court of equity would have reformed their contract. Not so here. No court would have been justified, on the testimony adduced, in reforming the contract between Rampton and the Milnes. In so far as shown, it was written just as the parties intended, and all they ask the court to do is to put such a legal interpretation upon the contract as they think it will bear. The Shields Case does not hold that the contract is a mere option, but proceeds wholly upon the thought that, under the testimony, the parties intended to create a mere option, and that by mistake of the scrivener it was not so worded. The testimony in such a case should be clear, satisfactory, and conclusive, and of such import as to justify a reformation. That does not appear here. That the vendor might enforce the contract, notwithstanding the provision for forfeiture, is well established by the authorities. See Wilcoxson v. Stitt, 65 Cal. 596, 52 Am. Rep. 310, 4 Pac. 629; Higbie v. Farr, 28 Minn. 439, 10 N. W. 592; Rourke v. McLaughlin, 38 Cal. 196; Mason v. Caldwell, 10 Ill. 196, 48 Am. Dec. 330; Moore v. Smith, 24 Ill. 512.

The trial court correctly sustained the assessment.

The judgment should therefore be affirmed.

Evans, J., dissenting:

I. I am of the opinion that the majority holding is in conflict with the former holding of the court in the case, Re Shields Bros. 134 Iowa, 559, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1061, 111 N. W. 963. An examination of the opinion in the Shields Brothers Case will not, in my opinion, justify the distinction which purports to be made in the majority opinion.

It so happens that in the written contract in the case before us the same blank printed form was used as was used in the Shields Brothers Case, so that the two written contracts are identical in their general nature and in the form of their undertakings. Both parties to the contract involved in the present case testified as witnesses as to the real understanding between the parties to the contract. It is said in the majority opinion that this testimony is a mere interpretation of the written contract by the parties. If this be so, it is precisely what was contended for by the appellants in the Shields Brothers Case, as will appear from the following statement of the issue as made in the opinion in such case: "Shields Brothers appeared before the treasurer pursuant to notice, and, in writing, objected to an assessment on the grounds: First, that the contract between the parties, as evidenced by the writing and by the facts and circumstances attending the making thereof, was not intended or understood to be a contract of sale, or one creating an absolute indebtedness; that, on the contrary, it was mere option, giving Flynn the right to purchase in the future on the terms and conditions specified, and that it was so intended and understood by the parties thereto. Second, that an assessment based on said contract as an item of credit would result in double taxation. And it was upon the issues as thus outlined that the case was tried below and is now presented in this court." At page 561 of 134 Iowa.

It will be seen from the foregoing that the appellants in that case based their appeal upon the contract between the parties, "as evidenced by the writing" and by the "facts and circumstances attending the making thereof." There was no claim made of a mistake in the writing. The parties to the contract were agreed in their construction of it, and acted upon such construction. And all this must be said also in the case at bar. The following comprises all the rest of the discussion and holding of this court in the Shields Brothers Case: "The hearing was had in the district court as in equity, and on such hearing the appellants brought into the record proof of the circumstances attending the making of the contract. Each of the respective parties to such contract was called to the stand, and, over objections as to competency, etc., testified that it was their understanding that mere option to purchase was all that was in contemplation and being granted; that they informed the scrivener that such was their contract and supposed he had so written. A contract rests in the intention of the parties thereto. It is true by general rule that, where the contract has been committed to writing, the nature and extent of the undertakings must be ascertained by an inspection of such writing. Oral evidence is not allowable to work a change or variance in the terms, conditions, etc., as fairly expressed by the writing. But this rule is enforced only where a controversy arises between the parties to the contract or their privies. As against a stranger to the contract, a party thereto may assert that the agreement was other or different, in any respect and to any extent, than that which the writing imports. Livingstone v. Stevens, 122 Iowa, 63, 94 N. W. 925; Logan v. Miller, 106 Iowa, 511, 76 N. W. 1005; Roberts v. First Nat. Bank, 8 N. D. 474, 79 N. W. 997; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 548, note; Page, Contr. §§ 1196 et seq. Now, it may be doubted if the writing here in question imports a sale. In terms the agreement is for a sale, not an agreement of sale. There was to be no change in possession in virtue of the contract, and the appellants were to pay the taxes on the lands for the current year. Moreover, if Flynn failed to present himself on March 1st, following, and make payment, etc., the money paid as of the date of the contract was to be regarded as forfeited, and all his rights should at once, and without action on the part of appellants, cease and determine. But however this may be, we must treat the contract as one granting only the right to exercise an option. The parties to it so intended and understood; and, as we have seen, all other parties are concluded from asserting that it was other or different. And as against a stranger, it is not necessary that the writing be reformed, in an action brought for that purpose, before the real contract can be asserted and made the basis of a recovery or defense. Logan v. Miller, supra. Now, an option is not a contract to pay. It creates no enforceable indebtedness on the part of the person to whom it is granted. Hopwood v. McCausland, 120 Iowa, 218, 94 N. W. 469; Warvelle, Vend. § 125. And, this being true, there cannot arise out of such a contract a taxable credit within the meaning of the Tax Laws of the state." At pages 561, 562, and 563 of 134 Iowa.

It will be noted from the foregoing that grave doubts were expressed by this court as to whether the form of written contract adopted amounted to anything more than an option. This only emphasizes the reasonableness of the attitude of the parties herein in putting an agreed construction upon the contract. There is no claim of fraud or collusion. The evidence on behalf of the appellee is undisputed and unimpeached, either in its facts or its motive. The conduct of the parties with reference to the contract after it was entered into was consistent with their present claim, and that, too, in a very substantial and significant sense. The contract in question was entered into in October. Under the statute, the taxes for the ensuing year became a lien upon the property on the last day of December. The appellant, as owner of the land, paid these taxes, for which he was in no manner liable if the October contract amounted to a sale.

II. I disagree, also, with some emphasis, with the last paragraph of the majority opinion. It is there held that the testimony in such a case as this "should be clear, satisfactory, and conclusive, and of such import as to justify a reformation." Such is the kind of testimony which must be produced in order to justify a reformation as between the parties to the contract. If the same rule is to be applied as between a party to the contract and a third party, then the distinction pointed out in the Shields Brothers Case is wholly ignored. It is there held especially that the existence of a written contract between two parties does not preclude oral evidence to contradict it, as between one of the parties and a third party. Such oral evidence is admissible for the all-sufficient reason that the parties to the suit are not the parties or privies to the contract. It is not essential, in such a case, that it be shown that the written contract is reformable as between the parties thereto.

Of course, if any question of fraud or collusion were involved, or if the evidence were conflicting, the court, as a trier of fact, might properly give greater weight to the written contract and find the facts in accord therewith. But no question of that kind is involved here. The appellee introduced no evidence in the court below, and has submitted no argument here. I think, therefore, the case is ruled squarely by the former case.

I should have less objection to the majority opinion if the Shields Brothers Case were frankly overruled therein. As between the two, however, I think the Shields Brothers Case reached a more equitable result. The contrary holding is not wholesome in its practical operation. We can hardly fail to take judicial notice of the universal custom which obtains in the sale of farm lands, viz., that the contracts are always made with a view to consummation on the 1st of March following. December 31st usually intervenes between the date of contract and the date of consummation, and the practical effect of the present holding will usually result in double taxation.

For the reasons indicated, I respectfully dissent from the majority.

Petition for rehearing denied.

ANNOTATION.

Instrument for purchase of land as a contract or an option.

- I. In general, 576.
- II. Characteristics of options and contracts of purchase — judicial definitions, 580.

I. In general.

The question whether an instrument of an ambiguous character is a contract for the purchase of land, or only an option to purchase, is common to a considerable number of cases, involving ultimate questions of a diverse character. Although the necessity for deciding it most frequently arises in ascertaining the rights of the parties as between themselves, or as against persons claiming through either of them, it is also material in determining whether a broker employed to effect a sale has earned his commission, or whether there has been a breach of the condition in an insurance policy as to sole and unconditional ownership, or, as in RAMPTON v. DOBSON (reported herewith) ante, 569, whether a taxable interest is created thereby. It has been deemed, therefore, that a collocation of the cases involving this common question, rather than one considering it with reference to the ultimate questions involved, is likely to prove useful.

Although the distinguishing characteristics of contracts for the sale of land, and contracts creating merely an option to purchase, are well known (see infra), it is unfortunately true that in a great number of cases there are no earmarks by which the type of contract can be immediately recognized, and the presence of such characteristics cannot be definitely determined until the contract has received judicial construction.

It has been very truly remarked that whether an instrument in writing, transferring an interest in real estate, shall be construed as an absolute agreement, or only an agreement to convey or an option to purchase, depends not on any particular words or phrases, but on the intention of the parties, to be derived from the instrument itself by a consideration of all its parts, and, when that is doubtful, from the circumstances attending it. Barnes v. Rea (1908) 219 Pa. 279, 68 Atl. 836; McHenry v. Mitchell (1908) 219 Pa. 297, 68 Atl. 729.

- III. Instances in which instrument has been held to be a contract of sale, 582.
- IV. Instances in which instrument has been held to be an option only, 593.

The truth of the statement above made that there are no earmarks by which the character of a contract may be immediately known, may be demonstrated by a comparison of the results reached in the decisions on the question.

Thus in some cases contracts have been held to be mere options on the ground that they did not bind the second party to purchase.

And where the contract is held, as a matter of construction, to bind him to complete the purchase, it is more than an option. Thus, it has been held that a contract which does not in express terms bind the second party to buy the property, and to pay the consideration stated, may be considered as binding him to do so, where it is signed by him and stipulates that he shall have a reasonable time within which to have the title to the property examined by his attorney, and recites that as a consideration for the agreement to convey he has deposited in bank a considerable sum of money, to be returned to him if his attorney shall fail to approve the title (Griffith v. Bradford (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 138 S. W. 1072); and that an agreement to purchase may be implied from the fact that the other party has subscribed his name to the instrument, where no other meaning can be attached to the fact of subscription. See Simonson v. Kissick (1871) 4 Daly (N. Y.) 143; Slayden v. Palmo (1909) 53 Tex. Civ. App. 227, 117 S. W. 1054. Again, a contract in which the second party binds himself unconditionally to pay the purchase price is often, for that reason, held to be a contract to purchase.

Thompson* (1912) 21 Idaho, 485, 123 Pac. 497, in which it is said that use of the word "option" in a contract excludes the idea of an absolute agreement to purchase.

But such a contract may nevertheless be an option if, by reason of further stipulations therein, the purchaser may withdraw without incurring any liability other than the forfeiture of his initial payment or deposit.

Thus, in Hanschka v. Vodopich (1906) 20 S. D. 551, 108 N. W. 28, it is held that a provision in a contract that the party of the second part may elect not to make either or both of the deferred payments without incurring any liability for damages because of such election, but that the sole effect of such failure to comply with the agreement should be the termination of all his rights therein and forfeiture of all prior payments, shows the contract to be a mere option.

But a provision for the forfeiture of the initial payment, in event of non-compliance with the terms of sale, does not make the contract a mere option to purchase, where such provision is construed as making it optional with the vendor whether he will accept the stipulated damages or insist upon performance of the contract.

And it has even been held immaterial that the vendor has, by the terms of the contract, no recourse against the purchaser in event of his failure to complete the purchase, other than the retention of the amount paid, as liquidated damages. See Moss v. Wren (1908) 102 Tex. 567, 113 S. W. 739, 120 S. W. 847; Wright v. Suydam (1913) 72 Wash. 587, 131 Pac. 239.

A contract stipulating that the purchase money paid shall be forfeited in case of failure to pay the remainder of the price by a certain date is not a mere option to purchase, where it expressly provides that the obligation to purchase shall remain notwithstanding such failure. Heman v. Wade (1897) 140 Mo. 340, 41 S. W. 740.

A provision in articles for the sale of land, by which the vendee covenants to pay, and the vendor covenants to convey on payment, that if the vendee shall fail in his covenant the contract shall be void, does not convert such contract into a mere option, the contract being void only at the election of the vendor. Canfield v. Westcott (1826) 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 270.

The fact that the down payment constitutes a substantial portion of the sum for which the owner agrees to sell, while not conclusive, goes to show that the parties had in contemplation something more than a mere option (see Fulenwider v. Rowan (1902) 136 Ala. 287, 34 So. 975); and while the fact that the payment made is on account and as part of the purchase price is expressive of an intention to make a contract for the sale of the property, and not merely a contract for a contract (see Simonson v. Kissick (1871) 4 Daly (N. Y.) 143; Bennett v. Egan (1893) 3 Misc. 421, 33 N. Y. Supp. 154; Newell v. Lamping (1907) 45 Wash. 304, 88 Pac. 195), the mere fact that the initial payment is to be applied upon the purchase price does not change the character of a contract, otherwise a mere option (Compton Land Co. v. Vaughan (1917) 33 Cal. App. 130, 164 Pac. 610; Grabenhorst v. Nicodemus (1875) 42 Md. 236).

The fact that a memorandum of agreement stipulates no specific time for performance is a circumstance strongly indicative that it is not an executory contract of sale, conveying an equitable title. Stone v. Snell (1906) 77 Neb. 441, 109 N. W. 750.

Where the agreement shows that it was not regarded by the parties as one of purchase, but that they contemplated the making of such a contract at a future date, such circumstance is indicative of its optional character. See Bennett v. Egan (1893) 3 Misc. 421, 23 N. Y. Supp. 154; Levy v. Kottman (1895) 11 Misc. 372, 32 N. Y. Supp. 241; Seidman v. Rauner (1906) 51 Misc. 10, 99 N. Y. Supp. 862; but compare Gutierrez Del Arroyo v. Graham (1913) 227 U. S. 181, 57 L. ed. 472, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 248.

The court will incline to construe an ambiguous contract as one of sale

rather than as an option, where there is undisputed evidence to the effect that at the time of its execution both parties expressly declared their purpose to enter into such a contract (Heath v. Huffhines (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 152 S. W. 176); or where it appears that it has been treated by the parties as such (see Hopwood v. McCausland (1903) 120 Iowa, 218, 94 N. W. 469; Low v. Young (1912) 158 Iowa, 15, 138 N. W. 828; Standiford v. Thompson (1905) 68 C. C. A. 425, 135 Fed. 991; Arizona Copper Estate v. Watts (1916) 150 C. C. A. 467, 237 Fed. 585).

Where it is manifest that the interest of the second party in the subject-matter of the contract is contingent upon performance by him of the terms of purchase, the contract is a mere option (see Montgomery v. Waldeck (1905) 2 Alaska, 581; Re Shields Bros. (1907) 184 Iowa, 559, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1061, 111 N. W. 963; Brown v. Thomas (1887) 37 Kan. 282, 15 Pac. 211; Moore v. Allen (1909) 109 Minn. 139, 123 N. W. 292; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gulf of Mexico Land & Improv. Co. (1903) 182 Miss. 180, 100 Am. St. Rep. 627, 33 So. 845; John v. Elkins (1907) 68 W. Va. 158, 59 S. E. 961); and it is immaterial that it may be in the form of a deed conditioned upon such performance (see Borst v. Simpson (1889) 90 Ala. 373, 7 So. 814; Arizona Copper Estate v. Watts (1916) 150 C. C. A. 467, 237 Fed. 585), at least, where the condition is precedent and not subsequent (see Bethea v. McCullough (1916) 195 Ala. 480, 70 So. 680).

A provision in a contract for the sale and conveyance of certain land for a stated sum, part of which was paid down, and the balance was to be paid on delivery of the deed, free of encumbrances, within sixty days thereafter, that "in case of failure to make deed, money paid to be returned," does not give the vendor the option of conveying or not, as he may choose. Grant v. Beronio (1893) 97 Cal. 496, 32 Pac. 556.

II. Characteristics of options and contracts of purchase—judicial definitions.

An option is an unaccepted offer to sell and convey within the time stated and upon the conditions set forth in the written agreement. Yerkes v. Richards (1890) 153 Pa. 646, 34 Am. St. Rep. 721, 26 Atl. 221; Barnes v. Rea (1908) 219 Pa. 279, 68 Atl. 836.

An option is a contract by which the owner of property agrees with another that he will have the right to buy that property, for a fixed and lawful consideration, and within a certain time prescribed (Lauderdale Power Co. v. Perry (1918) — Ala. —, 80 So. 476; Hamburger v. Thomas (1909) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 118 S. W. 770); or within a reasonable time in the future (Menzel v. Primm (1907) 6 Cal. App. 204, 91 Pac. 754).

An option is a continuing offer which the offerer may not withdraw until the expiration of the time limited. Adams v. Peabody Coal Co. (1907) 230 Ill. 469, 82 N. E. 645.

The obligation by which one binds himself to sell and leaves it discretionary with the other party to buy is what is termed at law an option, which is simply a contract by which the owner of property agrees with another person that he shall have a right to buy the property at a fixed price within a certain time. Black v. Maddox (1898) 104 Ga. 157, 30 S. E. 723.

An option is simply a contract by which the owner of property agrees with another person that he shall have a right to buy his property at a fixed price within a certain time. By such an agreement he does not sell his land, nor does he at that time enter into an absolute contract to sell and convey; but he does agree to sell something, that is, the right or privilege to buy at the election or option of the party with whom the agreement is made. Barnes v. Rea (1908) 219 Pa. 287, 68 Atl. 839.

An option may be defined as a contract by which an owner agrees with another person that he shall have the privilege of buying the property at a fixed price within a specified time. It is neither a sale of land nor an agreement to sell, but merely the disposal of the privilege of electing to buy at a fixed price within the time limited. Myers v. Stone (1905) 128 Iowa, 10, 111 Am. St. Rep. 180, 102 N. W. 507, 5 Ann. Cas. 912, quoted with approval

An obligation whereby one party, for a valuable consideration, binds himself to sell at a fixed price within a certain time, but which makes it discretionary with the other party to purchase, being a contract by which the vendor stipulates that the proposed vendee shall have the right to buy at such fixed price and within such certain time, or not, at his election, is in law an option. Neeson v. Smith (1907) 47 Wash. 386, 92 Pac. 131.

An option given for the sale of land, supported by a valuable consideration, is not a sale of real estate nor an agreement to sell, but is an executed contract, giving the optionee the exclusive privilege of purchasing within the time limited, and which cannot be withdrawn during the time stipulated for; and upon acceptance within that time it becomes an executory contract for the sale of land. Pollock v. Brookover (1906) 60 W. Va. 75, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 403, 53 S. E. 795.

In Ide v. Leiser (1890) 10 Mont. 5, 24 Am. St. Rep. 17, 24 Pac. 695, it is said: "An option, originally, is neither a sale nor an agreement to sell. It is simply a contract by which the owner of property (real estate being the species we are now discussing) agrees with another person that he shall have the right to buy his property at a fixed price within a time certain. He does not sell his land; he does not then agree to sell it; but he does then sell something, viz., the right or privilege to buy at the election or option of the other party. The second party gets, in præsentia, not lands or an agreement that he shall have lands, but he does get something of value; that is, the right to call for and receive lands if he elects. The owner parts with his right to sell his lands, except to the second party, for a limited period. The second party receives this right, or rather, from his point of view, he receives the right to elect to buy."

An option is an unaccepted offer to sell. It transfers no title or right in rem, but creates a right in personam, and that right is to accept or reject the first offer within a limited or reasonable time in the future. Standiford v. Thompson (1905) 68 C. C. A. 425, 135 Fed. 991.

An option conveys no title to the thing sold, but creates a right in personam, which may be again sold or assigned by the vendee. Womack v. Coleman (1904) 92 Minn. 328, 100 N. W. 9.

An option is not a contract to pay. It creates no enforceable indebtedness on the part of the person to whom it is granted. Re Shields Bros. (1907) 134 Iowa, 559, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1061, 111 N. W. 963.

An agreement in writing to give a person the option to purchase land within a given time, at a named price, is neither a sale nor an agreement to sell. It is simply a contract, by which the owner of property agrees with another person that he shall have the right to buy his property at a fixed price within a given time. HANSCOM v. BLANCHARD (reported herewith) ante, 545.

An option is not a contract by which one agrees to sell and the other to buy, but it is only an offer by one to sell within a limited time and a right acquired by the other to accept or reject such offer within such time. When this privilege is exercised by acceptance, then, and not until then, does it become a contract of sale. Swift v. Erwin (1912) 104 Ark. 459, 148 S. W. 267, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 363; Gard v. Thompson (1912) 21 Idaho, 485, 123 Pac. 497; Re Aurora Gaslight, Coke & Coal Co. (1916) — Ind. App. —, 113 N. E. 1012; Hopwood v. McCausland (1903) 120 Iowa, 218, 94 N. W. 469.

An option is an unaccepted offer which states the terms and conditions on which the owner is willing to sell or lease his land, if the holder elects to accept them within the time limited. If the holder does so elect, he must give notice to the other party, and the accepted offer thereupon becomes a valid and binding contract. The contract of sale or lease fixes definitely the relative rights and obligations of both parties at the time of its execution. The offer and the acceptance are concurrent, since the minds of the contracting parties meet

Where there is a contract between the owner of lands and another person that, if such person shall do a specified act, then he (the owner) will convey the land to him in fee, the relation of vendor and purchaser does not exist between the parties, unless and until the act has been done as specified. Waterman v. Banks (1891) 144 U. S. 394, 36 L. ed. 479, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 646.

The test, in determining whether an agreement is a contract of sale and purchase or a mere option, is: Could the agreement be specifically enforced? Brickell v. Atlas Assur. Co. (1909) 10 Cal. App. 17, 101 Pac. 16.

An option to buy, on condition of making specified payments at specified dates, is not an actual purchase or an executed contract to purchase. Scott v. Merrill (1913) 74 Or. 568, 146 Pac. 99.

An option contract is a contract which gives a party the right to purchase the thing to which the contract pertains. Usually, when applied to real estate, if the party securing the option forfeits whatever he pays for the option in case he elects not to purchase the property, but does not incur any liability for breach of contract, he has merely secured an option to purchase. A contract for the sale of land is one where one party agrees to buy and the other agrees to sell, and each one will be held responsible in damages for a breach of the contract. Williams v. Renza (1910) 4 Alaska, 154.

A written contract for the sale of land is not complete if the vendor has an option to put an end to the contract. Skeen v. Ellis (1912) 105 Ark. 513, 152 S. W. 153.

An agreement is only an option where no obligation rests on the second party to make any payment, except such as may be agreed upon between the parties as a consideration to support such option, until he has made up his mind, within the time specified, to complete the purchase. Brickell v. Atlas Assur. Co. (Cal.) supra.

Unless the contract contains language which may reasonably be construed as an agreement on the part of the vendee to purchase the property, or to assume some obligation thereunder, it is an option contract, and not an agreement of sale and purchase. STELSON v. HAIGLER (reported herewith) ante, 550; Union Sawmill Co. v. Lake Lumber Co. (1907) 120 La. 106, 44 So. 1000; Darr v. Mummert (1899) 57 Neb. 358, 77 N. W. 767; Berwind v. Williams (1895) 172 Pa. 1, 33 Atl. 353; Swank v. Fretts (1904) 209 Pa. 625, 59 Atl. 264.

Where the second party is bound absolutely by the contract to purchase the land, it is not an option, but an agreement of purchase and sale. Thompson v. Wilkinson (1915) 46 Okla. 115, 148 So. 177; Collier v. Robinson (1910) 61 Tex. Civ. App. 164, 129 S. W. 389.

III. Instances in which instrument has been held to be a contract of sale.

A contract, one of the parties to which has given the other, in consideration of the payment of the sum of $500, an option to purchase certain property for the additional sum of $19,500 cash, at any time within sixty days from date, in which case they bound themselves to sell and convey to him or to his assigns by deeds and covenants of warranty the land therein described, entered into within the sixty-day period, whereby the owner acknowledged receiving the sum of $7,500 "on account of purchase price named in the within option [the latter contract having been written evidently on the first], making in all the sum of $8,000 paid by him on account of the purchase money, and in consideration of this payment we do hereby agree to extend the time for the payment of the balance of the purchase money for the period of twelve months from this date, with interest thereon at 6 per cent per annum, and do hereby agree that the said [second party] may at any time pay the balance of the purchase money with interest then due, and that we will, upon payment being made, execute to him titles according to the terms of his option," is a contract for the sale and purchase of the lands in question, and not merely an extension of the time for the exercise of the option. Fulenwider v. Rowan (1902) 186 Ala. 287, 84 So. 975.

A contract, although styled an "option agreement," and in terms granting to the second party the exclusive right of option to purchase certain property, but which also provides that "the full purchase price of said property is $18,000, $12,000 of which said sum has this day been paid as above stated, the remainder, or $6,000, the said party of the second part hereby binds himself and agrees to pay on or before" a certain date, is a contract for the sale of land, rather than a mere option contract. Williams v. Renza (1910) 4 Alaska, 154.

The phrase, "during the life of this option," as used in a contract by which the parties of the first part, in consideration of the performance of the covenants therein by the party of the second part, agreed to convey to the party of the second part an interest in certain mines, in consideration of which the parties of the second part agreed to pay to parties of the first part, at the time of signing the contract, the sum of $500, and a further sum of $14,500 within one year from date, "and to pay all government taxes on the above-described property, in advance, during the life of this option," is not sufficient to change the character of the agreement from an ordinary contract to purchase land, to what is termed an optional contract. Chenoweth v. Butterfield (1908) 11 Ariz. 315, 94 Pac. 1181.

A bond for title, reciting that the obligees have purchased real property and have paid thereon $150, and are to make future payments in the amounts and at the times stipulated, is a contract for the sale of the land, and not merely an option giving the right to buy at the price named within the time specified in the contract. Vance v. Newman (1904) 72 Ark. 359, 105 Am. St. Rep. 42, 80 S. W. 574.

Where the owner of land executed a deed which he placed in escrow, to be delivered upon the payment of certain notes, each of which recited that it was given "for part of the purchase money of" the land in question, the transaction amounted to a sale, and not to a mere offer to sell on the part of the vendor, which the vendee could accept or reject at pleasure, within the time prescribed for the payment of the note. Bonanza Min. & Smelter Co. v. Ware (1906) 78 Ark. 306, 95 S. W. 765.

A memorandum signed by the owner of property, reciting the receipt of $1,000, "being deposit on account of sale by me to him" of certain property for the sum of $16,000, "purchaser to pay" broker's commission, for pavement and street improvements then under way, the taxes for the current year, and to have the rent of the lot on and after a certain date, and further stipulating "possession of lot given and guaranteed to purchaser on transfer of title. Fifteen days given to purchaser for examination of title and making of deed. If title not satisfactory to purchaser, sale to be null and void, and above deposit returned to him," is a valid contract for the purchase and sale of the lot, and not a mere option to purchase. Benson v. Shotwell (1890) 87 Cal. 49, 25 Pac. 249.

An agreement, by the terms of which the owner undertakes to sell and the second party to buy certain premises, for the sum of $10,000, of which payments are conditioned to be made as follows: $3,000 upon the execution and delivery of the agreement, and at least $250 on the first day of each month thereafter, with interest on the unpaid portion of the principal, the second party agreeing to pay the whole of said purchase price and interest on or before a certain date, and, further, to pay all the taxes assessed against the premises and to keep the improvements insured against fire for the benefit of the first party, and further providing that, in the event the second party shall default in any of the conditions or covenants contained therein, the first party shall have the option to re-enter and take possession of the premises and terminate the agreement, in which case he is to retain a part of the purchase price already paid as compensation for occupation and use of the premises, or shall be at liberty to bring an action to enforce payment of the remainder of the purchase price, or to foreclose the interest of the purchaser, constitutes a contract of sale and purchase, and not an option. Brickell v. Atlas Assur. Co. (1909) 10 Cal. App. 17, 101 Pac. 16.

A contract which recites that the owner's attorney, who signed it, has received of the other party "the sum of $200 on account of the purchase money" of certain real estate, "which they sold to him by me," setting forth the terms of sale, and stating: "Terms of sale to be complied with within fifteen days, or deposit will be forfeited," accompanied by an undertaking on the same paper, by the second party: "I agree to make the above-mentioned purchase on terms as stated," is not a mere option, but a contract of purchase. Hazleton v. Le Duc (1897) 10 App. D. C. 379.

The contract expressed in an informal paper, whereby the owner of lands acknowledged the receipt of the sum of $50 as part of the purchase money for the land, describing it, and also stating the terms of payment, concluding: "Said Ellis to have thirty days to raise the money," is not an option, but the evidence of an absolute agreement to sell. Ellis v. Bryant (1904) 120 Ga. 890, 48 S. E. 352.

A contract reciting that the first party has sold the second party certain property for a stated sum, and the payment of the sum of $50, "to further bind this agreement and sale," and that "the conditions of this agreement are that" the second party shall pay to the first party $1,000 on a certain day, as part payment, and that the first agrees to take second party's note for the balance for a term of three years, is not a mere option, but a contract of mutual obligation on the part of the vendor and purchaser. Clark v. Cagle (1914) 141 Ga. 703, L.R.A.1915A, 317, 82 S. E. 21.

An agreement reciting that "whereas parties of the first part have this day agreed to sell and convey, according to the terms and conditions herein-after specified, certain land" therein described, and that "the parties of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of $150 cash to them in hand paid by" the second party, "as part of the purchase price for said land, having this day executed a warranty deed for said land, it is hereby agreed by the parties hereto that the said warranty deed, together with a copy of this contract, shall be placed in escrow . . . to be delivered . . . upon the balance of the purchase price . . . being paid, on or before March 1, 1906. And it is further agreed that if said [second party] fail to pay the balance of said purchase price . . . on or prior to March 1, 1906, the said bank shall deliver said deed to the said parties of the first part," is a contract for the sale of real property, and not a mere option. Kessler v. Pruitt (1908) 14 Idaho, 175, 93 Pac. 965.

A provision in a bond for title that should the obligee or his assignee "fail to pay said sum of money specified in said notes within ten days after the same become due he hereby forfeits all claim to said lots, and all moneys paid thereon; and this bond in such event shall be void, both in law and equity, and the title to said lots shall continue in the original proprietor, as if no sale had been made," does not convert the bond into a mere option to purchase. Mason v. Caldwell (1848) 10 Ill. 196, 48 Am. Dec. 330.

Two instruments executed at the same time and which expressly provided that they should be construed together, the first being in the form of a lease for the term of nine years, but providing that the lessee should pay, as rental, amounts the aggregate of which during the term was equal to the value of the property, that the payments subsequent to the execution of the instrument should bear interest, and that, at the end of the term, if all payments had been made, the lessor should convey the property to the lessee, the only right of re-entry being in case of default in the payments called for, and the other instrument being in the form of an option to purchase the property, containing similar provisions as to payment, conveyance, and re-entry only after default, do not amount to a simple option for the purchase of the property. Re Aurora Gaslight, Coke & Coal Co. (1916) — Ind. App. —, 118 N. E. 1012.

An agreement reciting that the first parties have contracted and agreed to sell to the second party a certain farm then being cultivated and managed by the second party under lease, and agreeing that the first party, during his lifetime, shall receive the rent by him reserved for the use of said land according to the terms of such lease, and that during the period of his lifetime he shall have the same right to manage and control said land as held by him prior to the execution of the agreement, and the second party assuming and agreeing to pay a portion of the encumbrance on the premises, and concluding: "This agreement to sell is made for a good and valuable consideration in addition to the agreement to assume the $2,500 aforesaid, and the parties hereto agree that the performance of the conditions herein named shall be taken as a full and complete payment of the full purchase price of the said land. And upon the fulfilment of the conditions herein named upon the part of W. L. Cone, he shall be entitled to demand and receive of the legal representatives of W. D. Cone a deed, conveying full title to said land," is a contract of sale, and not a mere option of purchase. Cone v. Cone (1902) 118 Iowa, 458, 92 N. W. 665.

An agreement by which the owner of real estate bound himself to convey it if the other parties should pay certain promissory notes given for the purchase price and should execute other notes for the remainder of the purchase price, secured by mortgage, is a contract for the sale of real estate, and not a mere option to purchase, although the contract contained no formal agreement by the vendee to make payment and was not signed by him, where it was delivered to him and he placed it on record and executed the notes for the purchase money, and it was evident that the parties intended the contract to be binding on both. Cross v. Snakenberg (1905) 126 Iowa, 636, 102 N. W. 508.

An agreement stating that A has sold to B certain described lands for a stated sum, to be paid in the instalments mentioned, the placing of a deed for said lands in escrow until the notes given for the purchase price shall be reduced to a certain amount, during which period B shall not encumber said premises in any way or manner, is a contract of sale, and not a mere option of purchase. Gilmore v. Gilmore (1899) 60 Kan. 606, 57 Pac. 505.

A contract is one of sale and not of mere option, where the second party becomes inferentially liable for the amount of the purchase price, notwithstanding it provides that if the purchaser shall fail to make the deferred payments within a reasonable time after the same become due and payable then the contract shall "cease and terminate and be forever void," such provision being one in favor of the seller only. Williams v. Osage County (1911) 84 Kan. 508, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1221, 140 Pac. 858.

A contract by which one party agrees to sell and the other to buy a certain stock of merchandise, the seller agreeing to take the purchaser's equity in certain real estate at a stipulated figure, is, notwithstanding a provision therein that "the said deed for the house and bill of sale for said stock of merchandise shall be put in escrow . . . and that in case of failure to perform his part of this contract said party failing to do so forfeit to the other party the property represented by said deed and bill of sale as damages," a binding contract, and not a mere option to exchange property. Green v. Fist (1913) 89 Kan. 536, 132 Pac. 179.

An agreement reciting that the owners of land agree to sell and do sell such land, describing it, for the sum of $12,000, that in consideration of the covenants made and entered into by the owners the second party "agrees to purchase and does purchase . . . the real estate above described for the sum of $12,000, to be paid as set forth," providing for the execution and deposit of a title deed in escrow, and containing a provision that if the purchaser shall fail to make the subsequent payments he shall forfeit $500 which he paid on the purchase price when the contract was executed, which shall be retained by the parties of the first part as liquidated damages, "and the parties hereto relieved from the further performance of any of the covenants herein set forth, and this contract is to be held null and void and of no effect," is not a mere option, but a contract of purchase. DAVIS v. ROSEBERRY (reported herewith) ante, 564.

An agreement by which the parties of the second part agreed to purchase certain real estate for the sum of $250,000, to be paid one fourth cash, and the balance on or before one, two, and three years, and to pay 5 per cent of the cash payment on or before a certain date, and the residue of such cash payment about two months thereafter, and, further, that "in the event that they do not pay the residue of said cash payment by May 1, 1891, then said sum of $12,500, paid by them on or before the 1st day of March, 1891, shall be wholly forfeited," the first party agreeing that in the event the residue of said cash payment is paid on or before May 1, 1891, and the notes for the deferred payments and the deed of trust to secure them shall be executed and delivered, they will convey by good and sufficient deed, etc., and in which it was further agreed by the parties that in the event that the residue of said cash payment should not be paid on or before May 1, 1891, "then this contract to be null and void and of no effect, except as to the payment of the said $12,500," is not a mere option, but a contract of sale. Allison v. Cocke (1899) 106 Ky. 763, 51 S. W. 593.

A contract reciting that certain persons, the owners of land, "hereby sell to" another person, for the sum of $10 per acre, the lands described, "and we agree to convey said land, and the fee-simple title thereto, to him by a deed of general warranty, and free from lien, defect, or encumbrance," to be executed and delivered as soon as the title should be shown to be perfect and the acreage ascertained by a competent surveyor, "and then he is to pay us the purchase price aforesaid per acre, and we will thereupon surrender possession of said land to him. We agree to do no damage to any of said land or anything upon it, and not to cut any timber upon it. It is agreed that the work in ascertaining the acreage, perfecting the title, and making the conveyance shall be done before December 1, 1907," is an agreement of sale, and not a mere option. Golden v. Cornett (1913) 154 Ky. 438, 157 S. W. 1076.

A contract by which the second party was obligated to accept and pay for the land, according to the agreement, if an abstract of the first party's title to the land disclosed a merchantable title, is not shown to be an option contract by a clause, inserted after the contract was drafted, that "all timber on the above tract of land over 14 inches in diameter, clear of bark, is excepted, and not conveyed in this contract, and, if grantee takes and accepts this contract and takes said land, the grantor shall have ninety days in which to brand the timber over 14 inches in diameter." Bowling v. Bowling (1916) 172 Ky. 32, 188 S. W. 1070.

A contract reading: "We [first parties] hereby sell to [second party] for the sum of $10 per acre, the land herein described, and we agree to convey said land, and the fee-simple title thereto, to him by deed of general warranty," to furnish the title papers, and further providing that, as soon as the title shall be shown to be perfect in first party, the second party shall have the acreage ascertained by a competent surveyor, "and when all this shall have been done we bind ourselves to execute and deliver to said [second party] such deed as herein described, and then he is to pay us the purchase price aforesaid per acre, and we will thereupon surrender possession of all said land to him. . . . It is agreed that the work of ascertaining the acreage, perfecting the title, and making the conveyance shall be done before December 1, 1907," is not a mere option. Golden v. Lewis (1917) 176 Ky. 28, 195 S. W. 144.

An instrument declaring that one party shall transfer and assign to the other certain described property, for and in consideration of a stated sum, of which amount $500 was then and there paid in cash, the balance of the purchase price to be paid on the execution of a satisfactory deed, and declaring that the first party shall have thirty days to perfect the title, and that the second party shall have the right to take such title from him as he has within thirty days from that date, and that the $500 cash payment shall be returned in the event satisfactory title cannot be made, in which event the act shall be null and void, is not a mere option. Whited v. Calhoun (1908) 122 La. 100, 47 So. 415.

A contract providing that the parties of the first part, in consideration of a stated sum, agreed to sell unto the party of the second part such described land for such sum, "which said party of the second part hereby agrees to pay the said parties of the first part, as follows: Upon the execution and delivery of this contract $500; March 1, 1911, $8,560, at which time said second party will assume and agree to pay $9,900, when due, the then balance remaining unpaid upon a certain real estate mortgage now upon such described premises, and at which time first parties will execute and deliver to second party a good and sufficient warranty deed, as hereinafter provided. It is agreed by second party hereto that should he make default in the conditions of the payments herein specified, and neglect or refuse to complete the terms of this contract as herein provided to be done March 1, 1911, the $500 paid upon the execution of this contract shall be retained by the first parties as forfeit money, and to pay them for their trouble and damages by reason thereof. . . . It is mutually agreed between said parties that the said party of the second part shall have possession of said premises on March 1, 1911, and shall keep the same in as good condition as they are at the date hereof until the said sum shall be paid as aforesaid; and, if said party of the second part shall fail to perform this contract or any part of same, said parties of the first part shall, immediately after such failure, have a right to declare the same void, and retain whatever may have been paid on such contract, and all improvements that may have been made on said premises, as liquidated damages," is not a mere

An agreement reciting that parties of the first part agree to sell and party of the second part agrees to buy certain described property, the purchase price to be $3,050, "payable as follows: One hundred dollars upon the date hereof, the receipt of which is hereby confessed and acknowledged by the parties of the first part; $400 upon the examination of a Burton abstract of title, brought down to date, showing good and merchantable title in said vendors, and, upon the execution of a Union Trust form land contract, the balance of $2,550, in semiannual payments of $100 or more, each," etc. "Said parties of the first part are hereby given the privilege of mortgaging the above-described premises in any amount not exceeding $1,500. Deal is to be completed and consummated within thirty days from date thereof. Possession to be given immediately upon said consummation," is not an option, but an executory land contract, valid and of binding force as to the parties thereto. SOLOMON v. SHEWITZ (reported herewith) ante, 557.

An instrument originally a mere option becomes a contract to purchase, where, by indorsement thereon, the optionee agrees to purchase the property upon the conditions prescribed therein. Libby v. Parry (1906) 98 Minn. 366, 108 N. W. 299..

A contract whereby the first party sold and delivered a stock of merchandise and agreed to make a future cash payment, and the second party in consideration thereof agreed to convey, nine months after the cash payment should be made, certain lands, the rents and profits of which were to go to the first party from the date of the contract, is not an option contract, but one for the sale of land. Chapman v. Propp (1914) 125 Minn. 447, 147 N. W. 442.

A contract reciting that "in consideration of $1, receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, I have this day agreed to sell to" the second party certain premises, for the sum of $850,000, payable in instalments as therein specified, and providing that "a failure by the party of the second part to comply with the above contract or to make such payments as they come due shall make this contract null and void," is a contract of sale. Knisely v. Leathe (1914) 256 Mo. 341, 166 S. W. 257, s. c. on subsequent appeal (1915) — Mo. —, 178 S. W. 453.

The contract evidenced by a receipt reading: "Received of [certain persons named] $500 as part of the purchase money on [certain described premises]. The price of said land is $15,000, of which $2,250 is to constitute the first payment, which must be paid on or before April 21, 1887, or this $500 is to be forfeited. Upon the payment of the first payment of $2,250 I will deliver to the above-named parties contracts, on which they are to make the following payments on said lands. . . . Upon the payment of which I will deliver a warranty deed to said premises," is a sale, and not merely an option to purchase. Gibbons v. Sherwin (1889) 28 Neb. 146, 44 N. W. 99.

A contract reciting that "in consideration of the sum of $100 in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, the undersigned . . . hereby grant, bargain, sell and agree to convey to James Wolfe, or assigns," certain described real estate, the said Wolfe to have until the 1st day of January, 1910, and March 1, 1910, "within which to pay the remainder of the consideration of said land," in instalments as specified, and that, "should said Wolfe fail or refuse to fulfil this contract, the amount this day paid is to be forfeited to the undersigned as liquidated damages," impliedly obligates the second party to make the specified payments, and therefore is more than a mere option to purchase. Abel v. Gill (1914) 95 Neb. 279, 145 N. W. 637, 147 N. W. 686.

A contract which does not provide that the owner will convey if the other party elects to pay a certain sum on or before a certain day, but binds both parties, the one to sell and convey, and the other to accept the deed and pay for the property, is not an option. Sit-terding v. Grizzard (1894) 114 N. C. 108, 19 S. E. 92.

A contract by the owner of land to convey for $2 per acre, provided such sum be paid within three years from date, and reciting the receipt of $25 as "earnest" money, is not a mere option, but a contract of sale, which may be specifically enforced, notwithstanding it was not signed by the purchaser. Davis v. Martin (1907) 146 N. C. 281, 59 S. E. 700.

An instrument in writing in these words: "This is to certify that I, Samuel Kissick (the defendant), sell to Peter Gilmore, etc., for the sum of $17,000, the house (describing it), and that I have received the sum of $75, the balance, amounting to $16,925, to be paid in thirty days," signed by both the owner and the purchaser, is not an option, but a contract to purchase, there being nothing to show that the $75 was received by the owner as a consideration for keeping the property thirty days, or that Gilmore might have that time to elect whether he would take it or not. Simonson v. Kissick (1871) 4 Daly (N. Y.) 143.

A contract by which the owner of lands covenants to convey on or before a certain date such lands, and the other party covenants to pay therefor a stated sum on instalments, as specified, but containing the clause: "Provided, however, and it is hereby expressly understood and agreed, that this contract shall be null and void and of noneffect as to either party, the same as if the said contract had never been made, if the said purchase money shall not be paid on or before January 1, 1891," is an option. Yerkes v. Richards (1890) 153 Pa. 646, 34 Am. St. Rep. 721, 26 Atl. 221.

A contract signed by the parties, whereby one agrees to sell and the other to purchase certain realty, and providing that $3,500 of the purchase money should be paid in cash as "hand money," the vendor to give his notes for the same, "to be refunded in case the title should prove unsatisfactory," that a further sum of $19,500 should be paid in cash on the execution and delivery of the deed, and the balance to be secured on the premises, and that the rents, issues, and profits of the property should go to the other party from the date of the agreement, is not a mere option to purchase by reason of a stipulation therein that "the said parties of the second part shall have thirty days within which to examine the title to the said real estate, and only on condition it should prove to be satisfactory to them shall they be bound to perform this contract on their part," as such stipulation does not give the vendee the right to reject the title capriciously. Dillinger v. Ogden (1914) 244 Pa. 20, 90 Atl. 446, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 533.

A contract containing an accurate description of the property in question, an agreement on the part of the vendors to sell and convey, and on the part of the vendee to purchase, and providing for the payment by the vendee to the vendor of the greater part of the purchase money in cash, and, in lieu of the balance, the assumption by the vendee of a certain obligation incurred by a former owner, is in no sense an option, but is clearly an executory contract. Hoon v. Miller (1904) 33 Pa. Co. Ct. 17.

In Hobart v. Frederiksen (1905) 20 S. D. 248, 105 N. W. 168, the facts in which are of no general interest, a contract resting in letters and telegrams passing between the parties was held to be one of purchase rather than an option.

A contract between the owner of property and another, which contains a covenant by the second party to purchase the property for a stated sum, "and to pay for the same at the time and in the manner described above," is not an option, but a mutual contract, enforceable by either party. Heimberger v. Rudd (1912) 30 S. D. 289, 138 N. W. 374.

A contract whereby the owner of land agrees to sell a one-half interest therein to the other party for the sum of $4,850, the other party then and there paying $1,000 and executing a note for the balance, which was placed in the custody of a bank together with a deed executed by the owner, accompanied by a memorandum which, among other things, stated that the bank should hold said deed and note, and should deliver and turn over said deed to the second party upon his payment of the note, is more than a mere unilateral option to purchase land. Sweet v. Purinton (1918) — S. D. —, 166 N. W. 161.

A stipulation in a contract for the conveyance of land that, if the "purchaser fails to comply with the terms hereof relating to the payment and securing of the purchase price as above mentioned and by the time herein designated, purchaser shall forfeit the amount paid hereon to seller, and the same shall be paid to seller by said trustees and accepted by said seller as and for liquidated damages for such injury and damage as the seller may suffer by reason of the non-performance of this contract on the part of the purchaser," does not affect its character as a contract for sale of the land. Moss v. Wren (1908) 102 Tex. 567, 113 S. W. 739.

An agreement stating: "This contract shows that M. Palmo agrees to deed the Brazos plantation farm to S. W. Slayden, or to whom S. W. Slayden may direct, in consideration of $6,000 in vendor's lien notes," and signed by both parties, is not a mere proposition or option. Slayden v. Palmo (1909) 53 Tex. Civ. App. 227, 117 S. W. 1054.

A contract by which the owner of land agrees to sell and convey it to the second party, for the consideration of $19,000, payable in the instalments therein specified, and concluding: "And to bind the above contract we, the above contracting parties, deposit the sum of $1,000 each with Dickson, Moore, & Smith, the same to be forfeited by the party failing to fulfil his part of above contract. This contract to be consummated within thirty days," is something more than an option to purchase, and evidences a valid contract. Newton v. Dickson (1909) 53 Tex. Civ. App. 429, 116 S. W. 143.

A contract signed by both parties, acknowledging the receipt from the second party of $1,000 "as part payment of the purchase money for the following described property, . . . which property we have this day sold to said Baker, his heirs and assigns, for the full sum of $13,500 cash. Upon payment of the purchase money, $13,500 less the amount herein receipted for, we agree to convey or cause to be conveyed to the said Baker, by good and sufficient warranty deed, the above-described property. We hereby agree to furnish within ten days from this date a complete abstract of the above-described property, certified to date. If the title to the said property is not good in the opinion of the said Baker, then the $1,000 herein receipted for shall be returned to him; but if the title to said property, in his opinion, is good, and said property is not taken within ten days from delivery of complete abstract of title of the property to him, then the $1,000 herein receipted for shall be forfeited . . . and this receipt shall then be null and void, and all parties herein named released," is not a mere option, but a contract of sale. Hamburger v. Thomas (1909) — Tex. Civ. App. — 118 S. W. 770.

A contract by which the owners, "for and in consideration of $30,000 cash to us in hand paid and to be paid, of which sum $50 has this day been paid as earnest money . . . agree and bind ourselves to grant, bargain, sell [and] convey" certain real property, and "further agree to furnish within two days hereafter a complete abstract of title to the above-described property for examination by Sun Company, and said Sun Company shall have three days after delivery of the same for the examination thereof and the consummation of this trade. The title to the various tracts of land described herein to be good and satisfactory title, and sellers agree to execute warranty deeds to the same. If title is not satisfactory to Sun Company all parties are released therefrom," signed by both parties, is a binding contract of purchase and sale, and not a mere option. Cheek v. Nicholson (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 133 S. W. 707.

A contract, signed by the parties, whereby the first party obligates himself to sell certain described lands for a consideration to be paid as therein specified, to furnish a complete abstract of title, to convey by a good and sufficient warranty deed, and to give possession of the same upon delivery of the deed, and further reciting that, as a fifth "part of the cash consideration above mentioned, the said A. N. Evans has this day paid to the said Heath $700 cash, and the said Heath has accepted the same as a part of the cash consideration. It is agreed and understood that should there be any defect in said title that the said Heath shall have a reasonable time to cure said defect, and in case that title is not good the $700 this day paid shall be refunded to the party of the second part, but should the said Heath furnish a good and sufficient warranty deed and abstract of title as above set forth, and the said Evans fails or refuses to carry out his part of this contract, the said $700 shall be forfeited to the party of the first part," is a contract of sale and not an option, an agreement by the purchaser to take the land being implied. Heath v. Huffhines (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 152 S. W. 176.

A contract, the terms of which were contained in a letter making a certain offer, and a reply stating: "I am willing to sell you the ranch" for the sum and upon the terms stated, "title to pass when payments are completed, if completed on the date mentioned, you to assume the taxes to accrue this fall, and to assume any expenses in connection with water assessments and trial of water case," is not a mere option to purchase, but an agreement to sell on the one part and to buy on the other. Roberts v. Bruffett (1907) 33 Utah, 51, 92 Pac. 789.

A memorandum in writing, signed by the owner of property, reading: "Received of Charles Langert, $5 as part payment for" certain lots, "conditioned as follows: $2,495 to be paid on or about the 20th day of March, 1888, the balance of $1,500 to run on time to suit C. Langert's convenience. I also agree to furnish said C. Langert a warranty deed upon the payment of the $2,495, and a clear title," is a full contract for the sale of the real estate in question, and not simply an option which terminated by the terms of the memorandum itself on the 20th day of March named therein. Langert v. Ross (1890) 1 Wash. 250, 24 Pac. 448.

A memorandum reading: "This is to certify that I have this day sold to the Wallace Lumber & Manufacturing Company" certain realty, "and also to acknowledge the receipt of $25 in hand paid as part payment of purchase price, namely, $3,000, and it is understood that balance to be paid in ten days from date, if records appear all right," is not merely an option. Anderson v. Wallace Lumber & Mfg. Co. (1902) 30 Wash. 147, 70 Pac. 247.

An agreement reciting that in consideration of the sum of $200, the receipt of $150 of which is acknowledged, the first party will convey to the second party a right of way across his lands according to a certain line of survey, that such party shall have a right to enter upon the lands for the purpose of constructing a ditch along the proposed right of way, across which the second party agrees to construct a bridge at a point to be designated by first party; and that, in consideration of the premises, the first party will execute a good and sufficient conveyance on or before one year from date, upon the payment of the balance of $40 in cash, is not an option, but a mutual agreement. Roberts v. White River Water & Power Co. (1902) 30 Wash. 430, 70 Pac. 1104.

A contract evidenced by a receipt for "$50" as earnest money, to be applied on the purchase of "certain described property," purchase price to be $150 per lot, and conditioned on furnishing a good and sufficient title within thirty days from date," is not a mere option for thirty days, but in effect an agreement to convey the property, and obligates the owner, if he desires to cut off the purchaser's right at the end of the thirty days, to tender a good and sufficient deed and demand the payment of the balance of the agreed purchase price within that time. Newell v. Lamping (1907) 45 Wash. 304, 38 Pac. 195.

In Wright v. Suydam (1913) 72 Wash. 587, 131 Pac. 239, a contract reading: "Received of W. Hammond Wright the sum of $100 as part payment upon purchase price of the following described real estate . . . the balance of the purchase price of the said premises is $7,900, to be paid in cash upon delivery of deed. The undersigned owners of said premises agree within fifty days to deliver to the purchaser an abstract of title . . . and to convey such title to the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, by warranty deed. . . . If, upon investigation, title to the said premises shall be found to be insufficient in any of the respects aforesaid, either in fact or as shown in the abstract, or shall be unsatisfactory to the attorney for the purchaser, the purchaser may at any time thereafter, at his option, elect to have the sums of money heretofore paid by him as part payment of the purchase price immediately repaid to him, and in the event of such election the owners shall return such sums, and all further obligation upon their part shall then cease. . . . If title to said described premises shall not be subject to objection in any of the respects aforesaid, and shall be satisfactory to the attorney for the purchaser, and the purchaser shall fail upon his part to perform any of the terms of this agreement, then the said sum of money first above mentioned shall be retained by the undersigned owners as stipulated damages, and they shall also be entitled to a return to them of the said abstract, and neither party shall be under any further liability," and signed by the owner of the property, was held not to be a mere option contract, notwithstanding the provision therein made that, in case of forfeiture in event of the purchaser's failure to perform, "neither party shall be under any further liability." The court said: "That the contract is not an option in form is apparent from a casual reading of it. It is expressly stated therein that the $100 was received from Wright as part payment upon the purchase price of the land, followed by provisions clearly contemplating the consummation of a sale of the land from Suydam to Wright, amounting to an agreement on the part of Suydam to sell and on the part of Wright to purchase. The argument is, in substance, that Wright cannot, under the terms of the contract, be compelled to specifically perform; that is, that he cannot be compelled to take the land and pay the balance of the purchase price, even though the title is satisfactory to him; that the only remedy available to Suydam is that he may retain the $100 paid upon the purchase price as liquidated damages, resulting from Wright's failure to perform, and that therefore the contract is, in substance, a mere option. This is a plausible argument, but loses sight of the substance of the contract, and rests solely upon the provisions thereof relating to the remedy available to Suydam in the event Wright fails to perform. The fact remains, however, that the contract constitutes an agreement on the part of Suydam to sell, and on the part of Wright to purchase, the land. This, we think, distinguishes it from a mere option contract, which, upon the failure of the prospective purchaser to exercise his option rights within the time agreed upon, would automatically cut off such right without any notice given or demand made for performance by the owner of the land. . . . Now the fact that the contract by its terms confines Suydam's remedy against Wright to the recovery of liquidated damages, and that is what the right to retain the $100 paid upon the purchase price in effect amounts to, does not change the fact that the contract is, on Suydam's part, a promise to sell, and, on Wright's part, a promise to purchase. An agreement in a contract, specifying and limiting the particular remedy available to a party to the contract upon the breach thereof by the other, does not change the respective mutual promises which constitute the substance of the contract. Wright did not contract and pay for a mere privilege to purchase land at a future time, but he agreed to purchase, and paid part of the purchase price. We are of the opinion that the contract is one for the sale of land, both parties being bound thereby as seller and purchaser, respectively, though the remedy of Suydam upon breach by Wright may be confined to liquidated damages."

An instrument reading: "I have this day sold to J. E. Watson the coal under my farm on West Fork river . . . said Watson is to pay one fourth down on the 1st day of May, 1890, when I am to make deed for said coal, as per option made on the 25th of September, 1888. It is further agreed that I am to have interest on all said purchase money from 1st day of November, 1889. The deferred payments in one, two, and three years from 1st day May, 1890," and signed by the owner of the property, is not an option, but an unconditional and absolute contract of sale. Monongah Coal & Coke Co. v. Fleming (1896) 42 W. Va. 538, 26 S. E. 201.

In Wheeling Creek Gas, Coal, & Coke Co. v. Elder (1903) 54 W. Va. 335, 46 S. E. 357, an instrument, signed only by the owner of the property, whereby he agreed to sell and convey to the party of the second part certain coal, "for which the party of the second part, heirs or assigns, shall pay $6 per acre for each and every acre as follows: One third when deed is signed, sealed, and delivered. . . . It is expressly understood and agreed that if the first payment aforesaid is not made on the 30th day of November, A. D. 1899, or as soon thereafter as the title shall be examined and accepted by the party of the second part, or his heirs or assigns, this agreement shall be considered as rescinded, and neither party shall be bound thereby," was held to be not an option, but an actual sale, notwithstanding the presence of the subsequent condition of defeasance.

But compare Standiford v. Thompson (1905) 68 C. C. A. 425, 135 Fed. 991, and Wheeling Creek Gas, Coal & Coke Co. v. Elder (1909) 170 Fed. 215, elsewhere set forth, in which like contracts were held to be mere options; and in the latter of which the above decision is said to be out of harmony with subsequent decisions of the West Virginia supreme court.

A contract reciting that whereas the first parties "are now the owners of, as vendees, of certain leases and options" therein described, "now, therefore, for a valuable consideration, the said first parties do hereby grant, bargain and sell, assign, set over, and deliver unto the said second party all of their right, title, and interest in and to the said options hereinabove described, upon the following terms and conditions, to wit: "With the express understanding and agreement that this contract is to be in force for and during the period of nineteen months from the date hereof, and that on or before the expiration of said nineteen months the said second party is to pay to the said first parties for such options for all the lands described therein the sum of $300 for each and every acre thereof. . . . In other words, the whole 194½ acres to be taken and paid for at the rate of $300 per acre. At which time and upon the payment of which said sum the said first parties are to deliver or cause to be delivered to the said second party a deed of the premises described in said options. It is understood herein that all liabilities attendant as on the option herein described, which are herein imposed upon the said first parties, are to be and are hereby assumed by said second parties," is, although not entirely clear and explicit, a contract to sell, and not a mere option, the agreement by express terms to pay not being optional with the second party. Baraboo Land, Min. & Leasing Co. v. Winter (1907) 130 Wis. 457, 110 N. W. 413.

An agreement, signed by both parties, by which the owner "com-promised himself to sell" certain parcels of land, to be paid for in cash, and another parcel to be paid for "in instalments during the two years following the delivery of the document," and the other party agreed to execute a mortgage to secure the payment, the contract to be "extended in a public document" as soon as a "deal" then pending should be "ultimated," failing which the contract should be void, is a binding contract of sale, and not a mere option agreement. Gutierrez del Arroyo v. Graham (1918) 227 U. S. 181, 57 L. ed. 472, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 248.

An agreement between one, who, as the owner of a warehouse, had transferred it to a bank in satisfaction of his indebtedness, and the bank, whereby the bank offered, if he would take back the property, to lend him money to go on with his business, and he agreed to pay the interest on the debt to the bank, to pay the ground rental, insurance, and all repairs, and to pay for the property "when he could," is sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that he was a vendee rather than the holder of a mere option. Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co. v. Rhea (1903) 60 C. C. A. 103, 123 Fed. 9.

A contract by the terms of which the owner of property agrees to sell and convey, and the other party agrees to pay therefor a certain consideration on a date named, is not an optional one, but a contract of bargain and sale, notwithstanding it provides that, "in the event of a failure to comply with the terms thereof by the said party of the second part, the said party of the first part shall be released from all obligations in law or equity to convey said property, and the said party of the second part shall forfeit all right thereto." Mound Mines Co. v. Hawthorne (1909) 97 C. C. A. 394, 173 Fed. 882.

IV. Instances in which instrument has been held to be an option only.

A deed, given without consideration, purporting to grant certain lands "upon the following conditions only, to wit: The estate herein conveyed shall not vest in [parties], their heirs or assigns, until and unless he or they shall, on or before" a certain day, pay to the grantors a stated sum, "upon the happening of which condition the estate herein conveyed shall become absolute. But if such money shall not be paid on or before said dates, then this instrument to become null and void, and all rights thereunder shall cease and determine," is in effect an option, revocable at any time. Borst v. Simpson (1889) 90 Ala. 373, 7 So. 814.

But such is not the case where the instrument contains a formal grant in fee upon a recited valuable consideration presently paid, followed by a stipulation, not that no title should vest, but in substance that the title thereby vested shall be divested upon a failure to pay the additional consideration; and this, notwithstanding the instrument then proceeded to say that, "if such payment is so made, then this conveyance is binding from the date hereof." Bethea v. McCullough (1916) 195 Ala. 480, 70 So. 680.

A contract between the owner of land and another person, whereby, in consideration of such other person's undertaking to bring to the attention of capitalists the water power on the property and to proceed at once to develop the water power and get ready to subdivide said land, and, within four months from the date of the instrument, to "commence actual operation to develop the water power," the owner agrees "to make a deed of general warranty to the said lands when all the purchase money is paid," and, fixing the time for payment thereof, contained a further provision that "if actual work has not commenced on the development of the water power herein stipulated within the period of four months, then this contract shall be null and void, and no damages shall accrue to the said [second party] and his associates." It was held that the provision giving the second party the right to withdraw at pleasure from the enterprise, within the time limit fixed, without incurring damage therefor, shows that the contract was not more than a mere option to such party and a promise by the owner to sell, on compliance therewith by such second party or assigns. Lauderdale Power Co. v. Perry (1918) — Ala. —, 80 So. 476.

An agreement, signed only by the owners of the property, containing a covenant on their part to sell and convey certain lands to the other party within a certain period, with a corresponding covenant on the part of such other party, in consideration of the owners' covenant, to purchase said lands within the same period, but further stipulating that, upon the payment of the cash part of the agreed price for the land and upon the deposit of certain stock according to the terms of the agreement, the escrow holder shall turn over the deed from the first party to the second party, and that in case the money and stock should not be deposited with the said escrow holder in accordance with the terms of the contract, on or before a stated date, then "the said escrow holder is authorized and directed to return said deed to said party of the first part, or their representatives, for cancelation," is an option, and not an absolute agreement to sell and convey. Montgomery v. Waldeck (1905) 2 Alaska, 581.

A contract reciting the receipt of the sum of $100 "as earnest money and part payment for the following described property, a warranty deed to be furnished as soon as the title is examined, which is guaranteed perfect," and, further, that "the entire deal is to be closed within sixty days," is an option rather than a contract of purchase, there being nothing obligating the second party to take the land if the title should be found to be perfect. Indiana & A. Lumber & Mfg. Co. v. Pharr (1907) 82 Ark. 573, 102 S. W. 686.

An instrument styled an "option deed," by which it was provided that, in consideration of $1 and the undertaking of the other party to pay the sum of $1,000 before a certain date, the owner granted and sold the property in question to the second party, with a further provision that, if the second party should fail to pay the said sum within a certain time, the conveyance should be void and all rights and liabilities thereunder should cease, is a mere offer to sell. Jones v. Lewis (1909) 89 Ark. 368, 117 S. W. 561.

A contract by the owners of stock in a mining corporation as parties of the first part, reciting that the parties of the second part desire to buy stock and mine if the test which they shall cause to be made prove satisfactory, "and shall take possession of the mine and make improvements in it, and that the stockholders shall assign the stock to trustees and that the parties of the second part shall pay, at a time fixed, a certain sum to the trustees for the stockholders, and have the stock, but forfeit their improvements and redeliver possession if they fail to pay," but which contains no obligation on the part of the second parties to purchase the stock, is a mere option. Gordon v. Swan (1872) 43 Cal. 564, 3 Mor. Min. Rep. 84.

An agreement in the following language: "This is to certify that Sandy J. White has an option of purchase of [certain described property] for the sum of $10,200, to be paid as follows, to wit: $250 cash down, the balance of $9,950 to be paid on or before August the 15th, 1903, and if said sum is not paid at said date then the above sum to be forfeited. . . .

We agree to give an abstract of title and also to give possession within thirty days from date if sale is made. Said $250 is receipted as part payment upon said land," amounts to an option to purchase and no more, there being no mutuality of obligation, and the agreement nowhere imposing liability upon White to make the purchase. White v. Bank of Hanford (1906) 148 Cal. 552, 83 Pac. 698.

An escrow instruction directed by a prospective purchaser to the depository, wherein it was stated: "I herewith hand you check for $1,000, and agree to deposit with you $4,500 in cash on or before fifteen days from this date, and agree within said fifteen days to execute and deliver to you one promissory note and mortgage, securing claim on property described below," in favor of the owner of the property, and the depository was instructed to deliver the $1,000, together with the mortgage agreed to be executed and the $4,500 agreed to be deposited, to the owner, upon receipt of the deed for the property, accompanied by a certificate of title, and further providing that "in event you are unable to comply with these instructions within fifteen days from the date hereof, on account of my failure to comply with the terms herein stated, you are authorized to pay to the seller $1,000 as forfeit, and hold balance subject to my order," is a mere option, and not a contract to purchase, in as much as the intending purchaser does not obligate himself to complete the purchase. Pehl v. Fanton (1911) 17 Cal. App. 247, 119 Pac. 400.

A contract for the sale of real property for the sum of $30,000, of which $1,000 was paid forthwith, $14,000 was to be paid on execution and delivery of the deed, and the balance in subsequent instalments, providing that, upon the failure of the second party to comply with the terms of the agreement, the parties of the first part should be relieved from all obligation in law and equity to convey said property, and that all rights of the second party therein should cease, and the said sum of $1,000 should be forfeited as damages, gives the proposed purchaser an option to purchase without any obligation beyond the fact that he is subject to the loss of his forfeit money if he does not complete the transaction. Beckwith-Anderson Land Co. v. Allison (1915) 26 Cal. App. 473, 147 Pac. 482.

An agreement reciting that the owner has received from the second party the sum of $300, "as part payment for the following described real property," and that "the entire price to be paid for the above-described real property is $28,500, and to be paid as follows: Three hundred dollars cash as hereinbefore mentioned. Six thousand two hundred dollars on or before ninety days after date. The balance of $22,000 to be divided in six equal payments," and, further, that "it is distinctly understood that this instrument is an option exclusively, and that the holder of said option has no right to enter on, or in any manner assume ownership or possession of, any part of said above-described property until the above-mentioned $6,200 is paid, and said [second party] has executed above-mentioned notes, and the agreement for sale of real estate, as herein called for, is duly escrowed. A good and sufficient agreement for the sale of real estate, . . . to be executed and delivered . . . on or before [a certain date.] If the said payment of $6,200 is not paid or tendered on or before the said 14th day of March, 1912, then this contract to be void and of no effect, and both parties released from all obligations herein; and in that event the said $300 paid on this date is to be retained by the [first party] as liquidated damages," is a mere option to purchase. Compton Land Co. v. Vaughan (1917) 38 Cal. App. 130, 164 Pac. 610.

stated sum "to be paid as follows: $1,000 to be placed in escrow . . . to be turned over to the party of the first part upon the finding of marketable titles by party of the second part; $30,000 on or before December 1, 1912; $100,000 March 1, 1918, the same to be evidenced by promissory note bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually, to be secured by first mortgage," that the first party will execute warranty deed to the second party, his heirs or assigns, or nominee, "upon the payment of the said $30,000, and the execution of note and mortgage as above set forth," and that "it is mutually agreed that the time of payment shall be an essential part of this contract, and, in case of the failure of the said party of the second part to make either of the payments above mentioned, this contract shall be forfeited and determined, at the election of the said party of the first part, and the said party of the second part shall forfeit all payments made on this contract as liquidation of all damages to party of the first part," is an option to purchase, and not a contract of sale. STELSON v. HAIGLER (reported herewith) ante, 550.

An agreement, signed by the owners only, reciting the receipt of the sum of $500 as part of the purchase price of certain described property, and providing that if a subsequent payment should not be made or tendered on or before a stated date, "then this receipt to be void and of no effect, and both parties released from all obligation herein; and in that event the said $500 paid on this date is to be forfeited as liquidated damages. In case title is found defective and cannot be corrected within a reasonable time, then this deposit of $500 is to be returned, and this receipt shall be null and void," is nothing more than an option of purchase. Hessell v. Neal (1913) 25 Colo. App. 300, 137 Pac. 72.

An agreement by which the owners of land undertook, in consideration of a specified sum to be paid as designated, to sell and convey to the other party, or his assigns, the mineral interests in the land described at any time within a given number of days, if the latter should see fit to pay the balance of the purchase money, but containing no corresponding agreement on the part of the second party to buy such mineral interest and pay the stipulated sum, is a mere option. Black v. Maddox (1898) 104 Ga. 157, 30 S. E. 723.

A contract by which the owner of land agreed to sell it to the second party for $800, to be paid in instalments, to fall due as therein provided, and further stipulating that, in case the second party should fail to pay "one or either of those notes as they come due," he would pay certain rent for the use of said farm, is a lease with an option to the tenant to purchase. Hodnett v. Mann (1912) 10 Ga. App. 666, 73 S. E. 1082.

A contract entered into by the owner of an interest in real estate, which recites that the purchaser agrees to buy the undivided one-half interest of three minor heirs, and that, "if he shall not buy said interest of said minor heirs for the said sum of $2,500, upon the terms aforesaid, then this agreement shall be of no effect, and the first party shall be under no obligation to convey her interest in said property," is a mere option, and not a contract of sale. Martin v. Wilson (1913) 24 Idaho, 353, 184 Pac. 532.

An agreement reciting that the party of the first part has bargained and hereby sells and agrees to convey by warranty deed on or before a certain date, to the party of the second part, certain described realty, and for the same consideration to deliver full possession of said property to the second party on or before such date, and further providing that, if the second party shall fail to pay the second instalment of the purchase price, "this contract shall be null and void and terminate by limitation, and the first party shall keep the said $50, as a forfeiture and damages," is, although ambiguous in its terms, an option rather than a sale, where it appears that all parties to the contract so understood it at the time. Hopwood v. McCausland (1908) 120 Iowa, 218, 94 N. W. 469.

A provision in a lease that the tenant may become a purchaser within the period specified in such lease, by payment of a stipulated amount, is merely an option to purchase, notwithstanding such lease was made in pursuance of an understanding that the lessor should take a conveyance of the land from the owner and execute a lease to the lessee, fixing the rental price of the premises at an amount to be determined by some agreed rate of interest on the amount of money invested, and such amount was the amount for which the lessee might acquire title. Schoonover v. Petcina (1904) 126 Iowa, 261, 100 N. W. 490.

In Re Shields Bros. (1907) 184 Iowa, 559, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1061, 111 N. W. 963, it was held that a contract which recited that the first party "hereby agrees to sell to the second party on the performance of the agreement by the second party as hereinafter mentioned," the second party, "in consideration of the premises," agreeing to purchase certain described real estate for a stated sum, to be paid in the amounts and at the times stipulated, "deed to be delivered and possession given" at a date subsequent to that of the contract, and by which the first parties were to pay the taxes on the land for the current year, and which recited that if default shall be made in payment, "in consideration of the damage, injury, and expense thereby resulting, . . . this agreement shall be void and of no effect, and the second party shall have no claim in law or equity against the first party, nor to the above-mentioned real estate; and any claim, or interest, or right the second party may have hereunder . . . or any payments made hereunder shall, on such default, cease and determine and become forfeited without any declaration or act of the first party. . . . But if said sums of money and interest are paid as aforesaid . . . the first party will . . . execute and deliver a warranty deed to said premises as above agreed," must be treated, in view of the provisions therein above quoted and the testimony of the parties that it was so intended and understood by them, as one granting only the right to exercise an option, rather than as an agreement of sale.

A written instrument, consisting of a printed blank embodying the usual provisions of a contract of sale of land, with certain stipulations written in blank spaces left for the purpose of specifying the description of the property, the names of the parties, and the terms of payment, which, after reciting the consideration to be paid, contained the following stipulation: "If said note of $9,950 is not paid when due, this contract is null and void. Second party forfeits his $50 paid, and first party refunds notes given by second party. It is agreed that tile now on said land, not laid, shall be property of the second party," may be construed in the light of the circumstances under which the blank contract was filled out and signed, and the subsequent practical abandonment thereof by the second party, indicated by his proposal to the first party to effect a second sale of the land to another party on wholly different terms from those embodied in the contract, as evidencing an intention of the parties to enter into a contract which would give the second party nothing more than a mere option. Low v. Young (1912) 158 Iowa, 15, 138 N. W. 828.

An agreement for the sale of real estate upon certain conditions precedent, by which neither a legal nor an equitable title is conveyed to the purchaser, and the provision for forfeiture in which showed it to be clearly the intention of the parties that such title should not pass until the purchase price was paid, and stipulating that time shall be of the essence of the contract, and that the failure to perform any of its conditions shall render the contract null and void, is a mere option to purchase. Brown v. Thomas (1887) 37 Kan. 282, 15 Pac. 211.

An agreement, reciting a consideration of $1, to sell land for a certain price, and providing that the party of the second part shall have twelve months to explore for metals and minerals, that the party of the first part shall continue in possession, and that in case payment or other satisfactory arrangements to complete the bargain shall not be made in the time specified, "then all obligations, express or implied, under this agreement, shall cease and neither party shall have any claim, either in law or equity, on the other by virtue of this agreement," is a mere option. Litz v. Goosling (1892) 93 Ky. 185, 21 L.R.A. 128, 19 S. W. 527.

An agreement by the owner of a tract of land, reciting the consideration as $1 paid by another, to convey such land, upon the payment of $3 an acre, within twelve months of its date, and not binding the other party in any way, is a mere option. Noble v. Mann (1907) 32 Ky. L. Rep. 30, 105 S. W. 152.

A contract binding the owner of land, for a valuable consideration, to convey the land to the other party and his assignees upon demand, in payment of the purchase price within one year, but which does not bind the other party to take the land at any time, is merely an option. Fields v. Vizard Invest. Co. (1916) 168 Ky. 744, 182 S. W. 934, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 336.

A contract by which the vendor alone is bound, and which provides that, in the event that the party of the second part shall fail to fulfil the agreement therein entered into, the sum therein acknowledged as paid shall be forfeited to the party of the first part is merely an option. HANSCOM v. BLANCHARD (reported herewith) ante, 545.

An agreement entered into between the owner of property and another, whereby he agreed that the other party might, during the year, purchase the same for the sum of $5,000, and the other agreed and obligated himself to pay to the owner for the privilege the sum of $1,000, at the expiration of the year, if he did not purchase the property for the aforesaid sum of $5,000, and stipulated that, if he should complete the purchase within the year, the $1,000 should be considered as included in the purchase money and should not be required of him, is not an agreement of sale, but a mere option. Grabenhorst v. Nico-demus (1875) 42 Md. 236.

In Womack v. Coleman (1904) 92 Minn. 328, 100 N. W. 9, an agreement reciting that whereas the party of the first part "has represented that he holds an option of purchase on the hereinafter described property, and that said option expires on or about the 1st day of April, A. D. 1901, and whereas he is desirous of conveying an option and confirming the sale of the hereinafter described premises to" the second party, the said party of the first part, in consideration of the covenants and agreements of said party of the second part, "does hereby sell and agree to convey or cause to be conveyed unto the said party of the second part or his assigns, by deed of warranty, upon the prompt and full performance by the said party of the second part of his part of this agreement, the following described premises . . . and the said party of the second part, in consideration of the premises, hereby agrees to pay to the said party of the first part as and for the purchase price of said premises, the sum of $145,000, in manner and at the times following, to wit: First, at the signing of this contract, said second party's certain promissory note for $15,000 "shall be placed in escrow," conditioned that the said second party shall fulfil the terms of this contract, and, should he not fulfil same, that the said note, or the moneys equivalent thereto, shall be absolute forfeiture and indemnity to the said party of the first part, or those whom he may represent, and that this agreement and all the conditions thereof, upon such forfeiture, shall be absolutely null and void as to all parties thereto," the agreement further providing that, should the title of the property prove defective, the said note should be returned to the second party, and that, should the first party for any reason be unable to fulfil the conditions of the contract and deliver deed of warranty to the property, "then and in that case this agreement shall be void and of no effect, and the said forfeiture hereinbefore set forth shall be returned in full to the said party of the second part, time being of the essence of this contract," although in the form of a contract of purchase and sale, was held to be no more than an option, the second party not being obligated to make the remaining payments and accept the conveyance, even though a good and sufficient title should be tendered.

An agreement, signed by the owner's agent and the prospective purchaser, whereby the latter agreed to purchase the premises for a stated sum, and $50 was acknowledged paid as earnest money and in part purchase, $450 was to be paid on or before sixty days after date, and the balance on or before one year from the date of closing the deal, and also providing that in case the title to the premises could not be perfected the agreement should be void and the $50 refunded, but that, if the title was perfected and not taken within sixty days from the date thereof, the $50 was to be forfeited, is only an option. Libby v. Parry (1906) 98 Minn. 366, 108 N. W. 299.

A contract witnessing "that said first party agrees to release and convey by quitclaim deed, without covenants, to second parties, or to any person designated by them or either of them, within three years from and after the date hereof, with the right to said second parties to demand an extension of said term of two years' additional time, if they should require and so elect and demand, which additional time, if required and demanded, said first party agrees to extend and grant . . . for $500 for each and every lot, all his interest in and to the following described" city lots, the second party agreeing to assume and pay all taxes and assessments assessed or levied upon the premises during the life of the contract, and interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, from the date of the contract to the date of any conveyance which might be executed by the first party under the terms of the contract, the second party being given the right to build a house on each of certain described lots, and agreeing to build not less than five such houses, to cost not less than a stated amount, and to be completed within four months, "and to keep and maintain such work so that every of said lots and property affected thereby shall be free from judgment, attachment, and liens of any kind or sort whatsoever; and containing a further provision that whenever a house and lot should be sold by the second party the first party would receive in payment a mortgage thereon; that in event of the second party's failure to comply with his undertaking the first party should have the right, at his election, to cancel and terminate the contract and all rights of the second party thereunder, it being further expressly understood and agreed "that said second parties have no estate, right, title or interest in or to said lands or any of them in this contract described, beyond the right to build and construct houses on certain of said lots, and to handle and control the sale of all said property to third parties at prices and upon making payment as herein provided; but all and every of said lots are to remain the property of said first party until conveyance and release is furnished in accordance herewith,"—is an option for the sale of real estate, and not an executory contract of purchase. Moore v. Allen (1909) 109 Minn. 139, 123 N. W. 292.

An instrument reciting that the party of the first part, in consideration of the sum $1 in hand paid, and in further consideration of the benefit derived from the location of the railroad of the said party of the second part across the land of the party of the first part, "does by these presents hereby agree to the contract and sell and convey by deed of warranty to the party of the second part" certain described lands, "and the party of the first part agrees to execute and deliver to the party of the second part a warranty deed to said land at any time within two years from the date of this instrument, whenever required by the party of the second part so to do; provided and upon condition, nevertheless, that the said party of the second part, their successors or assigns, or legal representatives, pay to the party of the first part the whole sum of $1 for the amount of land so conveyed as aforesaid," conveys no title, but gives simply an option to demand a conveyance within two years from the date, upon tender of the purchase price. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gulf of Mexico Land & Improv. Co. (1903) 82 Miss. 180, 100 Am. St. Rep. 627, 33 So. 845.

An instrument in the form of a deed, witnessing that the parties of the first part "have granted, bargained, and sold, and by these presents do grant, bargain, and sell, unto the party of the second part," certain described premises, and stating: "The conditions of this indenture are: First, the parties of the first part are to receive on the 1st day of October, 1897, the sum of $100 per acre for said lands, payable on that day as follows: $500 in cash and the balance thereof in three promissory notes of equal amounts, due in one, two, and three years . . . said notes to be secured by a first deed of trust upon said lands; . . . second, at the time of the payment of the said cash and notes and trust deed securing the same the said parties of the first part shall deliver to the party of the second part a good and perfect warranty deed of said lands; . . . third, the party of the second part has the right to enter upon said lands for the purpose of drilling for mineral, to sink a shaft or shafts thereon, and to extract ore therefrom; to build and equip a reduction plant thereon; to use timber, stone, and other material for its construction from said lands; at all times having due regard for the preservation of the growing crops thereon," is, notwithstanding the use of the words, "grant, bargain, and sell," nothing more than an option. Dunaway v. Day (1901) 163 Mo. 415, 63 S. W. 731.

A contract reciting that the first party, in consideration of the sum of $20,000, to be paid as thereafter specified, "has this day sold in fee simple" to the second party the certain described premises, and in which the second party, for himself and assigns, agreed, "subject to the conditions hereinafter named, to pay the said sum of $20,000 as follows," but concluding: "It is understood that, if the said [second party] or his assigns shall neglect or fail to pay or make tender of the first payment of $5,000 on or before the time stipulated, then this agreement to be wholly void, and shall cease to be binding on either of the parties hereto," is a mere option. Ramsey v. West (1888) 31 Mo. App. 676.

A contract which simply provides that one party may purchase the land of the other party at a stipulated price, if the amount should be paid on or before a certain date, and, if not paid by that time, then that said contract should be null and void, constitutes a mere option to buy the property within the time specified, and gives neither party any claim for damages for its violation. Huggins v. Safford (1896) 67 Mo. App. 469.

A contract for the purchase of land, containing a clause stating: "It is understood and agreed that said purchase shall be made at the option of the said party of the second part, and if said party of the second part does not elect to so purchase said land on or before said 1st day of January, 1903, then this contract shall be null and void," is a mere option. Wallace v. Figone (1904) 107 Mo. App. 362, 81 S. W. 492.

An agreement stating that, "in consideration of the covenants and agreements herein specified, the said party of the first part hereby agrees to sell unto the said party of the second part the following described real estate . . . for the sum of $2,000, $400 of which has been paid in hand, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged. Now if the said party of the second part shall pay to the party of the first part punctually the several sums set forth, and at the dates set forth below, to wit . . . then the said first party will convey or cause to be conveyed to said party of the second part by warranty deed, the above-described premises," is simply an option. Darr v. Mummert (1899) 57 Neb. 378, 77 N. W. 767.

In an instrument stating: "We . . . do hereby agree to sell [certain described property] to Henry Rothmann, and I, Henry Rothmann, hereby do agree to purchase the above-described premises, at the purchase price of $34,650, and pay in hand to [first parties] $50, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, to bind contract, which is to be executed at [a place named] and upon payment of $1,000, and the balance according to contract as follows," etc., is not an enforceable contract for the sale and purchase of the real estate therein referred to, but was merely—at least, so far as the vendee was concerned—an agreement that he would thereafter execute a contract to purchase, or forfeit the $50 paid as liquidated damages. Bennett v. Egan (1893) 3 Misc. 421, 23 N. Y. Supp. 154.

The contract evidenced by a receipt for "the sum of $50 on account of contract price of $25,500 on the sale of [certain described premises], $950 to be paid on this day and $24,500 on the delivery of the deed, the contract to be made at the office of" a person named, and signed by the owner of the property, is not a contract for the purchase and sale of the premises, but merely an option. Levy v. Kottman (1895) 11 Misc. 372, 32 N. Y. Supp. 241.

A memorandum stating that A sells to B a certain house, "selling price $29,800, on which Mr. Kurzman lets $25 deposit. . . . Contract to take place at" a certain place and at a certain time, "$725 to be paid on contract," is nothing more than an option, and certainly not an enforceable contract. Seidman v. Rauner (1906) 51 Misc. 10, 99 N. Y. Supp. 862.

A contract by which the owner of land binds himself at any time previous to a fixed date to sell a certain tract of land to anyone whom the second party may direct, for a designated sum, but not obligating the second party to pay such sum, is an option. Alston v. Connell (1906) 140 N. C. 485, 53 S. E. 292.

A contract reciting the receipt of the sum of $300, "on account of purchase price of $10,000, for the following real property . . . terms of sale are as follows: I am to furnish complete and satisfactory abstract of title and warranty deed, conveying a good and marketable title in fee simple, free of encumbrances, satisfactory to the attorney of the nominee of said F. V. Andrews & Co. . . . If said title is not satisfactory as aforesaid, I agree to refund the said $300," and signed by the owner only, is a mere option to purchase. Friendly v. Elwert (1909) 57 Or. 599, 105 Pac. 404, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 357.

A receipt describing certain realty, and stating therein in effect that the money was received as earnest of the payor's intention to purchase the land in question at an agreed price, to be paid as specified, with an agreement that in case of failure of title or if for any other cause the land should not be conveyed free of encumbrances, the money should be returned, and that the "purchaser failing to make the payments above specified, the deposit money will be forfeited as stipulated damages," is a mere option, and not a contract of purchase. Scott v. Merrill (1913) 74 Or. 568, 146 Pac. 99.

An agreement to purchase land, with a stipulation that if the purchaser does not make the payment provided by the agreement within the limit of the time specified, the agreement shall be null and void and all parties released from liability, is a mere option. Verstine v. Yeane (1904) 210 Pa. 109, 59 Atl. 689.

An agreement entered into by one who had procured options from divers landowners giving him the right to elect to purchase the coal underlying their respective properties, within certain limits and at certain prices, and who, in addition to the option coal, owned or controlled a couple of tracts in his own right, by which he agreed to grant, bargain, and sell to the second party all the coal or land optioned by him as therein described and to convey the same to said second party or his assigns by deeds of general warranty in fee simple, provided that on or any time before March 2, 1901, said second party should give to said first party notice in writing of his election to accept the property described, "in consideration whereof said second party, for himself or his assigns, agrees to pay to said first party the sum of $1, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, in full for this option, and, in the event of this agreement being absolute by the election and notice above mentioned, then and not otherwise said second party agrees to pay said first party the sundry sums between the prices mentioned in said options to the individual farmers, and the sum of $40 per acre for each and every acre which may be taken up and to which good titles are to be had, payable as follows: When the deeds are delivered from the present owners the payments to the farmers to be as stipulated in the options, and the same may be determined by surveys," is not a contract for the sale of land, but one for the sale of the option. Strasser v. Steck (1907) 216 Pa. 577, 66 Atl. 87.

An agreement by which one party agrees to sell and convey, and the other agrees to pay or cause to be paid a certain sum in manner specified, but containing a clause "that, in case payment is not made as hereinbefore stipulated, then this agreement to be null and void and of no effect whatever, and all parties hereto to be released from all liability hereunder," is an option to purchase, and not a binding contract of sale. McHenry v. Mitchell (1908) 219 Pa. 297, 68 Atl. 729.

An agreement by which the first party agrees to sell and convey to the second party certain mineral rights, "for which the party of the second part, their heirs or assigns, shall pay $60 per acre for each and every acre, as follows: one fourth of the purchase money at the time of making and delivering of said deed, and the balance in three equal annual payments from the date of said deed with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum on deferred payments. An abstract deed with a certificate of title to be made to [second party] when the first payment is made, and the others are secured by . . . mortgage on the property hereby sold.

. . . It is expressly understood and agreed that if the first payment aforesaid is not made on October 2, A. D. 1899, or within ten days thereafter, this agreement shall be considered as rescinded and neither party shall be bound thereby," is not a completed contract of sale, but a mere option to purchase. Barnes v. Rea (1908) 219 Pa. 279, 68 Atl. 836.

And see also, to the same effect, Barnes v. Rea (1908) 219 Pa. 287, 68 Atl. 839.

A contract which expressly states that its purpose is "to give to the party of the second part an extension of thirty days to carry out the terms of the written contract previously made" and executed by the same parties, which was conclusively of an optional character, is not to be construed as converting the agreement, as between the parties, from an option to a contract of purchase and sale, by reason of a recital therein "that the terms in the contract are to be complied with on or before" a day named,—especially where it has been treated by the parties as a mere extension of the option. Standiford v. Kloman (1912) 284 Pa. 443, 83 Atl. 311.

An agreement signed only by the owner of land, wherein he agrees to convey to the party of the second part on payment of a stated sum on a certain date, is not a contract of purchase, but simply an option. Gira v. Harris (1901) 14 S. D. 537, 86 N. W. 624.

An agreement by the owner of land, reciting that the "party of the first part, for the consideration of $8,000 as purchase price by the party of the second part, the payment to be as follows: Four hundred dollars in hand paid to party of the first part . . . as earnest money and part payment, and $3,600 cash within thirty days of above date, together with three notes," etc., agrees to convey and deliver within thirty days certain described lands "together with clear title and abstract to date, and with above property include implements and stock as per bill of sale attached to this contract; also purchaser of said property is to receive one third of the present crop of cabbage, to be marketed and delivered on market, also to give peaceable possession to the above property upon the consummation of this deal within thirty days of above date," party of second part agreeing "to comply with the above conditions within thirty days or forfeit earnest money," but which contains no agreement on the part of the second party to take and pay for the lands, is merely an option, although it contains the further stipulation that "both parties agree to comply with the above conditions and clear this transaction through" a certain bank. Runck v. Dimmick (1908) 51 Tex. Civ. App. 214, 111 S. W. 779.

A contract in which the prospective purchaser agrees that the sum of $2,000, paid to the seller as part of the cash payment, shall be forfeited to the seller in event the former shall fail or refuse to perform his part of the contract, but that it shall be returned to the buyer in event the title should be found defective, and that "in the event the buyer forfeits the $2,000 paid, and the contract thereby is at an end, then the said sum is to be divided between the seller" and the seller's agent, is an option contract, and not an absolute sale. Slade v. Crum (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 193 S. W. 723.

A contract which expressly stipulates that the second party does not agree to make any of the other payments therein specified, that "failure for thirty days to make any of the payments at the time herein specified shall, at the option of the parties of the first part, work an absolute forfeiture of this agreement and of all moneys theretofore paid for said party to the second part thereunder," is conditional, and not absolute. Title Guaranty & T. Co. v. McDonnell (1908) 32 Wash. 418, 73 Pac. 484.

An agreement by which one party agrees to sell and convey to the other certain lands, for which the other party agrees to pay a specified sum, is an option, and not a contract of sale, where it also provides that the second party shall have until a certain date in which to elect whether to take the land, and that in case he shall fail to pay the purchase money on or before such date, or elect not to take the property, "then this agreement shall be null and void, and the parties thereto shall be mutually relieved therefrom." Pollock v. Brookover (1906) 60 W. Va. 75, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 403, 53 S. E. 795.

An agreement witnessing that in consideration of $1 in hand paid, and for the further consideration of $150 per acre for each and every acre used by second parties for a railroad over the premises, "and to be paid upon delivery of the general warranty deed after notice of acceptance by said second party," and containing the stipulation that, if the railroad should not be "commenced or constructed across said land within twelve months from this date, then this contract shall be null and void and of no effect; but, on the other hand, if the road is commenced or constructed within twelve months from this date across said land, then said second party shall be entitled to hold such strip of land in fee simple . . . and it is further agreed that in the event that the said second parties fail to complete said railroad within twenty-four months from this date, then said second parties shall pay to said first party a forfeit or penalty of $200 for every year said second parties fail to complete said railroad," is an option, and not an executory contract. John v. Elkins (1907) 63 W. Va. 158, 59 S. E. 961.

A contract reciting the execution of a promissory note in consideration for the sale of land, and giving the maker thereof the option to pay the note at maturity or offset it by a conveyance of other lands, evidences a sale of the land of the promisee, not an exchange of lands, and constitutes a mere option of sale of the land of the promisor, to be exercised before the date of the maturity of the note. Womack v. Agee (1916) 79 W. Va. 22, 90 S. E. 792.

An agreement by which the owner of real estate agreed that on the payment by a city of a certain sum down, and a certain further sum on or before ten years from that date, with interest, the owners of the property would convey it to the city on demand, and that in the meantime the city should pay the taxes, and if the city should fail to make any payments of purchase money or interest, or to pay the taxes, the owners might foreclose all right or equity of redemption of the city in and to the premises, and by which the owners of the land agreed that the contract should create no corporate liability whatever against the city, is merely an option, and not a contract to purchase. Perigo v. Milwaukee (1896) 92 Wis. 236, 65 N. W. 1025.

A contract entered into for the purpose of settling an action brought upon an undertaking given upon appeal from a judgment foreclosing a land contract, whereby the owner stipulated that in consideration of $325 then paid and $12,000 to be paid by defendant's wife within thirty days the said lands were to be conveyed to the wife, the action dismissed, and the surety released, and that in case said sum should not be paid within such thirty days, then the sum of $325 should be forfeited and a deed for the property placed in escrow should be handed back to the grantor, and a further contract stating that in consideration of the sum of $625 "it is hereby agreed that the time for the performance of the stipulation heretofore entered into . . . shall be and the same hereby is extended for sixty days; and in consideration of such extension, it is agreed that Mary E. Jacobs or her assigns shall, at the expiration of said sixty days, pay the sum of $11,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, and on such payment shall be entitled to a conveyance of the lands mentioned in said prior stipulation in fee simple: Provided, however, that in case said sum is not paid upon the said date, that the $1,000 paid into said bank shall be forfeited," but not signed by Mrs. Jacobs, constitutes an option to buy, and not a contract for the sale of the lands in question. Nelson v. Stephens (1900) 107 Wis. 186, 82 N. W. 163.

coal lands agrees to sell and convey to the other party, and the other party agrees to pay a specified price therefor, but which contains a stipulation that "if the first payment aforesaid is not made on or before the 1st day of October, 1900, or as soon thereafter as the title shall be examined and accepted by the party of the second part . . . or his heirs or assigns, this agreement shall be considered as rescinded and no party shall be bound thereby," is an option rather than a contract of purchase, especially where it has been so characterized and treated by the parties. Standiford v. Thompson (1905) 68 C. C. A. 425, 135 Fed. 991.

In Wheeling Creek Gas, Coal & Coke Co. v. Elder (1909) 170 Fed. 215, the court, in construing a like contract, elected to follow Standiford v. Thompson (Fed.) supra, rather than a decision of the West Virginia court of appeals, on the same contract, in (1903) 54 W. Va. 335, 46 S. E. 357, construing the contract not as an option, but as an actual sale.

In Arizona Copper Estate v. Watts (1916) 150 C. C. A. 467, 237 Fed. 585, the owners of a large tract of land, which they wished to sell, met a possible purchaser who wished to obtain a deed to the property because he thought he could use that better for the purpose of selling the land. It was finally agreed that the property should be deeded to a corporation formed for the purpose, which executed its notes for the agreed price, and also a reconveyance, to be void in case the notes should be paid according to their tenor and effect. No payment was ever made on the notes and no foreclosure suit was ever brought upon the indenture purporting to have been given to secure the payment thereof. The corporation never at any time took possession of said real estate nor asserted ownership over the same. Fifteen years thereafter the successors in interest of the original owners of the property brought suit to quiet title. It was held that the instrument would be construed in the light of the intention of the parties as creating merely an option of purchase.

An agreement contained in a contract for the sale of land, whereby, "as a further consideration for the within transaction, the purchaser hereby covenants and agrees to and with the said vendor, to give said vendor a transfer" of certain described lands, "on the vendor first paying the said purchaser the sum of $500, and interest thereon at 6 per cent from the date hereof, such payment to be made on or before the 1st day of December, 1906, and, if not then made, the said purchaser shall be at liberty to cancel this agreement to convey said land," only gives an option to purchase. Paterson v. Houghton (1909) 19 Manitoba L. R. 168. E. S. O.

v.

DES MOINES CLUB, Appt.

(— Iowa, —, 170 N. W. 461.)

Damages — increase in cost of living.

1. The increase in the cost of living and in all the necessities of life over the cost at the time lower verdicts allowing damages for personal injuries were rendered must, to some extent, be taken into consideration in determining whether or not a verdict in such a case was excessive.

Appeal — second appeal — law of case.

2. A ruling upon one appeal that the case should have been submitted to the jury is binding on second appeal where the evidence is practically the same as on the former one.

— refusal of instructions — error.

3. The refusal of requested instructions is not reversible error if the instructions given were full and complete and fairly submitted the case to the jury.

[See 2 R. C. L. 261.]

— immaterial evidence — introduction by both sides.

4. In the absence of a showing of prejudice a case should not be reversed for admission of evidence of a conversation regarding the condition of a gate subsequent to the accident upon which the action is based, if the conversation is gone into by counsel on both sides.

Elevator — unsafe gate — liability of owner.

5. An instruction in an action to hold the owner liable for injuries caused by failure of an automatic gate guarding an elevator well to operate, that plaintiff cannot recover unless it appears from the evidence that defendant had notice that the gate was not in place or not in working order for a sufficient time prior to the accident to have enabled the same to be remedied, is not unfavorable to defendant.

Damages — amount — tubercular infection.

6. Eight thousand dollars is not excessive to be allowed for injuries to one falling down an elevator well, although his immediate loss of time and earnings together with pain and suffering endured are comparatively slight, if he suffered a curvature of the spine, and increased temperature and loss of weight, in the opinion of expert witnesses, indicate possible tubercular infection.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Parker, Parrish & Miller, for appellant:

The verdict of $8,000 for the plaintiff is clearly so grossly excessive and so clearly the result of passion and prejudice that it should be set aside and a new trial granted.

A verdict resulting from passion and prejudice is tainted and should be set aside in furtherance of justice, and cannot be cured by reduction or remittitur.

Chapman v. Pfarr, 145 Iowa, 196, 123 N. W. 992; Ahrens v. Fenton, 138 Iowa, 559, 115 N. W. 233; Darland v. Wade, 48 Iowa, 547; Waltham Piano Co. v. Freeman, 159 Iowa, 567, 141 N. W. 403; Jolly v. The evidence fails to establish actionable negligence on the part of the defendant, either with respect to the lighting of its premises and the elevator, or with respect to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the gate to its elevator shaft, and, therefore, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

Trybula v. A. Plamondon Mfg. Co. 153 Ill. App. 298; Moran v. Racine Wagon Co. 74 Hun, 454, 26 N. Y. Supp. 852; Skellenger v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 61 Iowa, 714, 17 N. W. 151; Kitteringham v. Plaintiff's failure to heed said automatic warning was negligence.

Massey v. Sellers, 45 Or. 267, 77 Pac. 397; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 25; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Collier, 88 C. C. A. 127, 157 Fed. 347; Walker v. Louis Werner Sawmill Co. 76 Ark. 436,

88 S. W. 988; Van Winkle v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 93 Iowa, 509, 61 N. W. 929; Coles v. Union Terminal R. Co. 124 Iowa, 48, 99 N. W. 108; Accousi v. G. A. Stowers Furniture Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 87 S. W. 861; Dunn v. Kemp & Hebert, 86 Wash. 188, 78 Pac. 782.

It was error to allow plaintiff in rebuttal to contradict defendant's witness, Murphy, in reference to the immaterial fact to which he had testified on cross-examination, that the ground-floor gate to the elevator shaft had not stuck, a year after the accident, on an occasion when the plaintiff claimed he and Murphy had tried the gate and it had stuck.

Seibert v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 182 Iowa, 58, 106 N. W. 507; State v. Wasson, 126 Iowa, 320, 101 N. W. 1125; State v. Sheridan, 121 Iowa, 164, 96 N. W. 730.

Defendant was entitled to presume that the gate would continue to perform its functions, and that the defendant would not be responsible, in the absence of notice, if the gate was stuck and up at the time of the accident.

Mr. C. Woodbridge also for appellant.

Stevens, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is the second time this case has been before us on appeal. Upon the former trial, the court directed the jury to return a verdict for defendant upon the ground that no negligence was shown. The question of plaintiff's contributory negligence was also urged upon that appeal. A careful comparison of the record upon this and the former appeal reveals but little difference therein. Some additional evidence, largely cumulative in character, was offered, but this does not tend materially to remove the conflict.

The court held upon the former appeal that the cause should have been submitted to the jury, and, as <sup>Appeal—second appeal—law of case.</sup> both the question of defendant's negligence and plaintiff's contributory negligence were involved and passed upon by the court, the holding there announced is decisive and binding upon this appeal. Boeck et al. v. Modern Woodmen, — Iowa, —, 166 N. W. 1048; Hawthorne v. Delano, — Iowa, —, 167 N. W. 196.

II. Counsel for defendant offered many requests for instructions, all of which were overruled. We are unable to discover any prejudicial error of the court in this respect. Several of the requested instructions were argumentative in character, and gave too much prominence to <sup>—refusal of instructions—error.</sup> particular items of evidence. While some of the suggestions therein set forth might have been properly included in the court's charge, yet, taken as a whole, the instructions given by the court were reasonably full and complete, and fairly submitted the case to the jury. An extended discussion of the errors relied upon in the refusal to give the offered instructions is not called for.

III. Counsel for plaintiff, upon cross-examination of a witness, elicited evidence regarding a conversation between him and plaintiff regarding the condition of the automatic elevator gate at a time subsequent to the injury. The answers, to some extent, left the meaning of the witness in doubt, whereupon defendant's attorney recalled him and had him detail the conversation. Plaintiff was then permitted, over defendant's objection, to take the stand and give his version of the conversation, which

introduction by both sides.

resulted in leaving the evidence in direct conflict as to what occurred.

As the conversation was gone into by counsel for both parties, and their respective versions placed before the jury, in the absence of a showing of prejudice there should not be a reversal upon this ground.

IV. Exceptions were also taken to the court's ninth instruction. The ground of the exception here urged was included in one of defendant's requested instructions. The instruction complained of placed upon the defendant the duty to exercise reasonable and ordinary care in maintaining the gate at the entrance to the elevator in a reasonably safe condition. The jury was specifically told that it was not the duty of defendant to furnish an operator for the elevator and gate, nor to maintain someone constantly in charge thereof. The duty to exercise such care as a reasonably prudent person would have exercised in inspecting the gate was enjoined upon the defendant. The court also told the jury that unless it appeared from the evidence that defendant had notice that the gate was not in place, or not in working order, for a sufficient length of time prior to the accident to have enabled the same to be remedied, the defendant could not be charged with negligence. The evidence was in conflict as to whether the gate had previously failed to work. The burden was placed upon plaintiff, under the instruction, to show that the defendant knew the gate was not in place at the time of the accident, or had been out of working order for such a length of time that, by the exercise of ordinary care, defendant should have obtained knowledge thereof and failed to remedy the same. The instruction was not unfavorable to defendant.

V. The verdict, which was for $8,000, is vigorously assailed by counsel as excessive, and the result of passion or prejudice on the part of the jury. We find nothing in the record to sustain the latter claim. No testimony whatever was offered, and the record discloses nothing as happening during the trial from which it could be inferred that the jury might have been influenced in reaching their conclusion by ulterior motives or influence. Prior to the accident, plaintiff, who was twenty-six years of age, was earning $70 per month, and at the time of the trial $65 per month. His former weight was about 178 pounds, but since the accident he has weighed from 138 to 144 pounds. He fell a distance of 16½ feet, striking upon a hard floor. He appears to have been partially conscious when rescued, and claims to have suffered severe pain from his injuries. He was confined to his bed for about ten days and unable to work for several weeks. The physician who attended him testified that he was bruised in several places, principally on the back. He suffered a severe contusion to the tissues of the back, between and a little above the shoulder blades. His scalp was cut in several places; the lower part of the cervical, and the upper part of the dorsal, vertebræ were injured. This witness further testified that at the time of the last trial plaintiff was suffering from the effects of some of the injuries; that he has fever daily, and if this continues will probably have a permanently diseased condition of some of the bones of the vertebræ; that he has a large curvature at the junction between the dorsal and cervical vertebræ. He gave it as his judgment that the condition of the injured vertebræ indicates tubercular trouble. Other experts called on behalf of plaintiff testified to the curvature of the spine; that he is slightly stooped; that he has an abnormal temperature, and Dr. Ely testified that he examined him shortly before the trial and found his pulse very rapid; that it was 120 when the examination began, and rose to 148 before it was concluded. This, however, may be accounted for, in part at least, by nervousness due to the examination.

All of the expert witnesses testified to symptoms of tubercular infection. Numerous witnesses, who had worked with plaintiff prior to the accident, testified that he was not then stooped, and that he is not able to do as heavy work as formerly. He complains of pain in his back, and his wife testified that his sleep is often disturbed; that he lies with a pillow under his back, and frequently is so exhausted when he returns from his day's labor that he immediately retires, and that she always applies liniments and alcohol, with rubbing, before he retires; that he at times has difficulty in breathing, has dizzy spells, and a numbness in one arm and hand.

The immediate loss of time and earnings, together with the pain and suffering endured, would hardly justify a verdict in plaintiff's favor of $8,000. His earning capacity does not appear to have been materially lessened, but he cannot follow his former occupation. The question, however, whether his injuries are of a permanent nature, and, if so, the probable extent thereof, is very material upon this point. At one time he worked at the carpenter's trade, but at the time of the trial claimed he was unable to follow this line of work, and that he has, since the accident, worked at somewhat reduced wages. If it were conceded that injuries referred to in the evidence of the expert witnesses were reasonably certain to result in tuberculosis, probably no one would complain of the verdict as excessive. The physicians who examined him immediately before the trial found him nervous, but were unable to determine whether it was due to his injuries or whether it was temperamental. It is unfortunate that there is no definite standard by which expert witnesses could have determined whether the injuries complained of will ultimately result in tuberculosis. Doubtless the best the medical experts could do was to express an opinion, based upon physical and symptomatic conditions. None of them were willing to say that he would ultimately permanently recover, but were rather inclined to the opinion that the probabilities were that the diseased vertebræ would in time become tubercular.

The credibility of the witnesses was for the jury, and we cannot assume that the conditions described or conclusions expressed by the physicians were unworthy the belief of the jury.

Their testimony is not disputed. We can easily perceive amount—

how some of the symptoms manifested may proceed from psychological causes, but the diseased condition of the back, the curvature of the spine, increased temperature, serious loss of weight, and the possibility of tubercular infection cannot be accounted for in this way. The question of the extent of plaintiff's injuries, whether permanent or otherwise, together with the possibility that a fatal disease may yet follow, were all properly questions for the jury, and under the evidence, it might have found that the injuries were permanent in character, and that there was a reasonable probability of tubercular infection. Reed v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 74 Iowa, 188, 37 N. W. 149; Lat-man v. Douglas & Co. 149 Iowa, 699, 127 N. W. 661.

We are invited to make comparison of the verdict returned by the jury herein with verdicts held excessive in numerous cases from other jurisdictions. We have examined a large number of the authorities cited, and some of them may not be in entire accord with the conclusion reached by us in this case; but conditions have changed greatly since many of the cited cases were decided. The immense increase in the cost of living and in all the necessities of life must be, to some extent, taken into consideration in determining whether the verdict was in fact excessive. It may be that plaintiff will entirely recover, and suffer little or no permanent impairment of his health, comfort, or earning capacity; but, under the evidence, the jury could have reasonably found otherwise. The question was peculiarly for the jury, and we do not feel that same should be interfered with by this court.

Other questions discussed have been considered, but as in our opinion they present no sufficient reason for reversing the lower court, it will not be profitable to discuss them.

Finding no error in the record justifying a reversal, the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

In comparing present and past verdicts for similar personal injuries, the difference in the purchasing power of money, or, in other words, the increase or decrease in the cost of living at the present time as compared with such power at the time the prior awards were made, may be taken into consideration. *Louisville & N. ##### b. Judicial consideration of change.

In the reported case (NOYES v. DES MOINES CLUB, ante, 605), it was held that the immense increase in the cost of living and in all the necessities of life must be, to some extent, taken into consideration in determining whether a verdict for personal injuries of a permanent character is excessive. So, in the Iowa case of Canfield v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1909) 142 Iowa, 658, 121 N. W. 186, the increased cost of living was held to be a potent factor when considering prospective damages to be awarded an injured person, as where his earning capacity is destroyed. In this case, in answering the contention of plaintiff's counsel in support of a large verdict for personal injuries, that "the expenses of living have increased during the past ten or twelve years, and that the necessities of life, nursing, medicines, professional services, etc., are more than they used to be," the court said: "This argument is, of course, potent in considering prospective damages, but it is a two-edged sword as applied to plaintiff's probable accumulations, and the damage to his estate. It appears that his salary had not increased in proportion to expenses; and, if the proposition be true that the cost of living has increased without a proportionate increase in earnings, it is manifest that had he lived to his full expectancy, he would not have accumulated and saved as much as he would have done before this increase of the cost of living. Assuming, however, that he cannot in the future earn anything by manual or other labor, this increase in expenses may well be considered, as also the fact that interest rates are not as large as they used to be."

And seemingly without attaching especial importance to the permanent character of the injuries, a similar rule has been laid down in a number of other cases. Thus, in Sea Board Air-Line R. Co. v. Miller (1908) 5 Ga. App. 402, 63 S. E. 299, the Georgia supreme court, in approving a verdict that was larger in amount than any of the juries of that state, so far as reports showed, had previously awarded for personal injuries, said: "It must be remembered, too, that, owing to the low purchasing power of money at the present time, every dollar awarded a few years ago afforded as much compensation as do $2 now." And again in Dole v. New Orleans R. & Light Co. (1908) 121 La. 945, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 623, 46 So. 929, in sustaining an award for personal injuries greater in proportion than the court had previously been in the habit of allowing, the court considered, as it said it was bound to do, the fact that the purchasing power of money was less than it had been in the past. And in Gale v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1878) 13 Hun (N. Y.) 4, the court stated that, in making comparison of other personal injury cases with the present, it must notice that the relative value of money had diminished in recent times. And in Hays v. United R. Co. (1914) 183 Mo. App. 608, 167 S. W. 656, the court declared a verdict for personal injuries not excessive, broadly stating the rule to be that, in comparing verdicts, the difference in purchasing power of money at the present time as compared with such power at the time prior decisions were given may be considered. So in Rogers v. Hiram J. Allen Lumber Co. (1912) 129 La. 900, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 202, 57 So. 166, the court, in reducing an excessive verdict for personal injuries, made a smaller reduction "in view of the decrease, within the past few years, in the purchasing power of money." And in Cross v. Lee Lumber Co. (1912) 130 La. 66, 57 So. 631, the court, "in view of the decrease in the purchasing power of money," increased the award in a personal injury action.

And a similar principle, although based upon a contrary point of view as to the purchasing power of a dollar, was applied in the Minnesota case of Johnson v. St. Paul City R. Co. (1899) 67 Minn. 260, 36 L.R.A. 586, 69 N. W. 900, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 93, wherein, in conditionally reducing a verdict in a personal injury action, the court took into consideration the "greater" purchasing power of money, saying: "There is another consideration which we think we may take into account, and that is that, however statesmen and financiers may disagree as to the cause, a given sum of money has greater value, . . . that is, greater purchasing power, . . . than it had years ago."

And see Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Williams (1913) 183 Ala. 138, 62 So. 679, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 483, 4 N. C. C. A. 182, as set out in the following subdivision.

c. Consideration of change by jury.

That the fact that the value of the dollar has greatly depreciated since the accident may be taken into consideration by the jury, in estimating the damages for personal injuries, was ruled in the recent case of Washington & R. R. Co. v. La Fourcade (1919)

48 App. D. C. 364, wherein, in holding that a statement of the plaintiff's counsel, in his argument to the jury in a personal injury action, to the effect "that, although the accident happened several years before, yet the jury were giving compensation now, and that $10,000 now is only equal to $5,000 five years ago," was not prejudicial, the court said: "We think it was competent for the jury, in order to arrive at a just compensation, to take into consideration a condition directly affecting their decision, especially where, as here, the matter in question, the present value of the dollar, is elemental, within the knowledge and experience of men in general, and based upon an economic principle notoriously accepted as true. The dollar is merely a representative of value, a medium of exchange, the value of which is fixed by its purchasing power. That power varies, relatively with the shifting conditions which control the exchange of things capable of valuation. Hence, in measuring it in dollars, it is competent for the jurors to take into consideration those conditions, social and economic, which at the time are generally known and acknowledged to exist, and which, from universal experience, are applied by mankind in fixing values." And as stated in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Williams (1913) 183 Ala. 188, 62 So. 679, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 483, 4 N. C. C. A. 182, the tendency in recent years has been for juries to award, and appellate courts to sustain, increasingly larger sums as compensation for personal injuries, which tendency is largely "attributable, no doubt, to the greatly decreased purchasing power of a dollar, as exemplified in the rise in the price of nearly all commodities, and the enormous increase in the cost of living."

II. Death.

That, when determining probable accumulations and the damage to one's estate, consideration of the increased cost of living, unless accompanied by a corresponding increase in wages, is a detriment rather than a benefit to the injured person's cause, see Canfield v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1909) 142 Iowa, 658, 121 N. W. 186, as quoted supra.

And applying the general rules applicable to damages for death by wrongful act, it would seem that the taking into consideration of an increase in the cost of living would have a tendency to decrease the amount of the awards in such cases. However, no case which expressly involved this point has been discovered. G. J. C.

AMERICAN BOX COMPANY, Limited, Appt.

(— La. —, 81 So. 95.)

Highway — use of trailer — injury to gallery supports.

1. It is gross negligence for the chauffeur of a motor truck, having a trailer in the form of a wagon behind it, to drive the tandem through a much-frequented thoroughfare in a populous city, after one of the two attachments connecting the trailer at its front axletree, with the truck, has parted, and the trailer for several hundred feet has zigzagged across the roadway, at times scraping the curb, until finally it mounts the banquette, and, one after another, breaks and knocks down three cast-iron posts, set near the curb, which support a gallery that extends across the banquette from the house; and the owner of the truck and trailer is liable in damages for the loss and injury thereby inflicted upon the owner of the gallery, which, deprived of its support, falls to the ground and is destroyed.

Damages — destruction of gallery.

2. In such case, the owner of the gallery is entitled to recover an amount sufficient to pay for a gallery as good as that destroyed, and is not required to build or accept a gallery constructed of the broken material, matched, patched, and welded, which constituted the old gallery.

Highway — obstruction — removal.

3. No citizen may, with impunity, whether wilfully or negligently, destroy the property of another which causes him no injury, and which, under a claim of right, and with the sanction of a municipal government, occupies a portion of a street administered by such government.

Nuisance — right of action by individual.

4. One has no right of action for removal of an obstruction alleged to be a nuisance, from a public street, unless it causes a particular injury to his person or property.

— right to abate.

5. One has no right wilfully or negligently to destroy property obstructing a public street, which he alleges to be a nuisance, unless it causes a particular injury to his person or property.

[See 20 R. C. L. 489.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to property, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of an employee of defendant. Affirmed.

Statement by Monroe, Ch. J.:

Defendant brings up this appeal from a judgment awarding plaintiff $2,120.75 as damages, alleged to have been caused by the negligent handling of a motor truck and trailer by one of defendant's employees, as a result of which the trailer collided with, and knocked down, or broke, one after the other, three cast-iron posts, which, being set in the banquette, near the curb, in front of a building owned by plaintiff, supported a gallery composed of iron scroll work with floors of plank, and extending from the front of the building on the second and third stories, across the banquette, which gallery, by reason of the removal of its supports, fell to the banquette and was reduced to a mass of unavailable debris, and in so doing tore loose its attachments to, thereby damaging, the front of the house, breaking the window blinds, and subjecting defendant to other pecuniary loss. Testimony as to the occurrence and extent of the damage, given by a number of witnesses who corroborate each other, establishes the facts beyond doubt.

It is thus shown that a negro chauffeur, with another employee of defendant at his side, was driving a 40-horse power Packard truck, to which was attached a "trailer" in the form of a spring wagon, down Camp street at about 9 o'clock on a morning in April; that the wagon had a pole extending out in front, which was attached to or formed a Y at the rear end, the arms or branches of which, respectively, were bolted, or should have been bolted, to the front axletree of the trailer; while the forward end of the pole was hooked to the truck. As this tandem of vehicles approached St. Joseph street, upon which the Illinois Central Railroad Company has a track, the gatekeeper employed by that company observed that the right arm of the Y had become detached from the axletree of the trailer and was hanging loose, and, in consequence, that as the truck, which was moving at (what we consider) a pretty rapid pace, under the circumstances, moved off and on the street car track (on Camp street), the trailer zigzagged behind in rather an irresponsible fashion, scraped the curb on the right for perhaps 100 feet, and then came near colliding with the gate which the keeper was operating; and the same thing attracted the attention of an ice man, who attempted to warn the chauffeur by whistling at him, but was successful only to the extent that one of the two men on the truck glanced around, and, seeing nothing that interested him, the truck proceeded across St. Joseph street; and about that time the eccentric movements of the trailer attracted the attention of another witness who, walking up Camp street, had arrived in front of plaintiff's building, and, seeing the trailer again scraping the curb and heading for the gallery, realized that a collision was imminent and attempted to avert it by vocally warning the men on the truck.

His testimony as to what he saw and did reads, in part, as follows:

I saw the thing coming, grinding the curb all the way down Camp street. . . . About 30 feet from the house when I hollered. . . . I moved off when I saw the trailer coming in on the banquette. . . .

Q. When you first saw the truck, had you passed from under the gallery?

A. No, sir; I walked out—about the center of the gallery—to the curb and hailed the darkey, and the two negroes were so deeply interested in conversation that they did not pay any attention. As soon as I saw that there was to be an accident, I got from under about 10 feet.

Q. You saw the whole thing?

A. Yes, sir; I saw when the trailer struck the third post, I think; it broke loose, and the truck ran ahead about 70 or 80 feet or more.

Q. Did the truck break loose from the trailer?

A. Yes, sir; on the third post; either the chain pulled off or the pole broke, I don't know which."

From the testimony thus quoted, with much other, it appears that the trailer scraped the curb until it reached a point immediately above plaintiff's house, where the curb was opened for the purpose of an entrance for vehicles into plaintiff's premises, into which it swerved until, controlled by the onward pull of the truck, the wheels on the right side mounted the banquette and the trailer began its assault upon the gallery posts, which were set in the banquette a few inches inside of the curb and probably about 8 feet apart, and, breaking them off in one, two, three order, stopped at the third post with the first two inside of it (the trailer), where they had fallen, together with other debris of the gallery, and with the third post broken off at the bottom and leaning against the front of the trailer—the truck having, in the meanwhile, parted company with it, and run on down the street for a distance, most of the witnesses say, of about 100 feet, by which time the chauffeur and his companion had probably finished their conversation.

The chauffeur's explanation of the affair, given in his own words, is as follows: "My idea was, it simply could not be helped. My idea was, a pin must have broke when I pulled off the track, and that accounted for the wagon going wild, and it hit the curb and jumped up on the sidewalk."

He says that all that he could do was to stop when the collision occurred; that he did stop, with the truck still connected with the trailer, for about half an hour; that he then, by direction of the policeman who had come upon the scene, went back and unhooked the trailer from the truck.

The policeman testifies that when he got there, about ten minutes after the accident, "the truck was away from the trailer about 90 feet." And of the fifteen or twenty witnesses who testified in the case, not one saw the truck and the trailer any closer together from the moment of the collision with the first post; some, who witnessed the collision, saw them part company at that moment; and some, who were on the spot immediately afterwards, saw them from 80 to 100 feet apart.

The chauffeur says that the truck was slow—the slowest that he ever handled; that 8 miles an hour was its best gait; that he was running slowly at the time of the accident, not more than 5 or 6 miles an hour. Asked what he found when he went back to the trailer, he replied: "On the right side, I noticed where a pin was out and a key through the bolt. I noticed that the pin was out of that; the whole [hole] was vacant; the shaft [referring to the right arm of what we have called the Y] was hanging on that side, after it struck the building; I didn't notice it before it struck."

A witness called by defendant testifies that he was defendant's saw filer and millwright; that he keeps up the truck and looks after the trailer; makes the bolts that go into the shaft and gives them to the chauffeur. Asked whether he had inspected the trailer or the truck on the day of accident, he was unable to recall such inspection, nor does he say when he had inspected them.

It is shown that plaintiff called for estimates of the cost of replacing the gallery; that the lowest estimate that he received was $2,066; that he paid $55 for having the debris removed from the banquette and $5.75 for some other work that was required for the safety of the public; a further claim for $300, for the loss of the use of the gallery, was rejected. He has not asked that the judgment be amended.

Messrs. John Dymond, Jr., A. Giffen Levy, and A. G. Williams, for appellee:

A front gallery of a building, the width of the sidewalk, fronting on a busy thoroughfare in the commercial district of the city of New Orleans, and supported by iron pillars set in the sidewalk near the curbing, is an obstruction; and, since it conserves no good public purpose, is an illegal obstruction.

20 R. C. L. §§ 11, 28, pp. 16, 84.

Mr. Henry W. Robinson, for appellee:

Where the front galleries of a property owner overhang the sidewalk, supported by iron columns near the curb, which construction has been a common one in New Orleans for over a hundred years, made desirable by climatic conditions and not prohibited by city ordinances, such structures do not constitute a public nuisance.

New Orleans v. Kaufman, 138 La. 897, 70 So. 874; McCormack v. Robin, 126 La. 598, 139 Am. St. Rep. 549, 52 So. 779.

Structures on the public sidewalks are not necessarily nuisances. Some are entirely lawful.

Wolff v. District of Columbia, 196 U. S. 152, 49 L. ed. 426, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 198, 1 Ann. Cas. 967, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 439.

A gallery over Canal street during carnival is proper, but the method of constructing its supports may be negligent.

Recovery may be had for trees on the sidewalk uprooted by a paver, and for cutting branches overhanging the sidewalk, of trees planted behind the front line.

A private corporation may not tear down an awning on the thoroughfare without subjecting itself to damages.

Laviosa v. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. McGloin (La.) 299.

Monroe, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defense seems to rest upon the proposition that plaintiff's gallery was an illegal obstruction to the banquette, hence that plaintiff was a trespasser; that no one owes any duty to a trespasser, save to abstain from wilfully and wantonly injuring him, and that he is entitled to no compensation for loss and damages inflicted upon him by the mere negligence of another; that the owner of a vehicle is not responsible for damages caused by an accident arising out of a latent defect in a mechanism which, shortly before the accident, had been inspected and found in good condition.

1. Whatever may be said as to the obligation of an owner of private property towards a trespasser thereon, we have been referred to no authority, and we know of none, which sustains the view that one citizen may, with impunity, whether wilfully or negligently, destroy the property of another, which in no way inconveniences him, and which, upon a claim of right and with the sanction of a municipal government, occupied a portion of a street administered by such government.

A citizen has no right of action for the removal of an obstruction, alleged to be a nuisance, from a public street, unless he is able to show that it causes a particular injury to his person or property; and still less has he the right either to take the law into his own hands and wilfully destroy such property, or to destroy it by his negligence. The question of nuisance vel non in such case is to be determined between the corporation administering the street, and the citizen claiming ownership of the property. 28 Cyc. 898, 899; 29 Cyc. 1216; Wood, Nuisances, § 64; Blanc v. Murray, 36 La. Ann. 163, 164, 51 Am. Rep. 7.

It is a matter of public and judicial history that galleries, or "verandas," as they are also called, have been sanctioned by usage in New Orleans almost from time immemorial. More than sixty years ago, where one citizen sought to abate, as a nuisance, a veranda, such as that here in question, which had been constructed by his neighbor, this court said:

"Every front proprietor is clearly under an obligation not to obstruct the free use of the street; and the enforcement of this obligation concerns the municipal authority, which has enforced it, as shown by the ordinance of 1852, by the prohibition to erect awnings or balconies, which shall be less elevated than 8 feet above the sidewalk. As to verandas of the kind erected by the defendant, extending over the whole breadth of the sidewalk and elevated far above it by columns on a line with the curbstone, which the evidence shows to have become so common of late years, they are very obviously, so far as the public is concerned, a great improvement as compared with the hanging galleries and wooden sheds which extend only to the half or the third of the width of the sidewalk, and from which the drip, in rainy weather, is so great an annoyance to foot passengers.

"These modern verandas, on the contrary, afford a perfect shelter from the sun and weather, to passers by the front of houses to which they are attached. In sultry climates, the necessity of shade from the sun to health and comfort has universally introduced the custom of balconies or verandas which, in this respect, are equally beneficial to the inmates of the houses and to wayfarers." Durant v. Riddell, 12 La. Ann. 747.

In a much later case, the foregoing expression of opinion is referred to with approval, and applied to the case of trees whose limbs overhang a sidewalk; the court saying: "To those who live in this climate, particularly during the hot summer months, when the thermometer points to about 100, when not more, it would be needless to argue that the overhanging branches of magnolia trees on such sidewalks are no nuisance, but, on the contrary, actually prove of great relief, not only against the heat, but also, sometimes, even against the rain."

And the defendant (company), the agents of which entered plaintiff's premises and cut branches overhanging the sidewalk from the trees on the premises, was condemned in damages. Tissot v. Great Southern Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 39 La. Ann. 1001, 4 Am. St. Rep. 248, 3 So. 261.

In the still later case of New Orleans v. Kaufman, 138 La. 897, 70 So. 874, defendant was convicted of violating a city ordinance prohibiting the building of sheds over sidewalks, but excepting from its operation existing balconies of dwelling houses and marquises or awnings to protect show windows, provided no signs, advertisements, appeared thereon, from which it might be inferred that, while the city authorities were not disposed to legislate against existing balconies, they were not favorably inclined towards the building of new ones. We are not, however, informed that they have enacted any ordinance prohibiting the building of such balconies, and it is yet to be ascertained that such action can be made effective, if taken; the quoted decision being apparently unfavorable to that view. But supposing that such an ordinance had been passed, and might be enforced, the case against defendant loses nothing of its strength, since plaintiff, through the negligence of defendant's agent (if it be so found), had an existing veranda which, by express legislation, he was to be allowed to keep, and, it having been thus destroyed, he is denied the right, or must litigate in order to enjoy the right, to replace it.

We therefore conclude that defendant's first stated proposition is not well founded.

2. The second proposition, as applied to this case, is equally without merit. Apart from the question of horse power machine for 250 or 800 feet, at a fairly high speed, on and off of the street railroad track, with the trailer hanging on by one arm of its Y and zigzagging from one side to the other of a much-traveled thoroughfare, like the tail of a kite in a high wind, and that he not only did not look behind of his own accord, but was so engrossed in conversation with his companion (whose proper position, as we apprehend, was on the trailer) that he took no other notice of two attempts that were made to inform him of the situation than casually to turn his head, without really looking (if, indeed, it was he whose head is said to have turned, and not the other man), or certainly without seeing that which he should have seen. He neither saw the trailer in its gyrations, nor did he hear it scraping the curb both above and below St. Joseph street, and though apparently blind, deaf, and unobservant, he must have driven the machine at a fair speed or it would not have broken off and knocked down, one after another, three cast-iron posts, which, from the photographs in evidence, were hardly less than 8 inches in diameter, and know nothing about it until he had gone 80 or 100 feet further down the street.

"latent defect," etc., therein presented, the evidence is conclusive that defendant's chauffeur ran his 40-

3. Counsel further argue that the lower court erred in allowing recovery for a new gallery, when only an old one was destroyed. The obligation of defendant, however, is to indemnify plaintiff—to put him in the position that he would have occupied if the injury complained of had not been inflicted on him. It goes further than that of an insurer against loss by fire, who takes no risk against personal effort and inconvenience. And yet, so far as we know, those who are engaged in the insurance business do not undertake to build an old house, by way of indemnifying the assured for the loss of an old house, and no suggestion is here made as to the manner in which that can be done. According to the evidence of plaintiff's contractor, the broken material of which the gallery in question was constructed, and which, at the time of the trial, was lying in a confused heap on plaintiff's premises, could not again be utilized in the construction of a gallery and it is not pretended that it could be so utilized, save by matching and welding the broken bits of iron, patching the flooring, and supplying missing parts of both with new material, all of which, when done at an expense not estimated, would result in the production of a gallery composed of matched, patched, and welded material, which would not be the gallery that was destroyed, and which plaintiff is not bound to accept by way of indemnity for that which was destroyed. Defendant alleges in its answer that it had declined to have anything to do with the debris in question, sets up no claim for salvage, and has offered no evidence that the debris is of any value, or would compensate plaintiff for its occupancy of his premises. We therefore find no reason for making any change in the judgment appealed from on account of any possible salvage that he may realize.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Liability for damages by vehicle trailers.

It will be observed that in the reported case (LAMBERT v. AMERICAN BOX Co. ante, 612), the defendant was held guilty of negligence where the chauffeur of its 40-horse-power truck, which had a trailer attached, drove at a rapid pace through a much-frequented thoroughfare of a city after one side of the tongue of the trailer had become detached from it, and the trailer for several hundred feet zigzagged across the roadway, scraped the curb, and finally mounted the banquette, and knocked down three cast-iron posts supporting a gallery, it appearing that neither the chauffeur, nor another servant of the defendant who was on the truck with him, looked behind of his own accord, or noticed two attempts made by others to inform them of the danger.

In view of the fact that trailers are coming into common use, and that such use will undoubtedly give rise to considerable litigation, this case is of particular value. The question as to what constitutes negligence in using these vehicles is affected by considerations not incident to the use of ordinary vehicles, such, for example, as the additional allowance which must be made in turning the two vehicles; the duty to look behind, as well as ahead; the duty to see that the couplings between the vehicles are sufficient, and in good condition, and possibly, under certain conditions, the duty to have a person on the trailer for the purpose of warning other travelers, watching the load, fastenings, lights, etc. There is at present little authority on the question under consideration, but one other case having been disclosed.

In Quinlivan v. Ready & C. Coal Co. (1916) 202 Ill. App. 224, in an action for the death of a child four years old, who was run over by a dump wagon which was attached to a sprinkling wagon, where it appeared that the driver of the sprinkling wagon was seated upon a high seat in such a position that he might have seen, had he looked, what a crowd of children were doing at the time of and just before the accident, that the horses were walking, and that the driver did in fact see these children as he approached them, it was held that it was a question for the jury whether he might have anticipated that one of the children would, under the circumstances, do as the deceased did, and could by the exercise of reasonable care have avoided the accident. The only report of this case is an abstract of the decision.

Obviously different considerations enter into the question of liability for injuries from street car "trailers," operating on fixed tracks. J. T. W.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover for breach of warranty of the seaworthiness of a vessel. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Argued before Ward, Rogers, and Manton, circuit judges.

Mr. Robert B. Honeyman for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Harrington, Bigham, & Englar for defendant in error.

Manton, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error, owner of the Florence M. Belding, sold her to the plaintiff in error on March 4, 1916. The latter now sues, claiming the schooner was not sound or seaworthy or in good condition when sold, and seeks to recover $7,600, the difference between the purchase price and the price at which the plaintiff in error sold the boat subsequently, plus 5 per cent brokerage commissions, because, as it says, the schooner was not as warranted.

At the trial, both parties moved for judgment after the proof was submitted. The district judge, however, submitted specific questions to the jury, for it to determine the seaworthiness of the vessel, and this without objection from either litigant. The jury found the vessel seaworthy and fitted for a voyage upon the Atlantic at the time the agreement of sale was made. The court thereafter, in a written opinion, approved the verdict and gave judgment for the defendant in error. This finding of fact, both of the jury and the district judge, is binding upon us, unless error was committed during the trial.

Mr. Job, called by the plaintiff in error, was cross-examined as to whether or not he heard that the Florence M. Belding made a trip from Nova Scotia across the Atlantic, and this after trifling repairs were made. This testimony was duly objected to, but admitted, and exception taken to its admission. This error would require a reversal, for such evidence was hearsay and harmful, and might well influence the jury, if there was an expressed or implied warranty in the contract of sale. Was there an expressed or implied warranty? We think not.

One Stoddard, a shipbroker, was informed that the defendant had this vessel for sale, and approached the plaintiff and offered her for sale, which negotiations resulted in the following correspondence:

March 4, 1916.

Mr. R. F. Clark, Agent,
New York,

Dear Sir:—

We understand from your agent, Mr. Stoddard, that you sell us the Florence M. Belding for the sum of $38,000, and beg to inclose herewith check for $5,000 on account of same.

We shall take delivery of the ship as soon as you can supply us with the bill of sale. Kindly acknowledge receipt of check and oblige.

Yours truly,
W. & S. Job & Co., Inc.

Elizabeth, N. J., March 4, 1916.
Messrs. Job & Company,
No. 29 Broadway, New York City,
Gentlemen:—

We beg to acknowledge receipt of your check for five thousand ($5,000) dollars, account of purchase price for schooner Florence M. Belding, as per your letter of the 4th inst.

Yours very truly,
The Heidritter Lumber Company,
By F. R. Clarke.

Thereafter, and on March 13th, Mr. Wolff, vice president of the defendant in error, delivered a bill of sale for the schooner to Mr. Job, an officer of the plaintiff in error, and received the balance due on the purchase. Job testified as follows: "Mr. Wolff brought the bill of sale in and asked us for the balance of the money. Mr. Wolff told us he thought we had a bargain in the vessel, and I told him I was very glad to hear that, and he said she had been a very useful vessel to them, and that she was sound and seaworthy in every way. I told him we had only seen the top of the vessel. We had not been able to see her bottom, because she was full of lumber. We had not been able to see what was inside. Mr. Wolff said she was sound and seaworthy all over."

This was not denied by Mr. Wolff. However, whatever was said by Mr. Wolff on this occasion could not be considered an expressed warranty, for the sale was consummated by the exchange of the above letters, and the parties were obligated to the contract there made.

Sale—
warranty—
vessel.

No representations made after that date as to the soundness or seaworthiness of the vessel would constitute an expressed warranty, for there was no new consideration. A contract of warranty requires a consideration. The consideration which supports this contract of sale was determined and agreed upon by the parties on March 4th.

warranty—

Broker—
warrant vessel.

Any further or new warranty would require a separate and sufficient consideration. Nor could Mr. Stoddard, an independent broker, by anything that he said, commit the defendant to an expressed warranty, for he had no such implied or apparent authority. Smith v. Tracy, 36 N. Y. 79; Crist v. Turner, 175 App. Div. 664, 161 N. Y. Supp. 856.

But the plaintiff in error contends that there was an implied warranty. Although this contention is not pleaded, we will examine it. The plaintiff in error pleads an expressed representation. A surveyor, at the request of the plaintiff in error, examined the vessel and made a formal report of her condition before its purchase. He pronounced her seaworthy, and, although the vessel still had lumber in her hold, ample opportunity was afforded, either for further examination or some insistence upon a warranty. This was not done, and, after the report of the surveyor, the contract of sale was made. The rule of caveat emptor applies to the sale of a vessel under these circumstances and in the absence of an expressed warranty.

In Barnard v. Kellogg, 10 Wall. 383, 19 L. ed. 987, the court said: "No principle of the common law has been better established, or more often affirmed, both in this country and in England, than that in sales of personal property, in the absence of express warranty, where the buyer has an opportunity to inspect the commodity, and the seller is guilty of no fraud, and is neither the manufacturer nor grower of the article he sells, the maxim of caveat emptor applies. Such a rule, requiring the purchaser to take care of his own interests, has been found best adapted to the wants of trade in the business transactions of life. And there is no hardship in it, because, if the purchaser distrusts his judgment, he can require of the seller a warranty that the quality or condition of the goods he desires to buy corresponds with the sample exhibited. If he is satisfied without a warranty, and can inspect, and declines to do it, he takes upon himself the risk that the article is merchantable; and he cannot relieve himself and charge the seller, on the ground that the examination will occupy time and is attended with labor and inconvenience. If it is practicable, no matter how inconvenient, the rule applies. One of the main reasons why the rule does not apply in the case of a sale by sample is because there is no opportunity for a personal examination of the bulk of the commodity which the sample is shown to represent. Of such universal acceptance is the doctrine of caveat emptor in this country that the courts of all the states in the Union where the common law prevails, with one exception (South Carolina), sanction it."

In Barr v. Gibson, 3 Mees. & W. 390, 150 Eng. Reprint, 1196, 7 L. J. Exch. N. S. 124, 24 Eng. Rul. Cas. 188, where a ship was sold without an expressed warranty, it was held that there was no implied warranty. There the court said: "The simple bargain and sale, therefore, of the ship, does not imply any contract that it is then seaworthy or in a serviceable condition."

In Sanford & B. Co. v. Columbia Dredging Co. 101 C. C. A. 96, 177 Fed. 882, the court said: "If the scows had been sold outright on May 23, 1904, after the respondents had full opportunity to discover their condition, it could scarcely be contended that the respondents would not be bound to pay the purchase price agreed upon, whatever defects might have been subsequently discovered therein. The rule of caveat emptor applies to the sales of ships as in the sales of other personal property. 1 Parsons, Admiralty, 86."

Nor is this result changed by reason of chapter 571 of the Laws of 1911 (New York State Personal Property Law). Section 96 thereof provides that, where the buyer expressly or by implication makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, and it appears that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment (whether he be the grower or manufacturer or not), there is an implied warranty that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose.

It is doubted whether a boat can be classified within the term "goods" as used in the statute, but here the buyer did not rely on the seller's skill or judgment, but, as above stated, made an independent examination of the boat. We think it was unnecessary for the district judge to submit the questions to the jury, as there was neither expressed nor implied warranty in this contract of sale. Therefore the error in the admission of testimony was harmless.

ANNOTATION.

Implied warranty on sale of vessel.

Upon the sale of a vessel to be manufactured for the buyer, an implied warranty arises that the vessel is fit for the use intended. In other words, that it is seaworthy, and this includes structural defects and defects in material used, which are not subject to observation by the buyer. Cunningham v. Hall (1862) 4 Allen (Mass.) 268; Cram v. Gas Engine & Power Co. (1894) 75 Hun, 316, 26 N. Y. Supp. 1069; Chambers v. Crawford (1793) Addison (Pa.) 150; Shepherd v. Pybus (1842) 4 Scott, N. R. 434, 3 Mann. & G. 868, 133 Eng. Reprint, 1390, 11 L. J. C. P. N. S. 101.

In Cunningham v. Hall (1862) (Mass.) supra, the rule is said to be that if the seller simply agrees to complete a vessel and deliver it at a stipulated price, there is an implied warranty that it shall be, both as to workmanship and as to materials used in its construction, fit for the service for which it was sold, or for the service to which vessels of that class were known by him to be commonly and usually appropriated. It is, however, pointed out that the contract under consideration "was in fact modified by the clause that it 'should be finished in the style of the Polynesia,' or, in other words, by a stipulation that it should be planked with pine plank. Under this modification of what would otherwise have created a general liability, the defendant was bound only to use reasonable care and skill in the selection and preparation of that kind of plank, and in applying and fastening them to the frame and body of the vessel; for the plaintiffs, in consenting to the use of such materials, acted upon their own judgment, and assumed upon themselves the risk and hazard of the sufficiency of such kind of plank for the purpose for which they allowed it to be used; and they could afterwards only hold the defendant responsible for damages resulting from his failure to exercise reasonable skill and care in the selection of the planks which he used, or in the application of all known and proper tests to discover if there was unsoundness in any of them, or from the imperfection or unskilfulness of his work in covering the ship."

Where the parties agree upon the kind of materials of which a vessel shall be completed, the duty rests upon the seller merely to exercise due care to prevent the use of unsound or defective materials and to cause the whole work to be done in a skilful and workmanlike manner. Reasonable care or skill is a relative phrase, and what this requires is always to be determined by consideration of the subject-matter to which it is applied. In its application as a rule or measure of duty to which a builder is subject in the building of a ship, and especially where it is constructed in part of materials known to be subject to defects which may essentially impair its strength or endanger its safety, it calls for the most vigilant inspection of every article used and the employment of every known test or means by which they may be detected. Cunningham v. Hall (1862) 4 Allen (Mass.) 268.

Applying the foregoing rule in Cram v. Gas Engine & Power Co. (1894) 75 Hun, 316, 26 N. Y. Supp. 1069, it is held that the manufacturer of a boat impliedly warrants that it is properly and skilfully made, and that good materials were used in its construction. Where a boat is ordered to be made with a cabin located in a designated position, the manufacturer, however, does not impliedly warrant that the cabin in such a position is not dangerous when naphtha is used for motive power, unless the manufacturer knows the danger and the purchaser is in ignorance thereof.

In Shepherd v. Pybus (1842) 4 Scott, N. R. 434, 3 Mann. & G. 873, 133 Eng. Reprint, 1392, 11 L. J. C. P. N. S. 101, it is held that, upon the sale of a barge by the builder, a warranty arises that it is reasonably fit for use. It is pointed out in this case that the boat was built by the seller, and the purchaser had had no opportunity to inspect it while it was being built, and the defects in it were not apparent upon inspection, and could only be detected upon trial.

In Chambers v. Crawford (1793) Addison (Pa.) 150, upon this point the court instructed the jury that "if a workman does work insufficiently, he is answerable for all consequences arising from this insufficiency, notwithstanding an acceptance by the employer without objections; for the employer is not to be presumed acquainted with the execution of the work, and the workman must be. If the loss in this case happened through such carelessness or accident as, in the case of a sufficient boat, would have produced the same effect, you will find for the defendants. But if the loss happened through the insufficiency of the boat, measuring that insufficiency by the expressed intention of the parties, and the usage of the trade, you will find for the plaintiffs, with damage adequate to their loss."

But see upon this point the reported case (W. & S. Job & Co. v. Heidritter Lumber Co. ante, 619), holding that where the purchaser of a vessel bought it after employing a surveyor to examine it, and received a formal report from him as to her condition, the rule of caveat emptor applied, and no implied warranty arose as to the seaworthy condition of the vessel.

In Burns v. Fletcher (1850) 2 Ind. 372, it is held that no implied warranty of fitness arises from the sale of a flatboat, at the time sunk, and hence not subject to inspection, where the price paid was about one half the price of a good boat.

Under the Louisiana Code, which imposes the obligation of warranting an article sold against hidden defects, it has been held that the buyer of a vessel may recover damages for breach of the Code warranty as to the seaworthy condition of the vessel, such defect being hidden, within the meaning of the Code. Bulkley v. Honold (1856) 19 How. (U. S.) 390, 15 L. ed. 663.

It has been held that an agreement by the seller of a barge to construct bins therein raises an implied warranty of the fitness of the bins. Excelsior Coal Co. v. Gildersleeve (1908) 87 C. C. A. 202, 160 Fed. 47.

No warranty arises from the sale of a vessel to be taken with all faults, and without any allowance for deficiencies in length, weight, quantity, quality, or any defect or error whatever. Taylor v. Bullen (1850) 5 Exch. 779, 155 Eng. Reprint, 341, 20 L. J. Exch. N. S. 21.

In Marmet Coal Co. v. People's Coal Co. (1915) 141 C. C. A. 402, 226 Fed. 646, it is assumed for the purposes of the case that the sale of used barges without inspection raises an implied warranty of seaworthiness. It is, however, held that where the purchaser used the barges for some time after inspecting them, paid a portion of the barges' price, and renewed notes for the balance, he cannot recover on such implied warranty.

In Sanford & B. Co. v. Columbia Dredging Co. (1910) 101 C. C. A. 96, 177 Fed. 882, an implied warranty was said to arise from the loss of used scows, but it was held to have been waived by continued use of the scows after inspection by the lessee. The court said that the same rule of warranty applied to a rental of an article as would apply to the sale of such article.

F. E. HERRING.

(255 Fed. 670.)

Contract — breach — excuse — appointment of receiver.

1. Damages will not be awarded against the owner for breach of contract where one who has contracted to salvage cotton which was washed away by a flood is prevented from performing by the appointment of a receiver for the distribution of salvaged cotton among all claimants to the lost property.

Receiver — who represents.

2. A receiver appointed by a court to take possession of cotton which had been washed away by a flood, for distribution among claimants, is a representative of the court, and not in any sense a representative of a claimant who had contracted for salvage of cotton he had lost.

[See 23 R. C. L. 7, 70.]

— effect on rights of parties.

3. The appointment of a receiver for cotton which has been washed away by a flood, in a suit to which one who lost cotton and one who had contracted with him to salvage it were both parties, prevents further performance of the salvage contract, even as to cotton which had been loaded on cars when the receiver was appointed, but of which he took possession since both were under legal duty to attorn to the court and abide the judicial determination as to rightful claimants of the property.

Contract — breach — act of God — liability.

4. One is not liable in damages for failure to perform a contract where the performance is rendered impossible by act of God, the law, or the other party.

Appeal — assignments of error by successful party.

5. Assignments of error by a defendant on the record of a writ of error sued out by plaintiff to review a judgment for defendant cannot be considered.

[See 2 R. C. L. 161.]

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Texas (Hutcheson, District Judge) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in part only, in an action brought to recover a balance alleged to be due for cotton salvaged by plaintiff at defendant's instance. Affirmed.

Statement by Sheppard, District Judge:

This case concerns a contract between the parties for the recovery and delivery by the plaintiff to the defendant of a lot of stranded cotton, carried away from the Moody & Company compress at Galveston, Texas, by the memorable storm of August 16, 1915, and scattered along the coast on the mainland opposite Galveston. The case was once before here, where the judgment below, dismissing plaintiff's action, was reversed, 161 C. C. A. 528, 249 Fed. 602. The defendant Herring claimed to have lost cotton which had been stored in the compress of Moody & Company, and authorized the plaintiff Moller in writing, on September 2, 1915, to "collect as much as possible, agreeing to pay salvage therefor at $10 per bale for same, f.o.b. cars." Plaintiff proceeded on this authority, and picked up and assembled at Alta Loma, Texas, 578 bales of stranded cotton. Sixty-eight bales were actually delivered f.o.b. cars and received by the defendant September 3d. Fifty-two bales more were loaded on cars at Alta Loma September 4th, but this lot, as well as the residue, 458 bales, which had not been loaded on cars, were not delivered to defendant, because same were impounded by a receiver of the United States district court for the southern district of Texas in an equity cause therein begun on the 3d day of September, 1915, in which cause, on the same day, a receiver for all the stranded and lost cotton was appointed. It is admitted that the receiver, under orders of the court, took possession of all the cotton collected by the plaintiff and his agents under the agreement, except the sixty-eight bales admitted to have been received by the defendant. The defendant was impleaded in the equity cause for sixty-eight bales of cotton he had received from the plaintiff, and refused to pay the plaintiff for any cotton, including the sixty-eight bales which had been delivered by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff, also impleaded in the equity cause, answered, asserting his lien for salvage, and was awarded in due course, by the court, $2.50 per bale for 510 bales which the receiver had taken over. Subsequently plaintiff brought this action against the defendant for $4,505, claimed as a balance due him for 578 bales of the cotton salvaged by him at the instance of the defendant, less the salvage award of $1,020 on 510 bales seized by the receiver.

The substantial facts are not controverted, except that plaintiff claims actual delivery to the defendant of 120 bales, while the defendant insists that fifty-two bales of this lot were not loaded "f.o.b. cars" as required by the contract, and besides were seized by the receiver before shipment. The plaintiff's action, therefore, is based on the theory that he had a subsisting contract with defendant for the salvage of as many as 1,000 bales of cotton; that he recovered 578 bales and made delivery of the same to the defendant, or to the receiver, whom plaintiff characterizes as defendant's agent. The defendant insists that the agreement was wholly abrogated by the court's intervention and rightful possession of the cotton through its receiver. The parties, by stipulation, waived a jury, and, after adducing much testimony, submitted the cause on final proofs, and the court found that the plaintiff had delivered to the defendant 120 bales of cotton under the contract, for which he was entitled to $10 per bale for that amount, less an award of $2.50 per bale for the fifty-two bales loaded on cars which were seized by the receiver before shipment, thereupon rendering a general judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $1,070, with interest from September 4, 1915, at 6 per cent per annum. The plaintiff, dissatisfied with this judgment, sued out his writ of error to this court, and assigns as error, generally, the judgment in his favor for $1,070, which was less than what he claimed under the contract.

for the amount of cotton recovered and delivered to defendant or the receiver, to wit, 578 bales. Defendant filed cross assignments, and cites as error the judgment against him, and particularly the sum of $7.50 per bale allowed the plaintiff for the fifty-two bales loaded on cars, and which the receiver seized before shipment. But these assignments cannot be considered for reasons stated hereafter.

Argued before Walker and Batts, Circuit Judges, and Sheppard, District Judge.

Messrs. Maco Stewart and Albert J. De Lange, for plaintiff in error:

Placing the 578 bales of cotton f. o. b. cars by plaintiff was a substantial compliance with that part of the contract, and a substantial compliance should be considered as a full compliance of a condition of any contract.

Sheppard, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff complains by his general assignment that the court erred in giving judgment in his favor for only $1,070, and allowing him only $7.50 per bale for fifty-two bales loaded on cars, and disallowing his claim in toto on 458 bales delivered to the receiver.

It has been seen that plaintiff claims damages for a breach of contract, but the contract required a delivery of the cotton "f.o.b. cars," and it is plain that there was delivery of only sixty-eight bales in the manner specified in the contract. That further delivery, as contemplated by the parties, was prevented, does not appear to have been due to any fault of the defendant. The law intervened at the instance of other parties, and the court took jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and possession, by its receiver, of the cotton collected by plaintiff. The receiver, of course, was the representative of the court, and could not be in any Receiver—who represents. sense the representative of the defendant. Wiswall v. Sampson, 14 How. 64, 65, 14 L. ed. 327, 328; Metcalf v. Barker, 187 U. S. 175, 47 L. ed. 127, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67. The plaintiff and defendant were both impleaded in the equity cause, which sought to impound the cotton, and both were under the legal duty to attend to the court and abide the judicial determination as to rightful claimants to the property. The lot of fifty-two bales, which was loaded on cars the same day as the appointment of the receiver and by him intercepted, as well as the other cotton assembled by plaintiff for shipment, from that time on was in custodia legis, and the performance of the contract rendered impossible. The appointment of the receiver was impliedly an injunction against any interference with the custody of the cotton.

—effect on rights of parties. A distinction, it has been said, must be taken between cases for specific performance of a contract and those in which damages are sought for the nonperformance of a contract. The bare fact that the court can decree and enforce the specific performance of the contract shows that its performance is not impossible. But when the contract cannot be specifically performed, and the only remedy is by way of damages, the court will not inflict damages, if the breach for which damages are sought has been occasioned by the law. In such cases it appears the doctrine of damnum absque injuria applies. It is a very well settled rule of law that, if performance is rendered impossible by act of God, the law, or the other party, it is a sufficient excuse. Der-

Defendant's assignments are not predicated on a writ of error sued out at his instance. It is settled law that on a writ of error sued out on appeal taken by plaintiff to review a judgment rendered by successful

Appeal—assignments of error by successful party. for defendant assignments by the latter in the same record cannot be considered. The rule was early announced in The Maria Martin, 12 Wall. 40, 20 L. ed. 251: "Both parties in a civil action may sue out a writ of error to a final judgment, but where one party only exercises the right the other cannot assign error in the appellate court." *Pauly Jail Bldg. & Mfg. While the defendant's errors may not be considered, the plaintiff has no ground to complain of the judgment.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

Appointment of receiver as excuse for nonperformance of contract.

I. Introduction; general rules, 628.

II. Application of general rules:

a. Contracts of sale or purchase, 630.

b. Contracts for services, 633.

c. Contracts of employment, 634.

III. Miscellaneous, 636.

I. Introduction; general rules.

The scope of this annotation is limited, so far as the nature of the cases will permit, to the question stated in its title, to the exclusion of the question of the effect of the insolvency of the party in default, and of the question, where such party is a corporation, of its dissolution.

The courts have complicated the question in some instances by failing to consider it apart from the question (which this annotation does not purport to cover) whether a claim for damages arising from the nonperformance of the contract is properly allowable in the receivership proceedings. The discerning reader will need only to have the fact pointed out to him to recognize (albeit the courts have, in some instances, failed to do so) that the view that such a claim is not properly allowable as a debt incurred in the course of administration, or as a claim ranking pari passu with the claims of creditors existing at the time the receiver was appointed, is not necessarily based upon absence of liability on the part of the corporation for failure to perform its contract.

It is a general rule that what a party is bound by contract to perform, he must perform, or pay damages upon his failure to do so. To this rule, however, there have been admitted certain exceptions. The first is where the contract is one for personal services, in which case there is, generally, the implied condition that the person who is to render the service shall be alive and not incapacitated by illness. The second exception is where the specific thing which is essential to performance is destroyed. The third exception is where the performance of the contract has become unlawful; and the fourth is where the conditions with reference to which the parties must be deemed to have contracted do not in fact exist, or where, without fault of either party, there has been such a change in conditions that to enforce performance under the changed conditions is in effect to substitute a different contract.

If the appointment of a receiver will constitute an excuse for nonperformance of a contract, the case must be referable either to the third or the fourth of these exceptions; and in some instances has been referred to the former, in others to the latter.

Where the view is taken that the case is one falling within the third exception, it is immaterial whether the receivership has been brought about by the act or omission of the party for whom the receiver has been appointed; but where the case is regarded as referable to the fourth exception, the question whether or not the inability of the contracting party to perform, occasioned by the fact that his (or its) hands were tied by the appointment of a receiver, will constitute an excuse for nonperformance, will depend upon (a) whether the parties must be deemed to have contracted subject to the implied conditions that each should continue in control of his (or its) business, and (b) whether the receivership was brought about by the act or omission of the party for whom the receiver was appointed, in which case the rule applies that impossibility of performance, brought about by the act or omission of the contracting party, is no excuse.

So far as a majority view can be extracted from a mass of decisions turning on such varying factors, and speaking with reference to contracts other than of employment, it is that the appointment of a receiver is ordinarily no excuse for the nonperformance of a contract, and will not exonerate the promisor from liability for failure to perform. It should be noted that the above generalizations are based upon cases in most of which the contract involved (unlike the reported case, MOLLER v. HERRING, ante, 624) did not relate to a specific subject-matter. Where the contract relates to specific property, of which the receiver takes possession, it would seem entirely proper, and consistent with the rule followed in the majority of the foregoing cases, to hold that the continuance of existing conditions is an implied term of the contract, and accordingly that a change in such conditions operates to dissolve the contract and to exonerate either party from liability for damages for its breach.

As remarked in Du Pont v. Standard Arms Co. (1912) 9 Del. Ch. 315, 81 Atl. 1089, whether the receiver's termination of unfulfilled contracts gives a right to damages for the breach against the assets of the corporation which have come into the hands of the receiver may depend on the character of the subject of the contract.

In the case of contracts of employment, there is perhaps more reason than in the case of other contracts for supposing them to be subject to an implied condition that they should terminate in case the employer's business is put in the hands of a receiver; especially in the case of contracts between corporations and their officers: That such a condition may be implied, see Du Pont v. Standard Arms Co. (Del.) supra; McElheney v. Jasper Trading Co. (1913) 12 Ga. App. 790, 78 S. E. 727; Com. v. Eagle F. Ins. Co. (1867) 14 Allen (Mass.) 344 (president of corporation); *Lenoir v. #### Distinction between voluntary and forced receiverships.

The potential significance of the fact that a receivership is voluntary has already been remarked upon. Some judicial discussion of the point may be found in the subjoined decisions.

In Peck v. Southwestern Lumber & Exporting Co. (1912) 131 La. Ann. 177, 59 So. 113, it is said: "Between a voluntary and a forced receivership, a broad distinction must be recognized in the present connection, even though the forced receivership should have been unopposed, as in the present case. In a voluntary receivership the corporation is clearly not in a position to say that its not carrying out the contract was not due to its own voluntary act; whereas, in a forced receivership, it may with plausibility say that its default was due to the action of the law or to the act of the court; merely with plausibility, however, and not in reality, because in such a case the corporation is responsible for the interference of the court, so that in reality, or in final analysis, the act of the court is the act of the corporation itself. The corporation is responsible for the interference of the court because its own acts of commission or omission, its own conduct, its mismanagement, intentional or unintentional, of its own affairs, has rendered the interference of the court necessary."

In Welch v. San Cristobal Central (1914) 7 Porto Rico Fed. Rep. 311, it was held that while the action of the receiver of a corporation in declining to proceed with the performance of a contract, which action was approved by the court, does not amount to the infraction of the contract by either party, but is damnum absque injuria, and that there are, therefore, no damages accruing from the receivership as such, the corporation may be liable if, by becoming insolvent, it occasioned the receivership, and so put it out of its own power to carry out the contract.

The view is taken in Re D. Ross & Son (1915) 10 Del. Ch. 484, 95 Atl. 311, that it is immaterial whether the corporation acquiesces or participates in the proceeding to have a receiver appointed, the court saying: "Inasmuch as the purpose of a receivership based on insolvency is the protection of all creditors of the company and to prevent the inequitable consequences of a scramble for advantage by suits, it is not the duty of the officers of the company to oppose or delay a suit for the purpose of a receivership, where insolvency clearly exists, but rather to promote an early adjudication and the taking of possession of the affairs of the company by the receiver. The participation by the officers of the company in the suit of creditors to obtain the receiver should not affect the right to obtain from the assets of the company payment for damages sustained for breach of a contract with the company made. I do not agree to the limitation of the beneficial rule above referred to."

See also, in this connection, Stanford v. Robert H. Reid & Co. (1906) 114 App. Div. 185, 99 N. Y. Supp. 567; Reber v. Keystone Wagon Works (1908) 19 Pa. Dist. R. 806, as set forth infra.

II. Application of general rules.

a. Contracts of sale or purchase.

In Wolf v. National Bank (1899) 178 Ill. 85, 52 N. E. 896, it was held that the assets of a national bank in the hands of a receiver were liable for damages for breach of the bank's contract to repurchase bonds sold by it, for the price paid, should the seller so desire.

In Peck v. Southwestern Lumber & Exporting Co. (1912) 131 La. Ann. 177, 59 So. 113, it was held that a corporation was not exonerated from liability for nonperformance of a contract to buy lumber by the fact that it had been, at the suit of a creditor, without opposition on its part, put in the hands of a receiver, who refused to carry out the contract. In response to the defendant's contention that any loss of profit which the other party to the contract had suffered by reason of the receiver's failure to adopt such contract was damnum absque injuria, the court said: "No doubt the receiver is not bound to adopt the contracts of the corporation in the sense of making them his own in such a way that any debt that might accrue from them would be a debt of the receivership (as contradistinguished from a debt of the corporation), and as such entitled to preferred payment out of the assets of the receivership, and it is also true that by the appointment of a receiver a situation may be created wherein enforcement of specific performance may become impossible; but it does not follow from this that the obligation of a contract may be destroyed by the appointment of a receiver. Under the operation of familiar principles, the obligation of the contract resolves itself into a money debt, or so-called damages; that is all. And such a debt is a perfectly valid, binding debt, as much so as any promissory note or bond; and it would be as reasonable to contend that by the appointment of a receiver the promissory notes or bonds of a corporation were vacated, converted into damnum absque injuria, as to contend that such a debt for damages was thus nullified. True, the amount of such debt is not yet fixed or certain; but in law, 'Id certum est quod certum reddi potest.' The familiar principles here alluded to are embodied in our Code, but are of universal jurisprudence, and hence would be practically of the same authority, even though not so embodied. They are (art. 433) that 'corporations may make valid contracts, obligate others and obligate themselves towards others;' that (art. 8182) 'whoever has bound himself personally is obliged to fulfil his engagements out of all his property, movable and immovable, present and future;' that (art. 8183) 'the property of the debtor is the common pledge of his creditors, and the proceeds of its sale must be distributed among them ratably, unless there exist among the creditors some lawful cause of preference;' that (art. 1908) 'there is a right implied in all obligations, to wit: that the property of the debtor shall be liable for all consequences attending their nonperformance;' that (art. 1930) the party who violates his contract 'is liable as one of the incidents of his obligation, to the payment of the damages which the other party has sustained by his default;' that (art. 1901) 'agreements legally entered into have the effect of laws on those who have formed them, and cannot be revoked, unless by the mutual consent of parties, or for cause acknowledged by law.' From these principles the forced conclusion is that the property of the corporation continues to be bound after the corporation has been incapacitated by the appointment of a receiver from carrying out its contract; and we know of no law, statutory or other, that stays the operation of these principles. To that effect are the English decisions. 51 L.R.A. 146, note. It has to be admitted, however, that the weight of authority at common law in this country is the other way. *Malcomson v. And, after a quotation from People v. Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1883) 91 N. Y. 174, illustrative of the reasoning by which the doctrine of nonliability is sustained, the Louisiana court continues: "This reasoning, in so far as based upon the statement that 'this result was within the contemplation of the parties, and must be deemed an unexpressed condition of their agreement,' assumes a promise which, if granted, puts an end to all discussion, namely, that the parties contemplated that the appointment of a receiver should put an end to their contract. But we do not see why it should be said that they so contemplated. True, they knew that a receiver might be appointed; but they did not know that such appointment would have the effect of destroying the obligation of the contract. There was no law providing that it should; and there was no reason why it should, since the property of the corporation would still remain to answer in damages for the nonexecution of the contract. The courts of England have not found any reason why the obligation of the contract should not continue in full force. Of course, if the law provided that, upon the appointment of a receiver, all contracts of the corporation should be terminated, the legal situation would be different. Such a law would be read into the contract as one of its conditions. The statutes in this state which forbid insurance companies from doing any further business after the appointment of a receiver or liquidation might, perhaps, have such an operation. The argument that the intervention of the court, or, in other words, of the 'sovereign power,' operates as vis major, loses sight of the fact that such intervention is the necessary consequence of the acts of the corporation itself in provoking the appointment of a receiver by the mismanagement of its affairs. A court of justice cannot act until the party to be affected by its action has given it cause. The intervention of the court in such a case is the mere effect of the cause for which the corporation is responsible. It stands to reason that a corporation cannot, as an effect of its own acts of omission or commission, its own mismanagement, secure a release from the obligation of its contracts. If corporations could be thus relieved from their contracts, they would stand, with reference to the obligation of their contracts, in a much more favored position than ordinary persons."

In Pennsylvania Steel Co. v. New York City R. Co. (1912) 117 C. C. A. 517, 198 Fed. 735, it was held that a claim for damages for loss of profits, arising from the failure of a receiver of an insolvent railway company to adopt and continue the performance of its contract with an express company, might be proved as against other creditors, whose claims were, at the date of the appointment of the receiver, absolute. The court said: "It is possible that the appointment of a receiver of an objecting corporation, although preventing it from carrying out its executory contracts, might be considered to be the act of the law, and not such an act of the party as would constitute an anticipatory breach of such contracts within the rule. It is probable, too, that bankruptcy and insolvency do not break contracts when they do not in fact prevent performance. Thus, the bankruptcy of a lessee does not terminate the lease, and the lessee may be holden upon the rent covenant if he be permitted to continue his occupation. But when bankruptcy and insolvency do put it out of the power of the bankrupt or insolvent to perform his executory contracts, and when he does participate in bringing on the proceedings, they constitute the breach of such contract. How can it be otherwise? The situation is the equivalent either of an out-and-out repudiation, or of a complete disablement, and in either case the contract is broken. . . . In the present case the appointment of the receivers for the Metropolitan and City Companies completely disabled those corporations from carrying out the contract with the Metropolitan Express Company. That contract granted the right to do the 'express, freight, and delivery business' on the roads of the Metropolitan system. The receivers took possession of the roads and excluded the Express Company and its assignee. Certainly there was absolute 'disablement of performance.' The railway companies also practically admitted their insolvency when the receivers were appointed, and joined in the prayers for their appointment. It is clear, then, upon the authorities cited, that the contract in question was broken by the insolvency of the railway companies and the appointment of the receivers, unless the contention of the appellees be well founded that a receivership cannot operate to break an executory contract because the receivers are allowed a period in which to act upon it. As we have seen in the termination-of-lease proceeding, a receiver is entitled to a reasonable time in which to determine whether to adopt or renounce the contracts of the corporation for which he is appointed. During this trial period the operations under the contract may go on and the legal consequences flowing from the fact of the receivership may be suspended in their operation. If the receiver elect to adopt the contract, his adoption relates back to the beginning of the receivership, and the contract continues as if nothing had taken place. That which would otherwise have amounted to a breach of the contract does not have that effect on account of the receiver's acceptance of it. On the other hand, it necessarily follows that when a receiver rejects a contract, his rejection relates back to the beginning of the receivership, and the breach of the contract takes place as of that time. Any other rule would be altogether inequitable and one-sided."

In Curtis v. Walpole Tire & Rubber Co. (1915) 227 Fed. 698, the court, in holding a corporation liable for breach of a contract occasioned by the refusal of its receiver to carry out an executory contract of purchase, said: "The case is not one of which it can be said, as in Malcomson v. Wappoo Mills (1898) 88 Fed. 680, or in Re Inman (1910) 175 Fed. 312, that the prevention of performance was the act of the law, not of the insolvent or bankrupt. Both these decisions were based upon People v. Globe Ins. Co. (1883) 91 N. Y. 174, in which the receiver's appointment was at the instance of the state, and for the purpose of dissolving the corporation and winding up its affairs."

In Wells v. Hartford Manilla Co. (1903) 76 Conn. 27, 55 Atl. 599, the court, although holding that a claim for damages arising from the breach of an executory contract to purchase, caused by the failure of a receiver appointed upon complaint of a creditor to adopt the contract, was not allowable as a general claim against the estate, conceded that it might be such as against a balance remaining in the hands of a receiver after the expenses of settlement and claims of other creditors were paid.

In Re D. Ross & Son (1915) 10 Del. Ch. 434, 95 Atl. 311, it was held that the appointment of a receiver for an insolvent corporation, by which its corporate activity was paralyzed and it was prevented by the court from performing its obligations, did not prevent the enforcement of a right to damages for the breach of an executory contract to purchase made by the insolvent company.

That performance of a contract of sale is not excused by the appointment of a receiver for the seller in a debenture holder's action is assumed in Parsons v. Sovereign Bank (1912) 107 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 572, 29 Times L. R. 38.

On the other hand, in Malcomson v. Wappoo Mills (Fed.) supra, it was held that when a corporation has contracted to sell and deliver merchandise upon a future day, and, before the time of delivery arrives, is enjoined from in any wise interfering with its property, and a receiver is appointed of all its assets, performance of its contract is rendered impossible by judicial action, and the buyer has no claim for damages. The report of this case does not show whether the appointment of the receiver was voluntary or involuntary, or whether or not the corporation was dissolved.

b. Contracts for services.

In Klauber v. San Diego Street Car Co. (1892) 95 Cal. 853, 80 Pac. 555, it was held that the performance by a street railway company of a contract to operate three regular trains each day for a period of ten years, over an extension of its road, under penalty of forfeiting such extension, to be conveyed upon demand, was not excused as having been prevented by operation of law by the fact that a receiver had been appointed in a suit brought by a mortgagee to foreclose a mortgage upon the street railway, the court saying: "No case has been cited in which it has been held that interference by a writ sued out by a private litigant will excuse performance of a contract, although it may deprive the contractor of the means of performance. It is not prevention by operation of law. It is the act of an individual, and not of the government. In a certain sense, the property so taken may be in the custody of the law, and yet the seizure may be wrongful, and the suitor held responsible, as for a trespass, in damages. The law recognizes the fact that these private remedies may be wrongfully, that is illegally, used, and the litigant is required to give security for any damage that may be caused if it should be finally decided that the writ was improperly issued. This cannot be called the operation of law within the meaning of the Civil Code. The obligor contracts that he can and will control the acts of third parties, so far as necessary to enable him to perform his contract. People v. Bartlett (1842) 3 Hill (N. Y.) 570. Nor would it be a defense that the law has rendered it difficult or very expensive to perform. The rule is, if performance is in itself possible, there is a breach, although the obligor himself may have become wholly unable to perform. The suit to foreclose the mortgage against the property of defendant did not render performance impossible; defendant could have paid the claim or given security, and have had the receiver discharged."

The attempt is sometimes made to distinguish this case, by courts inclined to take the opposite view, on the ground that although one alternative open to the company under the contract in question, viz., the operation of its cars over the extension, was rendered impossible by the receivership, the other, viz., the conveyance of the extension, was not, and hence that the company might be compelled to perform.

A street railway corporation is liable for breach of contract to operate a certain line, notwithstanding its abandonment was the act of its receiver, since no act of the receiver whether done under the orders of the court or otherwise, can relieve the company from the obligations arising from a contract entered into prior to said receivership. Arlington Heights Realty Co. v. Citizens' R. & Light Co. (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 160 S. W. 1109.

In Brown v. Warner (1890) 78 Tex. 543, 11 L.R.A. 394, 22 Am. St. Rep. 67, 14 S. W. 1082, the court, in considering the question of the liability of a receiver for an act constituting a breach of the company's obligation to maintain a switch at a certain place, said that when, in the management of the road, the receiver deemed it proper to remove the switch and did remove it, the contract of the company was broken, and it was liable in damages for its breach.

In Stannard v. Robert H. Reid & Co. (1906) 114 App. Div. 135, 99 N. Y. Supp. 567, and also upon a subsequent appeal of the same case in (1907) 118 App. Div. 304, 103 N. Y. Supp. 521, which was affirmed without opinion in (1909) 195 N. Y. 530, 88 N. E. 1132, in which the defense was made in an action against a corporation for non-performance of a construction contract that, while such contract was wholly unexecuted, the court, on the application of a stockholder, in proceedings for its voluntary dissolution which were not instituted by the defendant corporation, appointed receivers of the defendant, and that by operation of law it became unable to and did not continue in business until the discharge of said receivers, it was held that the corporation was not, as a matter of law, prevented or excused from performing the contract in question by the appointment of the receivers, or relieved from liability for damages for its breach, but that its liability depended upon whether the receivership was necessitated by the insolvency of the company, in which event the view was expressed that it would not be liable, or whether it was brought about by it with a view to avoiding its obligations. And the jury having found that the company was not insolvent, a verdict for the plaintiff was sustained.

c. Contracts of employment.

In Du Pont v. Standard Arms Co. (1912) 9 Del. Ch. 315, 81 Atl. 1089, it was held that the possibility of the termination of service between a corporation and its employees by the appointment of a receiver, and his refusal to adopt such contract, was contemplated by the parties to the contract, and was made an unexpressed but implied condition of it, and accordingly that a claim for damages therefor was not allowable against the estate.

Contracts for wages are discharged by operation of law where the corporate employer has been placed in the hands of a receiver under a bill filed by the stockholder, its business stopped by injunction, and no provision made for the continuance thereof by the receiver. McElheney v. Jasper Trading Co. (1913) 12 Ga. App. 790, 78 S. E. 727.

In Com. v. Eagle F. Ins. Co. (1867) 14 Allen (Mass.) 344, it was held that the president of a corporation for which a receiver was appointed, the corporation being permitted to do all necessary acts to continue its corporate existence until its concerns should be fully and finally closed, is not entitled to a salary during the period of the receivership, the exercise of his office having been suspended by legal authority.

In Law v. Waldron (1911) 280 Pa. 458, 79 Atl. 647, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 467, it was held that the contract of a general agent with an insurance company was subject to the implied condition that it should terminate in case the insurance company should go into the hands of a receiver, the business being one which could not be conducted by receivers; and this notwithstanding the agency contract contained a clause providing for its termination upon ninety days' notice, such clause being held applicable only to a discontinuance of the contract during the natural business life of the company.

In Reber v. Keystone Wagon Works (1908) 19 Pa. Dist. R. 806, it was held that an employee of a corporation is ordinarily not entitled to damages for breach of contract occasioned by his discharge by the receiver, either against the company or against the receiver, the court saying: "Implied by force of logical and no less practical necessity in the firmly established rule that a receivership takes away the company's control over its affairs and transfers it to the receiver, and for that purpose involves an injunction restraining the company's agents and officers from intermeddling with them (Treat v. Pennsylvania Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1901) 199 Pa. 326, 85 Am. St. Rep. 788; Jones v. Weir (1907) 217 Pa. 321, 66 Atl. 550, 10 Ann. Cas. 692), it is the generally accepted doctrine that it is the receiver's right to refuse to carry out contracts of the company unfulfilled at the time of his appointment (United States Trust Co. v. Wabash Western R. Co. (1893) 150 U. S. 287, 37 L. ed. 1085, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 86); and this doctrine has virtually been held applicable to the specific case here presented of a contract between a company and its general agent for services to be rendered by him at a stipulated salary, over a period running beyond the inception of the receivership (People v. Globe Mut. L.

Ins. Co. (1883) 91 N. Y. 174). There are respectable authorities to the contrary. But our own cases, in so far as they throw light upon this subject, are in entire harmony with the principle stated. See Dean's Appeal (1881) 98 Pa. 101; Com. ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. American L. Ins. Co. (1894) 162 Pa. 586; Cowan v. Pennsylvania Plate Glass Co. (1898) 184 Pa. 1, 38 Atl. 1075. The case of Sweatman's Appeal (1892) 150 Pa. 369, 24 Atl. 617, which was not one of a receivership, but of a voluntary assignment for benefit of creditors, stands, though perhaps not for that reason, upon an altogether different plane." It was also held to be immaterial that the corporation did not contest the application for the appointment of a receiver, but filed an answer admitting its insolvency, so long as there was no conspiracy between the company's directors and the plaintiff in the bill to bring about a receivership, without adequate grounds therefor, and for the purpose of avoiding the obligations of their contract with the plaintiff.

In Lenoir v. Linville Improv. Co. (1900) 126 N. C. 922, 51 L.R.A. 146, 86 S. E. 185, it was held that the right of officers of a corporation to their salaries was terminated, although their terms of office had not expired, by the appointment of a receiver for the company on account of its insolvency, since the appointment of a receiver operates as a dissolution of any contract between the parties for such services, by the sovereign power of the state.

A like decision was made in Williamson County Bkg. & T. Co. v. Roberts-Buford Dry Goods Co. (1907) 118 Tenn. 345, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 644, 101 S. W. 421, 12 Ann. Cas. 579, in which the court said: "It should be remembered that petitioner Roberts was a stockholder and director, as well as president and treasurer, of the defendant corporation, whose assets and affairs are being administered. He was charged in law as a director and officer with notice of its condition, financially and otherwise, and accepted his election to office with such notice.

He knew and contracted, necessarily, in respect of that knowledge, that, upon the happening of the contingency that arose within less than a month of his election, creditors might invoke the aid of the courts of the country, and through that channel secure an administration of the affairs of the corporation, just as has been done. He knew—was charged with the knowledge—that, upon the happening of such contingency, the corporation could not carry out its contract with him, and he could not carry out his contract with it. The petitioner did not deal with the corporation, in accepting office at the compensation fixed and for the period elected, at arm's length, as would a stranger have done; but he dealt as one charged with the knowledge of and privity with all of the facts, circumstances, and conditions surrounding the corporation and involving its life tenure."

On the other hand, in Reid v. Explosives Co. (1887) L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. (Eng.) 264, 56 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 388, 57 L. T. N. S. 439, 35 Week. Rep. 509, it was held that the result of an appointment of a receiver for a corporation at the instance of the debenture holders was to discharge its servants from their service to their original employer, and that in such case there is a wrongful dismissal for which an action will lie.

And in Isaac McLean Sons Co. v. William S. Butler & Co. (1914) 227 Fed. 325, it was held that the claim of an employee whose services had been dispensed with by the receiver of an insolvent corporation, for damages arising from nonperformance of its contract on the part of the corporation, was allowable against the estate.

In Eddy v. Co-operative Dress Asso. (1883) 3 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 442, in which one who had been employed by a corporation as its superintendent sought to have his claim for damages for breach of contract, occasioned by his discharge by its receiver appointed in a sequestration action, allowed as a claim against its assets, the court, while holding that as the claimant was not, at the time of appointing the receiver, a creditor of the corporation, he could not claim to share in the funds in court to the detriment of other creditors, stated that, "if the company continues in existence, he may have a valid claim against it."

In Commercial Pub. Co. v. Beckwith (1901) 167 N. Y. 329, 60 N. E. 642, which involved a contract between a corporation publishing a newspaper and an advertising agent, it was said that the receiver of a corporation may refuse to carry out or execute a contract made between the corporation and another party, and by so doing leave him with his claim for damages for a breach of the contract; or that, if he sees fit, he may carry out and perform the contract of the corporation, and thus prevent any claim for damages.

That the insolvency of a corporate employer and the consequent proceedings for the winding up of its business constitute a breach of the contract of employment, for which the employee is entitled to be compensated, is recognized in Spader v. Mural Decoration Mfg. Co. (1890) 47 N. J. Eq. 18, 20 Atl. 378.

III. Miscellaneous.

Under this head will be found some cases which, although not strictly in point upon the question discussed in this note, are of collateral interest.

In Burton v. Bay State Gas Co. (1911) 110 C. C. A. 197, 188 Fed. 161, it was held that the appointment of a receiver had the effect to terminate an employment at will, as such a contract can subsist only so long as each party is of ability to contract.

In Commonwealth Roofing Co. v. North American Trust Co. (1905) 68 C. C. A. 418, 135 Fed. 984, it was said that upon the appointment of a receiver in an action to foreclose a mortgage against a corporation, the effect of which was so far to put into his control the assets of the corporation as to disenable it from making payments on contracts entered into by it for the construction of buildings for its use, the other contracting party was entitled to treat the contract as abandoned as of the date of the appointment of the receiver, with, however, a right to delay a reasonable time before declaring an abandonment, for the purpose of ascertaining what would ultimately be determined on as to the resumption of work.

It has been said that the fact of a receivership is not per se a breach; but that it is not until the receivers refuse or fail to recognize and observe the contract that a breach thereof takes place. Diamond State Iron Co. v. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. (1895) 11 Tex. Civ. App. 587, 38 S. W. 987. But compare Pennsylvania Steel Co. v. New York City R. Co. (1912) 117 C. C. A. 517, 198 Fed. 735; and Reid v. Explosives Co. (1887) L. R. 19 Q. B. Div. (Eng.) 264, 56 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 388, 57 L. T. N. S. 439, 35 Week. Rep. 509, set forth supra.

It has been held that the damages for failure on the part of a corporation to perform its contract to sell goods may be set off against a receiver's claim for goods delivered by him while he had under advisement the question whether he would assume the contract. Parsons v. Sovereign Bank (1912) 107 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 572, 29 Times L. R. 38, reversing (1910) 24 Ont. L. Rep. 387.

A contrary view was taken by the court of appeals in Butterworth v. Degnon Contracting Co. (1914) 131 C. C. A. 184, 214 Fed. 772, reversing (1913) 208 Fed. 381, the court saying: "On taking possession as receiver he found a contract which might develop into an exceedingly valuable asset. Had he repudiated it, without investigation, he would have been guilty of a clear dereliction of duty. He was in duty bound to proceed with the contract if it were beneficial to the estate administered by him, and to abandon it if not beneficial. He had a reasonable time to investigate before deciding this problem. He concluded to try the experiment of transporting some of the stone, and soon found that he could not continue without loss to the estate. This being so, it was his duty to discontinue. He had no right to go on with a contract which was certain to subject the creditors whose interests he was bound to protect, to additional loss. How could the question whether or not the contract was a valuable asset be determined more satisfactorily than by trying the experiment of proceeding under the contract long enough to ascertain whether it was of any value to the creditors? If the receiver had a right to make this experiment, and of this we think there can be no doubt, he is entitled to be paid on a quantum meruit for the value of the material furnished. The service was not rendered by the Transportation Company, but by Butterworth, as a receiver, and as receiver he is entitled to be paid. The defendant received services worth over $8,000; if these had been furnished by a new contractor the defendant would have had to pay for them in full. Why should it not pay the receiver? Why should the claim for damages against the Transportation Company be set off against the Degnon Company's debt to the receiver for stone transported by him after the failure of the company?" E. S. O.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILWAY COMPANY, et al.

(180 Ky. 295, 202 S. W. 632.)

Carriers — cuspidor on floor — negligence.

1. It is not negligence to maintain a cuspidor on the floor of the smoking compartment of a Pullman car so as to render the carrier liable in case a passenger, in attempting to pass through the curtained doorway, stumbles over the cuspidor and is injured, if there is nothing to show by whom or when it was placed in the doorway.

Trial — direction of verdict — absence of evidence.

2. A verdict should be directed for defendant in an action by a passenger to recover damages for injuries by falling over a cuspidor on the floor of the smoking compartment of a passenger coach, in the absence of evidence showing negligence on the part of the carrier.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Kenton County sustaining a motion for direction of a verdict in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. H. M. Benton and H. M. Healy, Jr., for appellant.

Mr. Martin M. Durrett for appellee Pullman Company:

In order to sustain the cause of action set up in the petition, plaintiff was bound to prove that defendants had actual knowledge of the position of the cuspidor complained of. There was no such proof.

Messrs. S. D. Rouse and Benjamin D. Warfield, for appellee Railroad Company:

Defendants were required by regulation 23 of the state board of health of Kentucky to have the cuspidor in the compartment.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On May 13, 1916, the appellant Hawkins, who was the plaintiff below, boarded the appellee's train at Newport about 8 o'clock in the morning to go to Louisville. He entered the Pullman or chair car, and, having deposited his raincoat upon a chair which he had reserved in advance, he went to the smoking compartment at the rear end of the car. Very soon after the train had left Latonia, and only a few minutes after Hawkins had entered the smoking compartment, a friend having asked him for a deck of cards which was in a pocket of his raincoat, Hawkins arose and started to leave the smoking compartment to get the cards. As he passed through the door of the smoking compartment into the aisle which leads to the main body of the car, Hawkins struck his foot against a heavy cuspidor and fell against the side of the car, cutting a large gash in his forehead. He suffered considerable pain and was confined to his house for several days of the ensuing week. Hawkins did not see the cuspidor, because it was concealed by a heavy curtain, which hung over the entrance to the smoking compartment and had been pushed back about half the distance of the opening. The curtain extended to within about 6 inches of the floor.

Hawkins brought this suit against the Louisville & Nashville Railway Company and the Pullman Company, alleging negligence on the part of both companies in suffering and permitting the cuspidor to be and remain in the door of the smoking compartment of the car, thereby causing the plaintiff to stumble over the cuspidor, to his injury as above indicated. The answers traversed the petition and interposed pleas of contributory negligence on the part of Hawkins. At the end of the plaintiff's proof the trial court sustained the motion of the defendants for a directed verdict, and Hawkins appeals.

The plaintiff necessarily rests his case upon the alleged negligence of the defendants, and in support of that theory he contends that the defendants were negligent in placing or permitting the cuspidor to remain in the doorway and concealed by the curtain, and that the rule requiring notice to the carrier of objects taken aboard by other passengers does not apply in this case, because the cuspidor which caused the injury was a part of the carrier's equipment, which had been placed on the car by the defendants. In support of this contention the appellant relies upon Beiser v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 152 Ky. 522, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1050, 153 S. W. 742, and Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Lorton, 83 Ky. L. Rep. 689, 110 S. W. 857. But, in our opinion, neither of these cases sustains the plaintiff's contention. In Beiser v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. supra, a passenger deposited a valise in the aisle of a car that was so poorly lighted that Mrs. Beiser could not see the obstruction when she entered the car; consequently she stumbled over it, injuring herself. In holding that she was entitled to recover, this court rested her right solely upon the fact that the company was negligent in not lighting the car so that Mrs. Beiser might see the way when she entered it, and expressly disavowed the plaintiff's right to recover on account of the other passenger having deposited his valise in the aisle, where it remained without notice to any of the servants or employees of the company. Upon that point the court said: "We are not prepared to hold that the evidence will allow the appellant to recover on the ground that appellee was guilty of negligence in allowing the valise to remain in the aisle until she was injured by falling over it, for according to Gooth, who alone testified on that point, the valise did not remain in the aisle where it was placed by the owner more than five minutes before the accident occurred, and, as shown by all the testimony, during that interval the conductor and brakeman of the train were not in the car at all, but were on the outside of the train, directing and assisting passengers to get thereon. Being thus engaged in the performance of their necessary duties, it is manifest that they did not know, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have known, of the obstruction of the aisle by the valise."

Really the Beiser Case sustains the ruling of the circuit court, since in this case the plaintiff's injury was caused by an obstruction of the doorway, not shown to have been caused by the defendants, and of which they had no notice.

In the Lorton Case, supra, Mrs. Lorton's hand was injured by a window of the coach falling upon it, and the case turned upon the question whether the railway company had in that case provided and maintained its passenger coach, including the window, in a reasonably safe condition for the safety, convenience, and comfort of passengers, and the liability of the company was rested upon the fact that it had failed to perform its duty in that respect. But in the case at bar there is no contention that the defendant failed to furnish Hawkins a safe car; on the contrary, plaintiff rests his claim to a recovery upon the ground that the company is responsible for the obstruction of the doorway by the hidden cuspidor over which he stumbled. But the carrier's liability in such a case depends upon whether its servants or employees created the obstruction, or failed to remove it after actual or imputed notice of its existence.

Appellant insists, however, that the rule requiring notice to the carrier of objects taken aboard by other passengers does not apply to articles which have been placed in the car by the carrier and are not a part of the carrier's necessary equipment. We cannot agree, however, that a cuspidor is not a proper or even a necessary part of the equipment of a smoking compartment, which is set aside for the use of smokers. In principle, this case is quite like Louisville & N. R. Co. v. O'Brien, 163 Ky. 538, 174 S. W. 31, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 1084, where the plaintiff stepped upon a banana peel and fell from the steps of a car; but as there was no evidence as to when, where, or by whom the banana peel was thrown or placed on the step, or that defendant had any notice thereof, either actual or imputed, this court said the plaintiff had not shown a right to a recovery. The cuspidor being a useful and necessary appliance, there was no negligence upon the part of the appellees in having it in the <sup>Carriers—

cuspidor on floor
—negligence.</sup> smoking compartment; and Hawkins offered no evidence to show any negligence on the part of the servants or employees of the defendant by reason of the fact that the cuspidor was at the place where Hawkins stumbled over it.

It is elementary that, in order for the plaintiff to recover in a case of this character, he must show some negligence on the part of the defendant; and in the absence of some proof showing a <sup>Trial—direction of verdict—absence of evidence.</sup> breach of duty a directed verdict for the defendant is proper. Huntington Contract Co. v. Bush, 179 Ky. 433, 200 S. W. 618. Under the proof in this case the cuspidor may have been placed in the doorway by a passenger only a moment before Hawkins stumbled over it.

Judgment affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of carrier for injury to passenger by articles belonging to carrier on the floor or in the aisles.

The reported case (HAWKINS v. LOUISVILLE & N. R. Co. ante, 637) is a close case on the facts, and leaves a doubt whether the jury should not have been given an opportunity to pass upon the question of the carrier's negligence.

In Sherman v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1887) 106 N. Y. 542, 11 N. Y. S. R. 818, 13 N. E. 616, the plaintiff had recovered a judgment against the railway company for injuries in tripping over a board. He testified that he heard a whistle which he supposed was meant for his station, and got up from the seat in which he was sitting and walked to the other end of the car to get some of his baggage, and was returning to his former seat, when he tripped and fell over a board stretching across the aisle, about 15 inches from the floor, from under one seat to under the one immediately opposite, which had been placed there by a brakeman in order to reach and light one of the lamps in the car. There was a dispute as to the time when the board was placed there by the brakeman; the plaintiff alleging it was between the time he passed down the aisle for his baggage and his return to his seat, while the brakeman alleged that he was standing, or just preparing to stand, on the board when the plaintiff came up and asked him to let him pass, which he did, and in doing so cautioned him to be careful about or look out for the board. The court of appeals reversed the judgment because the trial court permitted the plaintiff to testify to a conversation after the accident, with the brakeman, who then admitted that it was his fault that the board was "left there," on the ground that the conversation was no part of the res gestæ. The court said: "It is also said that the evidence in the case is so plain as to the happening and the cause of the accident that the testimony under consideration could not have possibly harmed the defendant. This we cannot clearly see. The case may have been fully proved, and yet the responsibility of defendant therefor not necessarily follow."

The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies where a street car company leaves one end of the trolley rope lying on the car floor, partially coiled, in such a way that a passenger attempting to alight from the car becomes entangled in it, and is thrown and injured by the starting of the car; and the fact that the rope was fastened in the proper place when the conductor last changed the trolley at the end of the route does not free the company from liability; nor may the company show that no similar accident had ever been reported to it. Denver City Tramway Co. v. Hills (1911) 50 Colo. 328, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 213, 116 Pac. 125, where it was also held that there was no prejudicial error in admitting evidence in rebuttal as to the manner of fastening the rope some time after the accident, where the company had offered evidence as to the custom of fastening ropes, which extended over a long period of time.

The only other cases directly in point which have been found relate to mats.

In Geisenberger v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1917) 65 Pa. Super. Ct. 376, the court sustained a verdict for the plaintiffs, husband and wife, who both tripped upon a curled and doubled-up mat lying on the floor of the passageway of the dining car early in the morning as they were leaving the car, no other passengers having yet entered it, and the wife was injured.

In The North Star (1909) 169 Fed. 711, a steamship was held liable for injuries to a child four years old who stumbled over a mat in an exit from a passageway leading from the saloon to the promenade deck, by reason of insufficient lights. It was shown that a man who went to assist the child also stumbled over the mat.

In Mohns v. Netherlands-American Steam Nav. Co. (1910) 104 C. C. A. 551, 182 Fed. 323, a steamship company was held liable for injuries to a passenger where she stepped upon a mat at the head of a stairway, which caused her to fall, the mat being too small to fit the place, both in length and width.

Where a passenger while being conducted on an errand by the ship's captain, in a violent storm, was thrown by a sudden lurch of the ship against bolts and projections of a door, and she testified that there was a loose mat or "jute runner" which slipped when the lurch came and threw her off her feet, the court declined to disturb a verdict in her favor. Compagnie Générale Transatlantique v. Bump (1916) 148 C. C. A. 68, 234 Fed. 52, writ of certiorari denied in (1916) 242 U. S. 642, 61 L. ed. 542, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 114.

It may be noted that in Cahn v. Manhattan R. Co. (1902) 37 Misc. 824, 76 N. Y. Supp. 893, the court reversed a judgment in favor of a passenger who stepped on a nail, the point of which entered his shoe and stuck there, injuring him, saying: "It seems quite improbable that the nail should have come from the floor of defendant's car, in view of the fact that the point entered plaintiff's shoe and remained in his shoe, until it was pulled out on the platform by an employee of defendant. There was a matting on the floor, and the happening of the accident would be more consistent with the theory that a loose nail had been dropped by someone in the car."

Injuries from ropes on vessels are not included: see, for example, The Annie L. Vansciver (1908) 161 Fed. 640; Kohn v. International Mercantile Marine Co. (1910) 180 Fed. 495; Re Keansburg S. B. Co. (1918) 161 C. C. A. 430, 249 Fed. 472. For a case of injury from exposed rudder chains see Garoni v. Compagnie Nationale de Navigation (1891) 39 N. Y. S. R. 63, 14 N. Y. Supp. 797, affirmed in (1892) 131 N. Y. 614, 30 N. E. 865. B. B. B.

ALBERT FORGE.

(183 Ky. 521, 209 S. W. 369.)

Arrest — liability of officer.

1. A subordinate police officer participating in a wrongful arrest is not absolved from liability therefor by the fact that he was acting under orders of his superior officer.

— without warrant — liability of private citizen.

2. A private citizen called to the assistance of a police officer in making an arrest is not liable in damages to the person arrested, although the arrest was without authority.

— duty of citizen.

3. When a citizen is called upon to assist an officer in making an arrest, the law makes it his duty to obey and act at once.

[See 2 R. C. L. 491.]

Police — duty of officer.

4. A police officer is conclusively presumed to know his duty and to refrain from acting outside of such duty.

[See 10 R. C. L. 880.]

Trial — jury — grounds for arrest.

5. The jury must pass upon the question of reasonable grounds for belief on the part of a police officer of the commission of a felony, authorizing an arrest without warrant, if the facts constituting such grounds are in dispute.

[See 2 R. C. L. 446, 447.]

Robbery — attempt as felony.

6. An attempt to commit robbery is a felony.

Trial — question of law — probable cause for prosecution.

7. In actions for malicious prosecution, if the facts alleged to constitute probable cause are undisputed, the question is one of law for the court.

[See 18 R. C. L. 58.]

Arrest — without warrant — justification.

8. If the facts are such that a reasonably prudent man would have believed accused guilty, and would have acted upon that belief, a police officer is justified in making an arrest without warrant, although subsequent events prove that no offense had been committed, or, if committed, that accused had no connection with it, where the statute authorizes arrest without warrant when the officer has reasonable grounds for believing that the person arrested had committed a felony, although not in his presence.

— reasonable grounds for arrest.

9. A police officer is justified in arresting without warrant, under a statute authorizing such arrest if he had reasonable grounds for believing that a felony had been committed, if he was informed by a fifteen-year-old boy who is apparently sincere and creditable, that accused, whom he pointed out, had attempted to rob him.

Trial — instruction — absence of evidence.

10. Instructions should not be given which there is no evidence to sustain.

Assault — justification — insult — attempt at assault.

11. Neither insulting language nor an unsuccessful attempt by one under arrest to assault the officer in charge of him justifies an assault upon him by the officer, if no reasonably prudent person could conclude that the attempted assault could have been successful.

— to prevent escape.

12. A police officer cannot justify an assault upon a prisoner in his charge on the theory that it was necessary to prevent an escape, if no attempt was being made to effect an escape.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Campbell County in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, in an action brought to recover damages for wrongful arrest and for alleged assault and battery committed on plaintiff after he was put under arrest. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Barbour & Bassmann, for appellants:

A policeman arresting pursuant to order of his superior officer is justified. Certainly so, if the order on its face be not unreasonable nor unlawful.

State v. Evans, 161 Mo. 95, 84 Am. St. Rep. 669, 61 S. W. 590; McMahan v. Green, 34 Vt. 69, 80 Am. Dec. 665; Hamlin v. Com. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 348, 12 S. W. 146; Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Cundiff, 166 Ky. 594, 179 S. W. 615, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 513; Franks v. Smith, 142 Ky. 282, L.R.A.1915A, 1141, 134 S. W. 484, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 319.

A policeman may lawfully assault one in his lawful custody, where he has reasonable grounds to believe that such assault is necessary in order to retain the custody of his prisoner.

Renfro v. Barlow, 181 Ky. 812, 115 S. W. 225; Connelly v. American Bonding & T. Co. 113 Ky. 903, 69 S. W. 959; Forestal v. National Surety Co. 168 Ky. 552, 182 S. W. 614; Fulton v. Staats, 41 N. Y. 498.

In an action of assault by a prisoner against an arresting officer, where the defendant pleads self-defense and where there is a scintilla of evidence to support it, it is error to refuse an instruction on self-defense.

Forestal v. National Surety Co. 168 Ky. 552, 182 S. W. 614.

Messrs. William A. Burkamp and Phil J. Ryan for appellee.

Thomas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant Clifford Grau was a policeman in the city of Newport, and had executed bond as required by law, with his codefendant and coappellant, National Surety Company, as surety thereon. This suit was brought by appellee, plaintiff below, Albert Forge, against the policeman and his surety, to recover damages for alleged false arrest and for damages resulting from an injury inflicted upon plaintiff by the policeman, because of an alleged malicious assault and battery committed by him upon plaintiff after he was put under arrest.

The answer admitted the arrest, but justified it upon the ground that the defendant policeman had reasonable grounds to believe when it was made, that plaintiff had committed a felony, and the assault and battery was attempted to be justified because it was alleged that plaintiff tried to make his escape and first made an assault upon the officer, and that no more force was used than was necessary to prevent the escape, or appeared in the exercise of a reasonable discretion to be necessary to save defendant from bodily harm threatened and about to be inflicted upon him by plaintiff. These defenses were put in issue, and upon trial there was a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff for the full amount sued for, $1,000, and, defendants' motion for a new trial having been overruled, they prosecute this appeal.

A number of grounds are relied upon as constituting prejudicial error sufficient to authorize a reversal of the judgment, but we deem none of them of such importance or materiality as to deserve our consideration, except such as may be referred to during the progress of this opinion. Before taking up any of the grounds urged, we think it necessary to make a substantial statement of the facts.

Plaintiff is about thirty years of age, a printer by trade, and resided in the city of Newport. On the Saturday night in question he went to the home of a friend, where others had met, and the crowd consumed a pitcher of beer, which, according to the proof, was but one glass each. They remained there and talked from about 7:30 until after 10, when plaintiff and a companion started to the former's boarding house for the purpose of spending the night. On the way they stopped at a saloon, and went in for the purpose of obtaining another glass of beer. While plaintiff was drinking it, defendant and another policeman arrested him. They had no warrant, and he had not committed any offense in their presence. They started with him to police headquarters, and, according to plaintiff's testimony, when they had gone something like a square, defendant struck plaintiff in the mouth with such force as to loosen some of his teeth and bruise his lips and gums, causing them to bleed quite freely. The force of this lick, according to plaintiff's testimony and that of his witness, was sufficient to cause him to fall to the walk, but for the support of the defendant and a fellow policeman, between whom he was walking. A short distance further along on the route, according to plaintiff's proof, defendant struck him another blow by the side of the head, and it was as severe as the first one. When they arrived at police headquarters, the officer in charge, after questioning plaintiff and his witness and others professing to have any knowledge upon the subject, released plaintiff, which ended the matter; there being no further prosecution.

But a short while before the arrest, one Harvey Sipple, a boy about fifteen years of age who lived at Newport, stated to the officer in charge of the police headquarters (and who was superior to defendant) that someone had attempted to rob him on Fifth street. He went in to detail about the supposed felon, who, as he stated, inquired of him if he had any money, stating that he, the felon, wanted it, and made an effort to get to his pockets; but the witness escaped and ran up the street, with the supposed robber pursuing him. Witness eluded the robber, but related his story to a policeman by the name of Armstrong, who advised witness to look around and see if he could locate the man who had attempted to rob him, which he did, and pointed out plaintiff, who was in the saloon referred to, as being the guilty person. Witness and Armstrong immediately went to police headquarters, where, after making his statement, defendant and another policeman were detailed to make the arrest, and they went with the witness Sipple to the saloon, where plaintiff was pointed out to defendant as the guilty person, whereupon he was arrested, as hereinbefore stated. On that occasion Sipple was not only positive of plaintiff's guilt, but upon the trial of this case he was firmly of the opinion that plaintiff was the man who tried to rob him.

It is first insisted that a peremptory instruction should have been given to find for defendants upon that branch of the case complaining of the false arrest, upon the two grounds: (a) That defendant, in making the arrest, was acting under the direct orders of a superior officer; and (b) that the uncontradicted facts show that he had reasonable grounds to believe plaintiff guilty of a felony.

In support of the contention (a) it is urged that an inferior police officer is bound to obey the orders and directions of his superior, and that in doing so he is not amenable to the person arrested, although the arrest was wrongful and without warrant of law; and this conclusion is sought to be drawn by analogy from that principle of the law which excuses an individual from liability when called upon by an officer to assist in making an arrest, although the officer was proceeding without authority; and some cases in other states, as well as those of Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Cundiff, 166 Ky. 594, 179 S. W. 615, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 513, and Franks v. Smith, 142 Ky. 232, L.R.A.1915A, 1141, 184 S. W. 484, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 319, from this court, are relied upon. We do not doubt the principle of law which, under the circumstances mentioned, excuses a private citizen from liability, however wrongful the arrest might have been; but that principle cannot be extended so as to protect an officer, although subordinate to another, warrant—

who directed the arrest. The precise point was determined contrary to the contention —liability of officer.

here made in the case of Leger v. Warren, 62 Ohio St. 500, 51 L.R.A. 193, 78 Am. St. Rep. 738, 57 N. E. 506, and substantially so by this court in the case of Franks v. Smith, supra. Aside from these express determinations of the question, the two situations are by no means analogous. When a citizen is called upon to assist an officer in making an arrest, the law makes it his duty to obey and act at once, and he is justified in assuming that the officer is acting within his official duties and under authority duly conferred by the law. To permit a citizen in such cases to delay the arrest by withholding his assistance until he can satisfy himself of the legality of the officer's proceeding would frequently result in the escape of criminals, and would seriously retard the enforcement of the law. Not so with an officer. He is conclusively presumed to know his duty, and to refrain from acting outside of such duty. The announcement of such a principle of law as contended for would greatly imperil the liberties of the citizen, and would in almost every case render the arresting officer immune from the consequences of his unlawful arrest, since it could be easily shown that some officer other than the one making the arrest had given the defendant orders to make it. We therefore conclude that the court did not err in declining to give the instruction based upon this contention.

—duty of citizen.

Briefly considering ground (b) insisted upon, § 36 of the Criminal Code of Practice authorizes an officer to make an arrest (1) in all cases where he has a warrant of arrest duly issued by a proper officer; (2) without a warrant when a public offense has been committed in his presence; and (3) without a warrant when he has reasonable grounds for believing that the person arrested has committed a felony, although not in his presence.

In this case, as we have seen, the defendant had no warrant, nor had the plaintiff committed any offense in his presence, and so, if there was any authority for the arrest, it was upon the third ground stated, i. e., that defendant had reasonable grounds to believe that plaintiff had committed a felony. If the facts constituting the reasonable grounds for belief upon which the defendant acted in making the arrest were in dispute, there could be no doubt but that the jury should pass upon that question under proper instructions. But there is no dispute in the testimony about the facts constituting such grounds for believing the plaintiff guilty. Nobody denies but that the witness Sipple made the report to defendant and to police headquarters which we have hereinbefore set out. It was apparently both sincere and credible. No fact or circumstance appears which would cause a reasonable person to doubt the correctness of his story. It was not only plausible, but he actually pointed out to the officer the man who, he said, attempted to commit the robbery, which attempt, as is well known, is itself a felony.

Robbery—attempt as felony.

The case of Johnson v. Collins, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 375, 89 S. W. 253, is one very similar to this in its facts. A negro girl was shot while standing in the door of the house occupied by the person afterward arrested, who, with another, was in the house at the time. They stated that the girl had accidentally shot herself while handling a pistol; but another person, who saw the girl killed, afterward stated to the officers that the girl did not shoot herself, accidentally or otherwise, but that the shot came from within the house, upon which information the arrest was made without a warrant. Upon trial the arrested person was acquitted, and afterward brought suit against the policeman for false arrest and imprisonment. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and plaintiff prosecuted an appeal to this court, and the judgment was affirmed; the court, in the course of the opinion, saying: "We think the undisputed facts in this record show that the chief of police had probable cause to arrest the appellant on the charge of murder."

It is true that no peremptory instruction was given in that case, nor does it appear that any was asked, and the issue as to reasonable cause for defendant's belief that plaintiff had committed a felony was submitted to the jury under instructions which this court approved, and we have no doubt, from the quotation made from the opinion, that the court would have upheld the verdict, had it been returned under an instruction expressly directing it. Since, however, there was a verdict for the defendant, and he was not, in this court, making the question of the propriety of the peremptory instruction in his favor, that question was not passed upon.

In 11 R. C. L. p. 801, the rule which should apply to the arresting officer in cases like this is thus stated: "But since in such a case the person to be arrested is not specifically indicated by a written warrant, and the officer must necessarily act on his own reasonable judgment, and often in haste to prevent the escape of the criminal, he is protected if he acts in good faith and on reasonable grounds of suspicion, though the person arrested proves not to have been the felon, or no felony was in fact committed."

Suits for false arrest and imprisonment are very similar in their nature to those for malicious prosecution. The chief difference in the two cases consists in the persons proceeded against. In the one case the defendant is the person making the arrest, while in the other he is the one who sets the law in motion and causes the arrest to be made. In the latter class of cases this court has, without exception, held that, where the facts constituting probable cause are in dispute, the issue should be submitted to the jury under an appropriate instruction; but, where the facts alleged as constituting probable cause are undisputed, it becomes a question of law for the court.

Lancaster v. Langston, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 299, 36 S. W. 521; Moore v. Large, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 409, 46 S. W. 508; Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Miller, 114 Ky. 754, 71 S. W. 921; Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc. v. Johnson, 115 Ky. 84, 72 S. W. 754; Lancaster v. McKay, 103 Ky. 616, 45 S. W. 887; Bruce v. Scully, 162 Ky. 296, 172 S. W. 530. In the last case referred to, upon this precise point, the court said: "But where the facts are undisputed, and, as in this case, are admitted by the appellant herself, there can be nothing to submit to a jury upon the question of probable cause; but it becomes a matter exclusively for a decision of the court."

The court then refers to the case of Faris v. Starke, 3 B. Mon. 4, where the same rule is announced, and concludes that, since there was no dispute about the facts, the court properly directed a verdict for the defendant upon the ground that the undisputed facts constituted probable cause. Numerous other cases from this court might be cited in substantiation of the same proposition.

If in cases like this an officer, who must necessarily act with more or less haste in order to prevent a possible felon from making his escape, would have to satisfy himself beyond question that a felony had been committed, or must act at his peril, the great public necessity for a prompt and rigid enforcement of the law would be largely curtailed. In announcing this principle, we would not be understood as indorsing any rule that would license the officer under such circumstances to act upon unsubstantial appearances or unreasonable stories; but when the facts are such as that a reasonably prudent man would have believed plaintiff guilty, and would have acted upon, we think the officer is authorized to make the arrest, although as a matter of fact it might subsequently turn out that no offense had been committed, or, if one, that the person arrested had no connection with it. We have no doubt that public policy is better served under such a rule than it would be to require the officer to act at his peril. We therefore conclude that the court should have directed the jury to find nothing for the alleged false arrest, and consequently it was in error in submitting to the jury the question of whether the defendant had reasonable grounds to believe that plaintiff had committed the felony.

This leaves in the case only the cause of action based upon the unlawful assault and battery committed upon plaintiff by the defendant. Upon this branch of the case it is insisted that the court erred in not giving to the jury an instruction upon the right of the defendant to defend himself against an assault committed upon him by plaintiff. The reason why the court refused to give that instruction to the jury is not stated in the record, but we think his declining to do so was authorized upon the ground that there was no evidence to sustain it. It is true that defendant claims in his testimony that plaintiff used insulting language, and struck at but missed him, when defendant struck the blow about which complaint is made. Neither of these reasons furnishes legitimate grounds for the assault and battery complained of. It is a well-known principle of law that insulting words furnish no defense for an assault and battery, although such insulting words might mitigate the damages. Neither do any facts appear showing that defendant was in any danger of any character of bodily harm from anything which plaintiff did, even if it be admitted (which is strenuously denied) that plaintiff struck at defendant while under arrest. At that time there was a policeman on either side of him, holding both his arms, and no reasonably prudent person could conclude that he was in any danger of bodily harm at the hands of plaintiff, situated as he was at the time. Nor do we find any fact in the record which would in the least justify the assault upon the ground that it was necessary to retain the custody of plaintiff or to prevent his escape, since he was making no effort to escape. Upon another trial, if the evidence is substantially the same as upon this one, the court will submit to the jury only the amount of damages which plaintiff sustained, if any, by reason of any assault and battery committed by the defendant Grau; but if the evidence should justify it, of course the self-defense instruction should be given.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, with directions to grant a new trial, and to proceed in accordance with this opinion.

ANNOTATION.

Advice or order from superior officers as defense to a police officer for making an unlawful arrest.

This note, as its title indicates, is limited to a consideration of the question whether the advice or command of a superior officer constitutes a good defense in an action brought against a police officer to recover damages for an unlawful arrest.

The holding in the reported case (GRAU v. FORGE, ante, 642), that the direct orders of a superior officer will not excuse a policeman who makes a wrongful arrest, is in harmony with the few earlier decisions.

The question annotated was considered directly in Leger v. Warren (1900) 62 Ohio St. 500, 51 L.R.A. 193, 78 Am. St. Rep. 738, 57 N. E. 506, which holds that in an action for false imprisonment it is not a defense for the officer who made the arrest that he acted under orders from a superior officer. In this case the plaintiff was arrested without a warrant on a charge of receiving stolen property, but the failure of those detaining him to procure a warrant within a reasonable time rendered the arrest unlawful from the beginning, and the fact that it was made under orders from a superior officer was held not to relieve from liability.

In Flinn v. Graham (1870) 3 Pittsb. (Pa.) 195, where a person who followed the crowd to a police station after the arrest of one of a group dispersed by the police was himself wrongfully arrested on a charge of having been one of the group, it was held that the arrest was not justified because made by a police officer under the orders of his superiors. The court said: "It will not do to rest upon the position assumed by the learned counsel for defendants that, because these parties occupied subordinate positions and so were subject to be controlled and directed by the others, their superiors, that, therefore and necessarily they were justified in what they did, if done by orders. Such, we instruct you, is not the law. A moment's consideration should satisfy anyone of its impropriety. It would be, in effect, to permit one to do by another what he could not do himself. For violations of law, each is responsible for his individual acts and conduct. To say that a policeman who fails to obey orders would render himself obnoxious to removal, and that he ought to be removed, as is argued by the learned counsel of defendants, proves simply nothing. If the orders given are legal, they should be obeyed, but if not, not."

bility for illegal acts, asserted in the preceding case, is recognized in the reported case (GRAU v. FORGE), holding that an officer is presumed conclusively to know his duty, and to refrain from acting outside of it.

Similarly, in Linnen v. Banfield (1897) 114 Mich. 93, 72 N. W. 1, where a police officer at the direction of the prosecuting attorney made an unlawful arrest, the court said that such direction, while bearing on the good faith of the officer's acts, did not enlarge his authority, and that such good faith would not excuse an unauthorized arrest.

The principle of law which excuses an individual from liability when called upon by an officer to assist in making an arrest, although the officer was proceeding without authority, cannot be extended so as to protect a police officer who, in making a wrongful arrest, acts under the direct orders of a superior officer. GRAU v. FORGE.

In the following cases a recovery was had against police officers guilty of false arrest or imprisonment, who acted under the order of a superior; but this fact does not appear to have been interposed as a defense: Thompson v. Whipple (1891) 54 Ark. 203, 15 S. W. 604; Johnson v. Collins (1905) 28 Ky. L. Rep. 375, 89 S. W. 253; Bath v. Metcalf (1887) 145 Mass. 274, 1 Am. St. Rep. 455, 14 N. E. 133; Danovan v. Jones (1858) 36 N. H. 246.

As affecting damages.

The fact that a wrongful arrest was made by a policeman at the instance of a superior officer has, however, been held admissible on the question of damages.

Thus, the fact that a policeman made an arrest under the direction of the prosecuting attorney may bear on the good faith of the officer's acts, and thus affect the question of damages. Linnen v. Banfield (Mich.) supra.

An instruction by the superior officers of a policeman to arrest women found on the street at an unusual hour and who failed to give a satisfactory account of themselves is admissible in evidence, in mitigation of damages in an action for false imprisonment, brought against a police officer for an unlawful arrest, made while plaintiff was quietly walking along the street after coming at a late hour from a disreputable saloon conducted by her husband. Klein v. Pollard (1907) 149 Mich. 200, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1008, 119 Am. St. Rep. 670, 112 N. W. 717.

But it is held that evidence that police officers who excluded an acceptable guest from a dance, and took her to police headquarters, where she was detained for a time and then allowed to depart after being told that she would not be permitted to attend the dance, acted under the orders of a superior officer, while admissible upon the question of exemplary damages, cannot be considered on the question of actual damages, where no justification was pleaded in the answer. Cullen v. Dickinson (1913) 83 S. D. 27, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 987, 144 N. W. 656, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 115. A. W. R.

1. The authority of Congress may not be exerted to control interstate commerce in the shipment of child-made goods because of the effect of the circulation of such goods in other states where the evil of this class of labor has been recognized by local legislation, and the right to employ child labor has been more rigorously restrained than in the state of production.

— state police power.

2. The constitutional grant of power to Congress over the subject of interstate commerce was to enable it to regulate such commerce, and not to give it authority to control the states in the exercise of the police power over local trade and manufacture.

[See 5 R. C. L. 702-704; 6 R. C. L. 200.]

— Child Labor Law.

3. Congress exceeded its power under the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution in enacting the provisions of the Act of September 1, 1916, which prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of manufactured goods, the product of a factory in which, within thirty days prior to the removal of the goods, children under fourteen have been employed, or children between fourteen and sixteen have been employed more than eight hours in a day, or more than six days in a week, or between 7 in the evening and 6 in the morning.

States — reserved rights — Federal Child Labor Law.

4. Powers over local matters reserved to the states by U. S. Const., 10th Amend., were invaded by the enactment by Congress of the Act of September 1, 1916, which prohibits the transportation in interstate commerce of manufactured goods, the product of a factory in which, within thirty days prior to the removal of the goods, children under fourteen have been employed, or children between fourteen and sixteen have been employed more than eight hours in a day, or more than six days in a week, or between 7 in the evening and 6 in the morning.

APPEAL by the United States Attorney from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Western District of North Carolina, enjoining the enforcement of the Federal Child Labor Law. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John W. Davis, Solicitor General, William L. Frierson, Assistant Attorney General, and Robert Szold, for appellant:

The act is both in terms and in fact a regulation of interstate and foreign commerce.

Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 196, 222, 6 L. ed. 23, 70, 76; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419, 446, 6 L. ed. 678, 688; Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. Messrs. Morgan J. O'Brien, W. M. Hendren, Clement Manly, W. P. Bynum, and Junius Parker, for appellees:

Interstate commerce, in persons or in goods, has come to touch so intimately every person in every state that if Congress may say that those persons whose conduct it does not approve, or their products, may not enter the channels of such commerce, there remains nothing ing upon which it may not, for all practical purposes, impose its will, and the states have lost their police power.

Any valid statute passed by Congress under its power to regulate commerce that restricts or prohibits commerce must be predicated on a real evil or injury involved in, or attendant upon, the commerce itself.

Cas. 1915A, 39.

The view that Congress may, by the form of the statute, thus impose its will on processes of manufacture or other local affairs in the various states for what it conceives to be the good of the people of the state of manufacture, when there is no real evil accomplished by the commerce itself, is unsound.

Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S. 308, 57 L. ed. 523, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 906, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 281, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 905; Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715, 6 Sup. Ct. Ct. Rep. 277, 13 Ann. Cas. 764; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Kansas, 216 U. S. 1, 54 L. ed. 355, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 190; Collector v. Day (Buffington v. Day) 11 Wall. 118, 20 L. ed. 122; Dobbin v. Erie County, 16 Pet. 435, 10 L. ed. 1022.

The statute is not one of ordinary regulation of commerce or its instrumentalities, but is a use of the power to regulate in order to prohibit, and the court should be astute to see that such prohibition invades none of the rights of the state under its reserved power, and none of the rights of a citizen secured to him by the 5th Amendment.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court:

A bill was filed in the United States district court for the western district of North Carolina by a father in his own behalf and as next friend of his two minor sons, one under the age of fourteen years and the other between the ages of fourteen and sixteen years, employees in a cotton mill at Charlotte, North Carolina, to enjoin the enforcement of the act of Congress intended to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor. 39 Stat. at L. 675, chap. 432.

The district court held the act unconstitutional and entered a decree enjoining its enforcement. This appeal brings the case here. The 1st section of the act is in the margin.<sup>1</sup>

Other sections of the act contain provisions for its enforcement and prescribe penalties for its violation.

The attack upon the act rests upon three propositions: First. It is not a regulation of interstate and foreign commerce. Second. It contravenes the 10th Amendment to the Constitution. Third. It conflicts with the 5th Amendment to the Constitution.

<sup>1</sup> That no producer, manufacturer, or dealer shall ship or deliver for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce any article or commodity the product of any mine or quarry, situated in the United States, in which within thirty days prior to the time of the removal of such product therefrom children under the age of

The controlling question for decision is: Is it within the authority of Congress in regulating commerce among the states to prohibit the transportation in interstate commerce of manufactured goods, the product of a factory in which, within thirty days prior to their removal therefrom, children under the age of fourteen have been employed or permitted to work, or children between the ages of fourteen and sixteen years have been employed or permitted to work more than eight hours in any day, or more than six days in any week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock P. M. or before the hour of 6 o'clock A. M.?

The power essential to the passage of this act, the government contends, is found in the commerce clause of the Constitution, which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the states.

In Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23, Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for this court, and defining the extent and nature of the commerce power, said: "It is the power to regulate,—that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed." In other words, the power is one to control the means by which commerce is carried on, which is directly the contrary of the assumed right to forbid commerce from moving and thus destroy it as to particular commodities. But it is insisted that adjudged cases in this court establish the doctrine that the power to regulate given to Congress incidentally includes the authority to prohibit the movement of ordinary commodities, and therefore that the subject is not open for discussion. The cases demonstrate the contrary. They rest upon the character of the particular subjects dealt with and the fact that the scope of governmental authority, state or national, possessed over them, is such that the authority to prohibit is, as to them, but the exertion of the power to regulate.

The first of these cases is Champion v. Ames, 188 U. S. 321, 47 L. ed. 492, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 321, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 561, the so-called Lottery Case, in which it was held that Congress might pass a law having the effect to keep the channels of commerce free from use in the transportation of tickets used in the promotion of lottery schemes. In Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States, 220 U. S. 45, 55 L. ed. 364, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 364, this court sustained the power of Congress to pass the Pure Food and Drug Act, which prohibited the introduction into the states by means of interstate commerce of impure foods and drugs. In Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S. 308, 57 L. ed. 523, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 906, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 281, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 905, this court sustained the constitutionality of the so-called "White Slave Traffic Act," whereby transportation of a woman in interstate commerce for the purpose of prostitution was forbidden. In that case we said, having reference to the authority of Congress, under the regulatory power, to protect the channels of interstate commerce: "If the facility of interstate transportation can be taken away from the demoralization of lotteries, the debasement of obscene literature, the contagion of diseased cattle or persons, the impurity of food and drugs, the like facility can be taken away from the systematic enticement to and the enslavement in prostitution and debauchery of women, and, more insistently, of girls."

sixteen years have been employed or permitted to work, or any article or commodity the product of any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment, situated in the United States, in which within thirty days prior to the removal of such product therefrom children under the age of fourteen years have been employed or permitted to work, or children between the ages of fourteen years and sixteen years have been employed or permitted to work more than eight hours in any day, or more than six days in any week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock postmeridian, or before the hour of 6 o'clock antemeridian.

"The power conferred is to regulate, and the very terms of the grant would seem to repel the contention that only prohibition of movement in interstate commerce was embraced. And the cogency of this is manifest since, if the doctrine were applied to those manifold and important subjects of interstate commerce as to which Congress from the beginning has regulated, not prohibited, the existence of government under the Constitution would be no longer possible."

And concluding the discussion which sustained the authority of the government to prohibit the transportation of liquor in interstate commerce, the court said:

"The exceptional nature of the subject here regulated is the basis upon which the exceptional power exerted must rest, and affords no ground for any fear that such power may be constitutionally extended to things which it may not, consistently with the guaranties of the Constitution, embrace."

In each of these instances the use of interstate transportation was necessary to the accomplishment of harmful results. In other words, although the power over interstate transportation was to regulate, that could only be accomplished by prohibiting the use of the facilities of interstate commerce to effect the evil intended.

This element is wanting in the present case. The thing intended to be accomplished by this statute is the denial of the facilities of interstate commerce to those manufacturers in the states who employ children within the prohibited ages. The act in its effect does not regulate transportation among the states, but aims to standardize the ages at which children may be employed in mining and manufacturing within the states. The goods shipped are of themselves harmless. The act permits them to be freely shipped after thirty days from the time of their removal from the factory. When offered for shipment, and before transportation begins, the labor of their production is over, and the mere fact that they were intended for interstate commerce transportation does not make their production subject to Federal control under the commerce power.

Commerce "consists of intercourse and traffic . . . and includes the transportation of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities." The making of goods and the mining of coal are not commerce, nor does the fact that these things are to be afterwards shipped or used in interstate commerce make their production a part thereof. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Yurkonis, 238 U. S. 439, 59 L. ed. 1397, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 902.

Over interstate transportation, or its incidents, the regulatory power of Congress is ample, but the production of articles intended for interstate commerce is a matter of local regulation. "When the commerce begins is determined not by the character of the commodity, nor by the intention of the owner to transfer it to another state for sale, nor by his preparation of it for transportation, but by its actual delivery to a common carrier for transportation, or the actual commencement of its transfer to another state." Mr. Justice Jackson in Re Greene, 52 Fed. 113. This principle has been recognized often in this court. Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475; Bacon v. Illinois, 227 U. S. 504, 57 L. ed. 615, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 299, and cases cited. If it were otherwise, all manufactures intended for interstate shipment would be brought under Federal control to the practical exclusion of the authority of the states,—a result certainly not contemplated by the framers of the Constitution when they vested in Congress the authority to regulate commerce among the states. Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 21, 32 L. ed. 346, 350, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6.

It is further contended that the authority of Congress may be exerted to control interstate commerce in the shipment of child-made goods because of the effect of the circulation of such goods in other states and the right to thus employ child labor has been more rigorously restrained than in the state of production. In other words, that the unfair competition thus engendered may be controlled by closing the channels of interstate commerce to manufacturers in those states where the local laws do not meet what Congress deems to be the more just standard of other states.

There is no power vested in Congress to require the states to exercise their police power so as to prevent possible unfair competition. Many causes may co-operate to give one state, by reason of local laws or conditions, an economic advantage over others. The commerce clause was not intended to give to Congress a general authority to equalize such conditions. In some of the states laws have been passed fixing minimum wages for women; in others the local law regulates the hours of labor of women in various employments. Business done in such states may be at an economic disadvantage when compared with states which have no such regulations; surely, this fact does not give Congress the power to deny transportation in interstate commerce to those who carry on business where the hours of labor and the rate of compensation for women have not been fixed by a standard in use in other states and approved by Congress.

The grant of power to Congress over the subject of interstate commerce was to enable it to regulate such commerce, and not to give it authority to control the states in their exercise of the police power over local trade and manufacture.

The grant of authority over a purely Federal matter was not intended to destroy the local power always existing and carefully reserved to the states in the 10th Amendment to the Constitution.

Police regulations relating to the internal trade and affairs of the states have been uniformly recognized as within such control. "This," said this court in United States v. Dewitt, 9 Wall. 1, 45, 19 L. ed. 593, 594, "has been so frequently declared by this court, results so obviously from the terms of the Constitution, and has been so fully explained and supported on former occasions, that we think it unnecessary to enter again upon the discussion." See Keller v. United States, 213 U. S. 138, 144-146, 53 L. ed. 737-740, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 470, 16 Ann. Cas. 1066; Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. p. 11.

In the judgment which established the broad power of Congress over interstate commerce, Chief Justice Marshall said (9 Wheat. 203, 6 L. ed. 72): "They [inspection laws] act upon the subject before it becomes an article of foreign commerce, or of commerce among the states, and prepared it for that purpose. They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a state, not surrendered to the general government,—all of which can be most advantageously exercised by the states themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a state, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, etc., are component parts of this mass."

Commerce—

And in Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518, 629, the same great judge said:

"That the framers of the Constitution did not intend to restrain the states in the regulation of their civil institutions, adopted for internal government, and that the instrument they have given us is not to be so construed, may be admitted."

That there should be limitations upon the right to employ children in mines and factories in the interest of their own and the public welfare, all will admit. That such employment is generally deemed to require regulation is shown by the fact that the brief of counsel states that every state in the Union has a law upon the subject, limiting the right to thus employ children. In North Carolina, the state wherein is located the factory in which the employment was had in the present case, no child under twelve years of age is permitted to work.

It may be desirable that such laws be uniform, but our Federal government is one of enumerated powers; "this principle," declared Chief Justice Marshall in M'Culloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. ed. 579, "is universally admitted."

A statute must be judged by its natural and reasonable effect. Collins v. New Hampshire, 171 U. S. 30, 33, 34, 43 L. ed. 60-62, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 768. The control by Congress over interstate commerce cannot authorize the exercise of authority not intrusted to it by the Constitution. Pipe Line Cases (United States v. Ohio Oil Co.) 234 U. S. 548, 560, 58 L. ed. 1459, 1470, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 956. The maintenance of the authority of the states over matters purely local is as essential to the preservation of our institutions as is the conservation of the supremacy of the Federal power in all matters intrusted to the nation by the Federal Constitution.

In interpreting the Constitution it must never be forgotten that the nation is made up of states, to which are intrusted the powers of local government. And to them and to the people the powers not expressly delegated to the national government are reserved. Lane County v. Oregon, 7 Wall. 71, 76, 19 L. ed. 101, 104. The power of the states to regulate their purely internal affairs by such laws as seem wise to the local authority is inherent, and has never been surrendered to the general government. New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. 102, 139, 9 L. ed. 648, 662; Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 63, 21 L. ed. 394, 404; Kidd v. Pearson, supra. To sustain this statute would not be, in our judgment, a recognition of the lawful exertion of congressional authority over interstate commerce, but would sanction an invasion by the Federal power of the control of a matter purely local in its character, and over which no authority has been delegated to Congress in conferring the power to regulate commerce among the states.

We have neither authority nor disposition to question the motives of Congress in enacting this legislation. The purposes intended must be attained consistently with constitutional limitations, and not by an invasion of the powers of the states. This court has no more important function than that which devolves upon it the obligation to preserve inviolate the constitutional limitations upon the exercise of authority, Federal and state, to the end that each may continue to discharge, harmoniously with the other, the duties intrusted to it by the Constitution.

In our view the necessary effect of this act is, by means of a prohibition against the movement in interstate commerce of ordinary commercial commodities, to regulate the hours of labor of children in factories and mines within the states,—a purely state authority. Thus the act in a twofold sense is repugnant to the Constitution. It not only transcends the authority delegated to Congress over commerce, but also exerts a power as to a purely local matter to which the Federal authority does not extend. The far-reaching result of upholding the act cannot be more plainly indicated than by pointing out that if Congress can thus regulate matters intrusted to local authority by prohibition of the movement of commodities in interstate commerce, all freedom of commerce will be at an end, and the power of the states over local matters may be eliminated, and thus our system of government be practically destroyed.

For these reasons we hold that this law exceeds the constitutional authority of Congress. It follows that the decree of the District Court must be affirmed.

Mr. Justice Holmes, dissenting:

The single question in this case is whether Congress has power to prohibit the shipment in interstate or foreign commerce of any product of a cotton mill situated in the United States, in which, within thirty days before the removal of the product, children under fourteen have been employed, or children between fourteen and sixteen have been employed more than eight hours in a day, or more than six days in any week, or between 7 in the evening and 6 in the morning. The objection urged against the power is that the states have exclusive control over their methods of production and that Congress cannot meddle with them; and taking the proposition in the sense of direct intermeddling I agree to it and suppose that no one denies it. But if an act is within the powers specifically conferred upon Congress, it seems to me that it is not made any less constitutional because of the indirect effects that it may have, however obvious it may be that it will have those effects; and that we are not at liberty upon such grounds to hold it void.

The first step in my argument is to make plain what no one is likely to dispute,—that the statute in question is within the power expressly given to Congress if considered only as to its immediate effects, and that if invalid it is so only upon some collateral ground. The statute confines itself to prohibiting the carriage of certain goods in interstate or foreign commerce. Congress is given power to regulate such commerce in unqualified terms. It would not be argued to-day that the power to regulate does not include the power to prohibit. Regulation means the prohibition of something, and when interstate commerce is the matter to be regulated I cannot doubt that the regulations may prohibit any part of such commerce that Congress sees fit to forbid. At all events it is established by the Lottery Case and others that have followed it that a law is not beyond the regulative power of Congress merely because it prohibits certain transportation out and out. Champion v. Ames, 188 U. S. 321, 355, 359, et seq., 47 L. ed. 492, 500, 502, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 321, 13 Am. Crim. Rep. 561. So I repeat that this statute in its immediate operation is clearly within the Congress's constitutional power.

The question, then, is narrowed to whether the exercise of its otherwise constitutional power by Congress can be pronounced unconstitutional because of its possible reaction upon the conduct of the states in a matter upon which I have admitted that they are free from direct control. I should have thought that that matter had been disposed of so fully as to leave no room for doubt. I should have thought that the most conspicuous decisions of this court had made it clear that the power to regulate commerce and other constitutional powers could not be cut down or qualified by the fact that it might interfere with the carrying out of the domestic policy of any state.

tion as the manufacture of cotton cloth. Congress levied a tax upon the compound when colored so as to resemble butter that was so great as obviously to prohibit the manufacture and sale. In a very elaborate discussion the present Chief Justice excluded any inquiry into the purpose of an act which, apart from that purpose, was within the power of Congress. McCray v. United States, 195 U. S. 27, 49 L. ed. 78, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 769, 1 Ann. Cas. 561. As to foreign commerce, see Weber v. Freed, 239 U. S. 325, 329, 60 L. ed. 308, 310, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 131, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 317; Brolan v. United States, 236 U. S. 216, 217, 59 L. ed. 544, 547, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 285; Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470, 48 L. ed. 525, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 349. Fifty years ago a tax on state banks, the obvious purpose and actual effect of which was to drive them, or at least their circulation, out of existence, was sustained, although the result was one that Congress had no constitutional power to require. The court made short work of the argument as to the purpose of the act. "The judicial cannot prescribe to the legislative departments of the government limitations upon the exercise of its acknowledged powers." Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall. 533, 19 L. ed. 482. So it well might have been argued that the corporation tax was intended, under the guise of a revenue measure, to secure a control not otherwise belonging to Congress, but the tax was sustained, and the objection, so far as noticed, was disposed of by citing McCray v. United States; Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. 220 U. S. 107, 55 L. ed. 389, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 342, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1312. And to come to cases upon interstate commerce, notwithstanding United States v. E. C. Knight Co. 156 U. S. 1, 39 L. ed. 325, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 249, the Sherman Act has been made an instrument for the breaking up of combinations in restraint of trade and monopolies, using the power to regulate commerce as a foothold, but not proceeding because that commerce was the end actually in mind. The objection that the control of the states over production was interfered with was urged again and again, but always in vain. Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1, 68, 69, 55 L. ed. 619, 648, 649, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 834, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 502, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 734; United States v. American Tobacco Co. 221 U. S. 106, 184, 55 L. ed. 663, 695, 31 Sup. Ct. The Pure Food and Drug Act was sustained in Hipolite Egg Co. v. United States, 220 U. S. 45, 55 L. ed. 364, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 364, with the intimation that "no trade can be carried on between the states to which it [the power of Congress to regulate commerce] does not extend," (p. 57) applies not merely to articles that the changing opinions of the time condemn as intrinsically harmful, but to others innocent in themselves, simply on the ground that the order for them was induced by a preliminary fraud. Weeks v. United States, 245 U. S. 618, 62 L. ed. 513, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 219. It does not matter whether the supposed evil precedes or follows the transportation. It is enough that, in the opinion of Congress, the transportation encourages the evil. I may add that in the cases on the so-called White Slave Act it was established that the means adopted by Congress as convenient to the exercise of its power might have the character of police regulations. Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S. 308, 323, 57 L. ed. 523, 527, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 906, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 281, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 905; Caminetti v. United States, 242 U. S. 470, 492, 61 L. ed. 442, 455, L.R.A. 1917F, 502, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 1168. In Clark

Distilling Co. v. Western Maryland R. Co. 242 U. S. 311, 328, 61 L. ed. 326, 339, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 180, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 845, Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 108, 34 L. ed. 128, 132, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 36, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 681, is quoted with seeming approval to the effect that "a subject-matter which has been confided exclusively to Congress by the Constitution is not within the jurisdiction of the police power of the state unless placed there by congressional action." I see no reason for that proposition not applying here.

The notion that prohibition is any less prohibition when applied to things now thought evil I do not understand. But if there is any matter upon which civilized countries have agreed,—far more unanimously than they have with regard to intoxicants and some other matters over which this country is now emotionally aroused,—it is the evil of premature and excessive child labor. I should have thought that if we were to introduce our own moral conceptions where, in my opinion, they do not belong, this was pre-eminently a case for upholding the exercise of all its powers by the United States.

But I had thought that the propriety of the exercise of a power admitted to exist in some cases was for the consideration of Congress alone, and that this court always had disavowed the right to intrude its judgment upon questions of policy or morals. It is not for this court to pronounce when prohibition is necessary to regulation, if it ever may be necessary,—to say that it is permissible as against strong drink, but not as against the product of ruined lives.

The act does not meddle with anything belonging to the states. They may regulate their internal affairs and their domestic commerce as they like. But when they seek to send their products across the state line they are no longer within their rights. If there were no Constitution and no Congress their power to cross the line would depend upon their neighbors. Under the Constitution such commerce belongs not to the states, but to Congress, to regulate. It may carry out its views of public policy whatever indirect effect they may have upon the activities of the states. Instead of being encountered by a prohibitive tariff at her boundaries, the state encounters the public policy of the United States which it is for Congress to express. The public policy of the United States is shaped with a view to the benefit of the nation as a whole. If, as has been the case within the memory of men still living, a state should take a different view of the propriety of sustaining a lottery from that which generally prevails, I cannot believe that the fact would require a different decision from that reached in Champion v. Ames. Yet in that case it would be said with quite as much force as in this that Congress was attempting to intermeddle with the state's domestic affairs. The national welfare as understood by Congress may require a different attitude within its sphere from that of some self-seeking state. It seems to me entirely constitutional for Congress to enforce its understanding by all the means at its command.

ANNOTATION.

Power of Congress to exclude commodities from transportation in interstate commerce because of the conditions under which they are produced.

The power conferred upon Congress by the Federal Constitution to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the states does not, according to the majority view in the reported case (HAMMER v. DAGENHART, ante, 649), authorize the prohibition of the transportation of goods that are manufactured under circumstances which, while not affecting the goods themselves, may be against the public good.

In United States ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Delaware & H. Co. (1909) 213 U. S. 366, 53 L. ed. 836, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 527, it was held that Congress could properly enact, as a regulation of commerce, so much of the Hepburn Act of June 29, 1906, as forbids a railway carrier from transporting articles or commodities in interstate commerce, when such article or commodity has been manufactured, mined, or produced by the carrier, or under its authority, and at the time of transportation such carrier has not in good faith, before the act of transportation, disassociated itself therefrom, or when the carrier owns the article or commodity to be transported in whole or in part, or when the carrier at the time of transportation has an interest therein, direct or indirect, in a legal or equitable sense, although by existing state legislation such carrier may have a lawful right of ownership of or association with the articles or commodities upon which these provisions operate.

The statute involved in The Abby Dodge (1912) 228 U. S. 166, 56 L. ed. 390, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 310, made it unlawful to land, deliver, cure, or offer for sale at any port or place in the United States, any sponges taken by means of diving or diving apparatus from the waters of the Gulf of Mexico or the Straits of Florida, but contained a proviso that the sponges taken or gathered by such process between October 1st and May 1st of each year, in a greater depth of water than 50 feet, should not be subject to the provisions of the act, and a further proviso that no sponges taken from said waters should be landed, delivered, cured, or offered for sale at any port or place in the United States, of a smaller size than 4 inches in diameter. One Constitutional objection urged to this statute was that it dealt with a matter exclusively within the authority of the states. With reference to this argument, the court assumes for the purpose of the argument that the statute, when rightly construed, applied to sponges taken or gathered from land under water within the territorial limits of a state, and, upon this assumption, states that the "repugnancy of the act to the Constitution would plainly be established by the decisions of this court." Having reached this conclusion, the court construes the statute as not applicable to sponges gathered within the territorial limits of a state, under the well-known rule that where two interpretations of a statute are in reason admissible, one of which creates a repugnancy to the Constitution and the other avoids such repugnancy, the one which makes the statute harmonize with the Constitution must be adopted. The court then considers the validity of the statute as confined to sponges taken outside of the state territorial limits, and says that even though the vessel bringing in the sponges be conceded to have been solely engaged in taking or gathering sponges in the waters which, by the law of nations, would be regarded as the common property of all, and transporting them to the United States, "the vessel was engaged in foreign commerce, and was, therefore, amenable to the regulating power of Congress over that subject. This being not open to discussion, the want of merit of the contention is shown, since the practices from the beginning, sanctioned by the decisions of this court, establish that Congress, by an exertion of its power to regulate foreign commerce, has the authority to forbid merchandise carried in such commerce from entering the United States.

. . . So complete is the authority of Congress over the subject that no one can be said to have a vested right to carry on foreign commerce with the United States."

In Buttfield v. Stranahan (1903) 192 U. S. 470, 48 L. ed. 525, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 349, it is held that no individual has such a vested right to trade with foreign nations as precludes Congress, in the exercise of its plenary power to regulate foreign commerce, from prohibiting by the Tea Inspection Act of March 2, 1897 (29 Stat. at L. 604, chap.

358, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 8786, 3 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 716), on considerations of public policy, the importation of teas inferior to the government standard, on the theory that the importer is thereby deprived of his property without due process of law.

Whitehead v. Whitehead, 85 Va. 870, 9 S. E. 10; Arnold v. Knapp, 75 W. Va. 814, 84 S. E. 895.

Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal grounds of complaint against the decree under review on this appeal are the disallow-ance of appellant's claim of a lien on personal property, consisting of hearses, an ambulance wagon, a lot of undertakers' supplies, a safe and a roll top desk, by virtue of a deed of trust executed by the Valley Undertaking Company, a corporation, to secure a note for the sum of $1,500, and allowance of a claim of a lien on one of the hearses, described as being an eight-column mosque top silver-gray funeral car, to the Riddle Coach & Hearse Company, by virtue of a deed of trust executed to secure purchase money of the hearse. The assets of the company consisted of personal property only, and, at the date of the filing of the bill by an execution creditor, there were execution liens on the property, amounting to about $1,800. The debts due general creditors claiming no liens amounted to something more than $4,000. Disallowing the appellant's claim of a lien, the court placed him among the general creditors, by its final decree.

His deed of trust was assailed on two grounds: (1) Lack of a sufficient certificate of acknowledgment to make it a recordable instrument; and (2) partial invalidity by reason of the statute against preferences. The alleged defect in the certificate of acknowledgment was the omission from the affidavit, which constitutes a part of it, of the clause, "and that said writing was signed and sealed by him in behalf of said corporation." This clause is part of the form prescribed by § 5 of chapter 73 of the Code (§ 3808). At the date of the execution of the deed of trust, the corporation was hopelessly insolvent, and the appellant was its president. The bill did not attack it for invalidity under the statute against preferences, but did charge unrecordability thereof on account of the defect in the acknowledgment, and invalidity because it included a stock of goods used in trade. On the 17th day of May, 1915, more than one year after its date and more than four months after it was recorded, the Riddle Coach & Hearse Company filed an answer, attacking it as being preferential and partially void for that reason. Though there was no process against the appellant, on that answer, he filed an answer with the commissioner, in June, 1915, in which he responded to the charge therein made, neither admitting nor denying the insolvency of the Valley Undertaking Company, but claiming the benefit of an exception in the statute against preferences, on the ground that the deed of trust was executed to secure a note for money he had loaned to the company, at the date thereof, and it had afterwards used in its business. He also relied upon the Statute of Limitation.

Though literal compliance with the form of acknowledgment prescribed for corporations is not essential, there must be a substantial compliance with it. The statute itself says a certificate may be in form or effect as therein prescribed. The clause omitted is obviously a substantial one, and lack thereof is not supplied by any equivalent words. The executing officer is required to swear "that said writing was signed and sealed by him in behalf of said corporation." It is not enough that he has authority generally to execute deeds and other instruments for and on behalf of the corporation. He must swear that he had authority to execute the particular instrument he acknowledges. He is not the corporation, nor has he power to do all the things it might do. Whether the corporation itself authorized the execution of the particular instrument is a vital matter, and he is required to swear that it did. Though the deed says he executed it by authority of the corporation duly given, that statement is not in the affidavit, nor was it made on oath as the statute requires it to be.

The omission of this clause manifestly vitiates the certificate. Abney v. Ohio Lumber & Min. Co. 45 W. Va. 446, 32 S. E. 256; Isham v. Bennington Iron Co. 19 Vt. 230; Warvelle, Vend. & P. 519; Devlin, Deeds, § 508.

A sufficient certificate of acknowledgment is essential to the recordation of a deed or deed of trust, and, without it, the copying of the instrument on the record book does not constitute constructive notice. As to creditors and purchasers without notice, it is void.

Abney v. Ohio Lumber & Min. Co. supra; Cox v. Wayt, 26 W. Va. 807; Ihrig v. Ihrig, 78 W. Va. 360, 88 S. E. 1010. If it has no other infirmity, it is good as between the parties, and it is void as to creditors and purchasers without notice only because the statute makes it so. The creditors so protected by the statute are lien creditors only. Moore v. Tearney, 62 W. Va. 72, 57 S. E. 263.

Appellant's most active antagonist, the Riddle Coach & Hearse Company, having two deeds of trust older than his, both of which were attacked for alleged defects in the certificates of acknowledgment and for lack of the corporate seal, makes no complaint on account of the disallowance of the small amount due under one of them, but stoutly defends its claim of right under the other. Though it may not have been recordable, for want of a good certificate, and may not have constituted a technical deed of trust, it certainly created an equitable or chattel mortgage valid and binding between the parties to it and enforceable in equity. Atkinson v. Miller, 34 W. Va. 115, 9 L.R.A. 544, question. Arnold v. Knapp, 75 W. Va. 804, 814, 84 S. E. 895; Whitehead v. Whitehead, 85 Va. 870, 9 S. E. 10. There is at least a presumption of knowledge, for rebuttal of which he introduced no evidence at all. The authorities cited say a president of a corporation will not be heard to say he was not informed as to its financial condition. Whether the Riddle Coach & Hearse Company deed of trust was recordable or not, therefore the trial court properly gave the claims under it and the execution liens preference over that of the appellant.

But it was wrong to place him among the general creditors, for his deed of trust, though not legally recorded, created a lien in his favor, good against everybody except subsequent purchasers for value and without notice, lien creditors and such unsecured creditors as successfully assailed it, in due time, for violation of the statute against preferences, § 2 of chapter 74 of the Code (§ 3830). Nobody assailed it on the ground within the period of limitation, one year from its date or four months after it was recorded, it having been recorded within eight months from its date. The presumption of fraud in the transaction is repelled by proof of bona fide indebtedness for which the note and deed of trust were given.

There was no error in the allowance to the Riddle Coach & Hearse Company of rent for the use of the hearse on which it held its lien, by the receiver, while he conducted the business of the corporation. Such use obviously impaired the Riddle Company's security, and it was not equitably bound to make a contribution to the assets of the insolvent corporation, for the benefit of its other creditors, by sufferance of such impairment. Only a small portion of the purchase money had been paid, and it was apparent that the hearse was insufficient security for the balance. In such cases, the rents and profits accruing from the use of property on which a debt is secured may be sequestrated for the benefit of the lien creditor. Grantham v. Lucas, 15 W. Va. 425, 432; Clarke v. Curtis, 1 Gratt. 289; Ross v. Colville, 3 Call. (Va.) 382.

So much of the decree as allows to Weimar and Reynolds a lien for a meritorious claim amounting to $120 will have to be reversed, for they have no shadow of a lien for the claim. It is for storage of the vehicles of the corporation, while used by it in its business. Necessarily the company had possession and control of them when used in the conduct of funerals, wherefore they were frequently out of the possession of the claimants of the lien. In such cases the common law gave no lien. Jackson v. Cummins, 5 Mees. & W. 342, 8 L. J. Exch. N. S. 265, 3 Jur. 436, 2 Eng. Rul. Cas. 548; Grinnell v. Cook, 3 Hill, 491, 38 Am. Dec. 663; McFarland v. Wheeler, 26 Wend. 474. A garage keeper has no lien on an automobile for storage, if the owner is permitted periodically to take it out and use it. Smith v. O'Brien, 46 Misc. 325, 94 N. Y. Supp. 673. The statute giving a livery-stable keeper a lien extends only to live stock (Code, chap. 100, § 15 [§ 4392]), and there is no statute creating a lien in cases of this class. The rule requiring continuous and unbroken possession in the establishment of a common-law lien, such as that of a warehouseman, is very strict. Without it, such a lien is impossible, and, where there is one, it is lost the moment the possession is broken.

Lambert v. Nicklass, 45 W. Va. 527, 44 L.R.A.561, 72 Am. St. Rep. 828, 31 S. E. 951. Nor is the existence of a landlord's lien for rent possible under the circumstances. The vehicles were merely stored, in a qualified sense, in buildings owned, possessed, and controlled by the claimants. They were not leased nor occupied by the undertaking company.

As the subject-matter of the decree was personal property, complete ascertainment and adjustment of the liens thereon were not conditions precedent to right and power in the court properly to decree a sale thereof. It is essential in proceedings for the sale of real estate, but none of our decisions require it in proceedings against personal property, and there is a manifest distinction in the characters of the two classes of property, which forbids its application in the latter case. Preservation and care of personal property always involve expense and risk of loss, even though it is often not perishable in the legal sense of the term. Besides, its legal inferiority to real estate is clearly indicated by many provisions of the law, both adjective and substantive. Their obviousness to legal minds excuses enumeration thereof.

In so far as the decree adjudicates a storage lien in favor of Weimar and Reynolds for $120, and denies to the appellant Phares a lien for the debt secured by his deed of trust, next in order after the liens decreed in favor of the execution creditors, and accords to the general creditors pro rata participation with him, the final decree complained of will be reversed, and the appellant's third exception to the commissioner's report will be sustained. His second exception thereto will be sustained only in so far as the report denies him preference over the general or unsecured creditors of the Valley Undertaking Company. The decrees of May 17 and November 9, 1915, will be affirmed, and that of February 23, 1916, will be modified, by striking out the lien for $120 therein accorded to Weimar and Reynolds, and by adjudicating a lien in favor of the appellant for $1,630.50, with interest from October 12, 1915, next after those decreed in favor of the Clarksburg Casket Company, and, as so modified, it will be affirmed, and the cause remanded. Costs in this court will be decreed against the appellant and in favor of the appellees, Clarksburg Casket Company, Gallion Metallic Vault Company, and Weimar and Reynolds.

ANNOTATION.

Periodical use of vehicle or horse by owner as defeating lien for storage, repairs, or board.

Motor vehicles.

Other decisions concur with the reported case (CLARKSBURG CASKET CO. v. VALLEY UNDERTAKING CO. ante, 660), in holding the lien of a stable or garage keeper on motor vehicles to be defeated, where the owner is allowed the periodical use of the vehicles, the reasoning of the cases being that in order to successfully assert a right to such a lien there must be a continuous and unbroken possession of the property by the one lien claimant.

In Hatton v. Car Maintenance Co.

[1915] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 621, 84 L. J. Ch. N. S. 847, 110 L. T. N. S. 765, 30 Times L. R. 275, 58 Sol. Jo. 361, where the owner of an automobile entered into an agreement for a certain consideration with a company, by which the latter undertook to maintain the car, furnish supplies for its operation, and provide a driver, who was to drive in accordance with the owner's directions, and the owner had the right to take the machine when and as she liked, it was held that any lien which the company had on the car was lost by virtue of the agreement under which the owner was at liberty to, and did, take it away as she pleased.

And in Smith v. O'Brien (1905) 46 Misc. 325, 94 N. Y. Supp. 673, affirmed in (1905) 108 App. Div. 596, 92 N. Y. Supp. 1146, where the owner of an automobile, kept at the plaintiff's garage, removed it and enjoyed its use from time to time at his pleasure, the garage keeper was held to have no lien under a statute providing that a person who makes, alters, repairs, or in any way enhances the value of an article of personal property at the request or with the consent of the owner, has a lien on such article while lawfully in possession thereof for his reasonable charges for the work done and materials furnished, and may retain possession thereof until such charges are paid, the court holding that such statute was declaratory of the common law, and that a lien at common law was dependent on possession. And the garage keeper in this case was held not entitled to a lien for storage as a warehouseman, the court holding that the automobile was not stored within the meaning of the Lien Law, as it was continuously, or occasionally, upon the road at the owner's pleasure, and that the right so to use it destroyed the possession of the garage keeper. It was further held in the Smith Case that the garage keeper was not within the language of a statute giving a lien to "a person keeping a livery stable, or boarding stable for animals, or pasturing or boarding one or more animals, or who in connection therewith keeps or stores any wagon, truck," etc., which was passed to protect the lien of livery-stable keepers so that it would not be lost by interruption of possession.

And in Grand Garage v. Pacific Bank (1918) 170 N. Y. Supp. 2, it was held that, although a garage keeper's lien has been extended by statute, it still depends on possession, and that the lien in the case at bar was lost where the owner (a sales company) took the car without objection and allowed another to take it to sell, and the latter placed it in another garage, where it remained until the insolvency of the owner.

And in Vaught v. Knue (1917) — Ind. App. —, 115 N. E. 108, a statute providing that every person engaged in the storing of, or furnishing supplies for, or repairing automobiles, or maintaining automobile garages should have a lien upon such automobiles for storage charges, supplies, or repairs, was held declaratory of the common law and the court was apparently of the opinion that a garage keeper could assert no lien against an automobile for repairs, supplies, etc., where there was a running account kept with the conditional vendee of the machine, and he was allowed to use it at all times without objection. The court, however, was not called upon to decide this question, as the conditional vendor, upon default by his vendee, had taken possession of the machine.

In Olson v. Orr (1915) 94 Kan. 38, 145 Pac. 900, where a truck, after an engine had been installed in it, was tested a number of times, apparently by the owner, but delivery was refused without full payment for the work, the repairman was held not to have lost his statutory lien, although he had not complied with the statute providing for a continuance of the lien after delivery, by filing a statement with the register of deeds.

In Winton Co. v. Meister (1918) — Md. —, 105 Atl. 301, the common-law lien of a repairman for repairs on an automobile was held not lost by allowing the temporary removal of the machine from the shop to take measurements for upholstering, where it was returned to the repairman's possession in an hour or so, and no rights of innocent parties had intervened.

Horses.

A conflict exists among the decisions as to the right of a stable keeper to assert a lien on horses, wagons, etc., where the owner is periodically allowed to use them. Some courts have adopted the view that the stable keeper under such circumstances does not have the continuous possession necessary to entitle him to a lien. Perkins v. Boardman (1860) 14 Gray (Mass.) 481; Vinal v. Spofford (1885) 139 Mass. 126, 29 N. E. 288; Papineau v. Wentworth (1884) 136 Mass. 543;

Cardinal v. Edwards (1869) 5 Nev. 37; Estey v. Cooke (1877) 12 Nev. 276; Grinnell v. Cook (1842) 3 Hill (N. Y.) 485, 38 Am. Dec. 663.

In Grinnell v. Cook (N. Y.) supra, where a common-law lien on horses was claimed by a stable keeper, it was held that if a lien existed it continued only so long as the stable keeper retained uninterrupted possession of the horses, and that there was no such possession where the owner was at liberty to take and use the horses at pleasure, and that the claimant was accordingly not entitled to a lien on the animals, which the owner had taken away according to his daily custom.

And in Cardinal v. Edwards (1869) 5 Nev. 37, where a lien was claimed by a stable keeper on horses, under a statute providing that any livery-stable keeper boarding horses should have a lien upon, and retain possession of, the animals until reasonable charges were paid, it was held that the stable keeper was not entitled to a lien where he had always allowed the horses to be taken away every day, and interposed no objection when they were last taken out, and made no claim to a lien until he learned that the person keeping them at the stable had absconded.

And, following this case, in Esty v. Cooke (1877) 12 Nev. 276, it was held that a stable keeper's lien under Comp. Laws §§ 144-146, the provisions of which do not appear, was lost where the owner of horses, harnesses, etc., had control of the property, and took it out and returned it at will.

And in Vinal v. Spofford (1885) 139 Mass. 126, 29 N. E. 288, where a stable keeper allowed the owner of a horse which was kept at his stable to use it in his business, he was held to have lost his lien on the horse by reason of a bona fide sale of the property by the owner while in his possession, and it was held that the lien was not revived by a seizure of the horse by the stable keeper. The lien claimed in this case was a statutory one, but the terms of the act do not appear.

The court in that case relied upon Papineau v. Wentworth (1884) 136 Mass. 543, in which it was held competent for the court to find a waiver of a stable keeper's lien under Pub. Stat. 192, § 32, the provisions of which do not appear, where there was testimony that the owner kept his horse at the defendant's stable, and used it in his business as often as he wished; that on a certain date, on which there was an unpaid amount due for board, the owner took the horse as usual, but failed to return it; that the defendant subsequently found it in the owner's possession, and without the latter's objection took it; that the defendant then agreed that one of his employees should remain with the owner at the place where the horse was found, and on the next day drive the owner to the place where he lived; that the horse was left at another stable where the owner had kept it; that the next morning the owner told the plaintiff's employee he had concluded not to take the horse to the plaintiff, and he and the employee returned to the plaintiff's place of residence without the horse; that defendant subsequently concealed the horse, but that the plaintiff found it and took possession of it by force.

In Perkins v. Boardman (Mass.) supra, it was held that a mortgagee of a horse acquired title subject to an existing lien of a stable keeper, but that there was a relinquishment of possession which extinguished and discharged the lien, where, after the execution and recording of the mortgage, the stable keeper repeatedly allowed the mortgagor to take the horse and use it in his business. Apparently the lien claimed in this case was a common-law lien.

In Bevan v. Waters (1828) 3 Car. & P. (Eng.) 520, Best, Ch. J., in considering the right of one to a lien for training a horse, said that in the case of a livery-stable keeper there was no lien because the horse was subject to the control of the owner, and might be taken out by him, and that the first time it was taken away there was, of course, an end of the lien.

In some cases, however, the fact that the owner of horses periodically used them has been held not to defeat the stable keeper's right to a lien for board. Walls v. Long (1891) 2 Ind.

App. 202, 28 N. E. 101; State use of Vette v. Shelvin (1886) 23 Mo. App. 598; Welsh v. Barnes (1895) 5 N. D. 277, 65 N. W. 675; Young v. Kimball (1854) 23 Pa. 193; Caldwell v. Tutt (1882) 10 Lea (Tenn.) 258, 43 Am. Rep. 307.

In Welsh v. Barnes (1895) 5 N. D. 277, 65 N. W. 675, where a statute provided that any livery-stable keeper to whom any horses were intrusted for feeding, herding, pasturing, or ranching should have a lien upon them for the amount due for feeding, and should be authorized to retain possession of them until the amount was paid, it was held that a stable keeper's lien was not lost, as against an attaching creditor, by allowing the owner periodically to take the horse to drive. The court said: "It is obvious that this statute must be construed in the light of the usages of business, and the customs of people who place horses in stables to be cared for by the proprietor of such stables. It is always understood that the owner will, from time to time, take temporary possession of the horse, returning it to the stable after his temporary use of the animal has ceased. If the owner, with the consent of the stable keeper, removes the horse permanently from his possession, the lien is gone. Such was the case of Ferriss v. Schreiner (1890) 43 Minn. 148, 44 N. W. 1083. If the circumstances of the case warrant the inference that the owner in the case cited had come to take his horse for good, then, if the plaintiff had assented to this, his lien would have been gone. But the mare, in the case at bar, when she was taken out for a drive, was being boarded at plaintiff's stable by the month, and it was not the intention of either party to terminate this arrangement at the time she was attached. Under the facts of the case at bar, it is obvious that the plaintiff's lien was not lost or impaired at the time the defendant, as sheriff, seized the mare under attachment against the owner."

And in Walls v. Long (Ind.) supra, where a statute provided that the keepers of livery stables should have a lien upon horses for feed and care bestowed upon them, and should have the same rights and remedies as were provided for persons having a lien under an act to which the statute was supplemental, which gave to persons named a right to sell specified property at public auction for their liens, it was held that a livery-stable keeper did not lose or waive his lien on a horse by permitting the owner to use him in his business, and that he might rely upon the lien where the owner took the horse as usual, but failed to return him to the stable. The court said: "When it is considered to what extent livery stables are made use of by the public as places most suitable, in many respects and instances, for the boarding of horses in daily use, it is difficult to believe that the legislative intent or meaning is that which is contended for by the appellant's counsel. If the keepers of such stables were intended to be benefited by the statute only where the animal being fed and cared for was not taken from the stable and used by the owner or his family at all, the benefits both to the keepers and owners would be slight, for few persons would consider such an arrangement either convenient or economical. It is obvious, in our opinion, that such is not the meaning of the statute. The appellees had no knowledge or reason to believe or suspect that the horse would not be returned as usual to the stable when last taken out. While the horse was being boarded by the appellees, the appellant was at their stable and expressed himself as pleased with the care the horse was receiving. The appellees were not required to announce on each occasion that the horse went out that they had a lien upon him, and that therefore he must be returned. There was nothing in the contract between them and Beal inconsistent with the existence of the lien, nor had it been terminated by the payment of the board. There is nothing in the record from which it can be inferred that the appellees intended to waive their lien, nor does the evidence furnish any ground whatever for the belief, if it exists, by either the appellant or Beal, that there was any such intent."

And in Caldwell v. Tutt (Tenn.) supra, where one section of a statute provided that whenever any horse was received to pasture for a consideration there should be a lien on the animal for charges, the same as an innkeeper's lien at common law, and another section provided that livery-stable keepers should be entitled to the same lien provided for in the above section on all stock received by him for board and feed until all reasonable charges were paid, it was held that a livery-stable keeper did not lose his lien on a horse because the owner was allowed to take it and use it occasionally with the stable keeper's consent, and that he was entitled to assert the lien against a creditor of the owner who levied on the horse while it was temporarily in the owner's possession.

And in State use of Vette v. Shelvin (1886) 23 Mo. App. 598, where a statute provided that every person who should keep or board a horse should, for the amount due therefor, have a lien on the animal or vehicle coming into his possession, and that no owner or claimant should have the right to take any such property out of the custody of the person having such lien, except with his consent, or on the payment of such debt, and that such lien should be valid against the property in the possession of any person receiving or purchasing it with notice of such claim, it was held that the lien of a stable keeper for board was not lost, even as to a mortgagee without notice, by reason of the owner's being allowed to use the horse during the day in his business. The court said: "In the view we take of the meaning of the statute, the lien thereby conferred is not dependent upon an actual physical custody by the stable keeper at every moment of time. We think that the lien conferred by the statute subsists, even as against third persons without notice, while the horse is boarded in the stable of the lienor, although it may, with his consent, be used during the day by the owner in his business. To hold otherwise would be to construe the statute so as to deprive stable keepers of the protection which the legislature probably intended to give them; since, as is well known, in most cases where horses are boarded, the owner is allowed to use them in his business during the day. This being so, the statute could not have intended to allow the owner to destroy the lien of the stable keeper while having the possession of the horse on the street during the day, by selling or mortgaging it to a stranger without notice of the lien. On the contrary, we are of opinion that every person is bound so far to take notice of the statute that when he is about to become the purchaser or mortgagee of a horse found upon the street in the custody of its owner, it is incumbent upon him to make inquiry as to the place where the horse is boarded, and whether anything is due for its keeping. There is no greater hardship in this rule than there is in the general rule in respect of purchases of personal property, that the purchaser gets no better title than the seller has."

And in Young v. Kimball (1854) 23 Pa. 193, where the statute gave livery-stable keepers a lien for the expenses of keeping horses, and a mail carrier kept two teams of horses at the plaintiff's inn, at which place he changed teams, and it appeared that each team was away twice a week, it was held that the plaintiff's lien as livery-stable keeper for previous charges was not lost because he allowed the horses to be taken away for use, since this was a necessary part of the arrangement between the parties that the horses should be delivered as they were needed.

And in McGlasson v. Hennessy (1911) 161 Ill. App. 387, where a statute provided that livery-stable keepers should have a lien upon the horses, carriages, and harnesses kept by them for the proper charges due for the keeping thereof, and expenses bestowed thereon at the request of the owner, or the person having the possession thereof, the court was of the opinion that a stable keeper's lien for keeping a horse and wagon was not destroyed by reason of the owner's possession for business purposes during the day, and his act in selling the property to a purchaser without notice. It was not necessary in this case to decide the question, however, as the evidence showed that the purchaser had notice of the facts, and also that the horse and wagon, after the transfer, were returned to the stable keeper's possession, through the horse of his own volition going to the stable when he was left standing in the street during the delivery of goods. J. T. W.

MARY E. PINQUE, Appt.

(— Cal. —, 178 Pac. 952.)

Landlord and tenant — waste.

1. The commission of waste by a tenant is not a ground for forfeiture of the leasehold.

— forfeiture — failure to repair.

2. Failure of a tenant to repair is not ground of forfeiture of the lease, if he was under no obligation to make repairs.

3. To justify forfeiture of a lease for nonpayment by the tenant of rent, demand must be made for the payment of the exact sum due.

— demand for rent — sufficiency.

4. A mere demand for rent is not sufficient to sustain a forfeiture of the leasehold, where a reduction of contract rates has been made and paid for several months prior to the demand, in consideration of a more quiet use of the premises.

— refusal to pay — effect.

5. Refusal of a tenant to pay rent does not justify a forfeiture of the lease in the absence of proper demand for rent due.

— damages — right to.

6. No damages can be recovered from a tenant for withholding the leased premises after an alleged forfeiture of the leasehold, if the alleged grounds of forfeiture failed.

[See 16 R. C. L. 1137.]

Appeal — damages for lawful and unlawful act — separation.

7. An allowance of damages against a tenant for making a specified use of the building, and making alterations in it, cannot be sustained on appeal if the use was not unlawful and there is no way of determining what portion of the damages were allowed on that account.

[See 8 R. C. L. 668.]

Landlord and tenant — damages for use of building.

8. A tenant is not liable in damages for putting the leased premises to a certain use, if such use is not forbidden by the lease.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Fresno County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain premises, together with damages. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Everts & Ewing, South & Ross, and W. E. Simpson for appellant.

Messrs. Harris & Hayhurst and Drew & Drew for respondent.

Sloss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover the possession of certain premises, together with damages. The complaint was in two counts. The first set up, in ordinary form, a cause of action in ejectment. The second alleged that the premises, consisting of a storeroom, had been held by the defendant Pinque under a written lease from one Keosheyman, and that the plaintiff, who had acquired the interest of Keosheyman, had elected, under the terms of the lease, to terminate it and forfeit the rights of the defendant.

Judgment went in favor of the plaintiff for the recovery of the premises, for $300, the value of the use and occupation, and for damages in the further sum of $509. The defendant Pinque appeals.

The lease from Keosheyman to Pinque was dated February 1, 1915, and ran for a term of nine years at a monthly rental of $100. It contained the following provisions material to this appeal: "That said storeroom is to be used by lessee for the wholesale, retail, and commission fruit and vegetable business in all its branches. . . .

"It is further agreed that in the event lessee desires to make changes or improvement for the convenience of any business she desires to conduct, that she has the right so to do at her own expense, except lessee agrees not to change or conduct any business, like in kind to business in lessor's property at time of change, or conflicts with any lease in force at date hereof, between lessor and other persons, or open up shoe or clothing store within three months from March 1, 1915.

"It is further understood and agreed in the event lessee shall make default in the payment of rent or refuse to comply with the terms, covenants, and conditions of this lease on her part to be kept and performed, then said lessor reserves the right to terminate this lease and oust and eject lessee therefrom and that all moneys theretofore paid shall be retained by lessor as damages and rental on said premises."

The second count sets up a forfeiture of the lease on the ground of nonpayment of rent. It also alleges that plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $2,000 by the defendant's failure to keep the premises in good repair, by her occupation of them as an automobile garage, and by her removal of a portion of the foundation of the building, thereby causing the floor to settle, and injuring and damaging the premises. The only ground of forfeiture asserted in the complaint is the nonpayment of rent. The other acts charged against the tenant are set up merely as a basis for the recovery of damages. They could not, in any event, justify a forfeiture. There is neither allegation, proof, nor finding that the tenant was under any obligation to repair. The defendant had the right, as we shall show hereafter, to use the premises as a garage. The commission of waste is not a ground of forfeiture, the landlord's remedy being an action for damages. Chipman v. Emeric, 3 Cal. 273.

The findings follow the allegations of the complaint, except that they assess the damage for failure to repair, for use as a garage, and for injury to the building, at $509.

It was the settled rule at common law that a demand for payment of the exact sum due was a necessary prerequisite to a forfeiture of a lease for nonpayment of rent. 24 Cyc. 1355. The same rule was laid down in this state at an early date (Gage v. Bates, 40 Cal. 384; O'Connor v. Kelly, 41 Cal. 484), and these decisions have never been questioned (Mossi v. Fairbanks, 19 Cal. App. 355, 125 Pac. 1071). The finding of the court is, "that there came due as rent, August 1, 1916, . . . the sum of $100, and said plaintiff did on August 1, 1916, demand payment thereof; that said defendant wholly failed, neglected, and refused to pay said rent."

The appellant contends that the evidence does not sustain the finding that such a demand was made, and the record, we think, requires that this contention be upheld. It appears without conflict that some months prior to August, 1916, the defendant had begun to use the premises as a garage. The portion of the building above the leased store was occupied as a lodging house, and its tenants were disturbed by the noise resulting from operations in the garage at night. The plaintiff agreed with the defendant that, if she would maintain quiet in the garage during the night hours, a reduction of $15 monthly in the rent would be made, and for three or four months prior to August the sum of $85 per month had been paid and received as the rent of the premises. On August 1 the vice president of the plaintiff corporation called to collect the rent. According to his own testimony, he did not demand any specified amount, but "just asked for the rent." Under the strict rules governing attempts to enforce forfeitures, this was not the specific demand required by the law. It was at least doubtful whether the plaintiff was demanding the payment of $100 a month, as specified in the lease, or of the lesser sum fixed by the subsequent agreement of modification. At any rate, it certainly cannot be interpreted as a precise and specific demand for $100 per month, and this is the demand which the court found to have been made. Cases holding that a demand is not necessary where the defendant denies the relation of landlord and tenant (Smith v. Ogg Shaw, 16 Cal. 88; Simpson v. Applegate, 75 Cal. 342, 17 Pac. 237) have no application here. The defendant did not at any time deny the tenancy. On the contrary, she alleged in her answer a tender of the rent due, and repeated the tender at the trial. The respondent argues that any defect in the demand became inconsequential because, as the court finds, the defendant refused to pay the rent. The plaintiff's own evidence shows that the refusal was not absolute, but that the tenant merely declined to pay pending an adjustment of a dispute concerning the plaintiff's right to make certain changes in the premises. But, even if the defendant had flatly refused to pay the rent, this would not authorize a forfeiture of her lease, in the absence of a proper demand.

"Nor, for the purpose of forfeiture, will a waiver of the demand ever be implied, because a forfeiture, from its very nature, cannot take place by consent, and it is not favored by the rules of law." Gaskill v. Trainer, 3 Cal. 334, 340.

The plaintiff therefore failed to establish a ground for the forfeiture of the lease and recovery of the premises for non-payment of rent.

right to.

The judgment for damages for withholding the premises must fall, of course, with the judgment for restitution.

We find ourselves unable, likewise, to sustain the part of the judgment awarding damages in the sum of $509. By the lease the premises were let to be used for the fruit and vegetable business. If the instrument had stopped with this provision, it might well be claimed that any other use by the lessee would render her liable in damages, or authorize the lessor to rescind the lease. Civ. Code, § 1930. But the lease contains the further clause, above quoted, that the lessee may change the premises or conduct any other business, except certain specified kinds. The prohibited occupations thus excepted do not include the maintenance of a garage (in the absence, at least, of any claim that such business "conflicted with any lease" to other persons), and it is perfectly clear, therefore, that the lessee was not precluded from using the premises as a garage.

If the defendant was liable for waste in removing a portion of the foundation of the building, there is no separate finding of damage resulting from this act. The court finds that the plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $509 by the dependant's occupation of the premises as a garage and her removal of a portion of the foundation. There is no way in which we can determine what portion of this damage the court attributed to one or the other of the supposed wrongful acts. Since, as we have seen, the defendant did not violate the terms of the lease by using the premises as a garage, the award of damages based in part on that ground cannot stand.

A number of other points are raised by the appellant, but the views we have expressed render any extended discussion of them unnecessary. The question of the sufficiency of the complaint may be obviated by an application to the court below for leave to amend. Any error that may have been committed in admitting in evidence the assignment of the lease from Keosheyan to the plaintiff without laying the proper foundation is not likely to recur upon a second trial.

The judgment is reversed.

ANNOTATION.

Commission of waste as ground for forfeiture of lease.

I. In general, 672.

II. Extent of forfeiture, 674.

III. Right of forfeiture as affected by character of waste:

a. In general, 674.

I. In general.

At common law there was no forfeiture of an estate for years for the commission of waste. It was only by the Statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. I. chap. 5, that the remedy of forfeiture was given therefor. Chipman v. Emeric (1853) 3 Cal. 273; Crowe v. Wilson (1886) 65 Md. 479, 57 Am. Rep. 343, 5 Atl. 427; Smith v. Sharpe (1852) 44 N. C. (Busbee, L.) 91, 57 Am. Dec. 574.

The Statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. I. chap. 5, is declared in Parrott v. Barney (1868) Deady, 405, Fed. Cas. No. 10,773a, to form part of the common law brought to this country by the colonists from England. And this statute is said to be the law of Maryland, in Thurston v. Mustin (1828) 3 Cranch, C. C. 385, Fed. Cas. No. 14,013.

It is stated in Reeve's History of English Law, vol. 2, p. 438, which is quoted in Moss Point Lumber Co. v. Harrison County (1906) 89 Miss. 448, 42 So. 290, 873, that "the provision in the Statute of Gloucester, giving, by way of penalty, the forfeiture of the place wasted and treble damages, was re-enacted in New York, New Jersey, and Virginia." In the case last cited the court declined to hold that the statute had any intrinsic force as a statute in Mississippi.

It is said in Currier v. Perley (1851) 24 N. H. 219, that an estate from year to year may be determined by the commission of waste by the tenant.

Waste is held a sufficient cause for the rescission of a lease, in Denis v. Burray (1810) 1 Rev. de Leg. L. C. 505 (abstract), especially where the parties have covenanted that the tenant shall not commit waste.

The right of a lessor to forfeit the lease for breach of a covenant not to excavate clay to more than a specified depth is recognized in Kerr v. Hastings (1875) 25 U. C. C. P. 429.

The reported case (J. B. Hill Co. v. Pinque, ante, 669), in holding that the commission of waste is not ground of forfeiture, the landlord's remedy being an action for damages, follows the earlier decision of Chipman v. Emeric (1853) 3 Cal. 273, which refused to declare a lease forfeited for the commission of waste by cutting trees for making charcoal, on the ground that the California statute confines the remedy for waste to the recovery of treble damages.

A tenancy at will has been held to be legally determined by the commission of waste. Daniels v. Pond (1838) 21 Pick. (Mass.) 367, 32 Am. Dec. 269; Perry v. Carr (1862) 44 N. H. 120 (where the waste consisted in the sale and removal of manure from leased farming lands); Philips v. Covert (1810) 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 1 (where there was voluntary waste by cutting timber).

But a tenancy at will, existing under the statutes of Maine, is held not destroyed by the commission of waste by the tenant, in Young v. Young (1853) 36 Me. 133; since the statute gives to the tenant at will rights for a period, after a written notice to quit, of equal validity with those acquired under a written lease for a like period.

In addition to the preceding cases, the right to forfeit a lease for the commission of waste is recognized, either expressly or impliedly, in the following decisions:

II. Extent of forfeiture.

By the Statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. I. chap. 5, the remedy of forfeiture was expressly confined to the place where the waste was committed. Chipman v. Emeric (1853) 3 Cal. 273. This principle was recognized in Hasty v. Wheeler (1835) 12 Me. 434, where it was said: "If a tenant for years committed waste he forfeited the place wasted." And in Morehouse v. Cotheal (1850) 22 N. J. L. 521, it is stated: "Unless the waste be sparsim, disposed over the whole tract, only those portions of the tract actually wasted are forfeited." So it is declared in Smith v. Sharpe (1852) 44 N. C. (Busbee, L.) 91, 57 Am. Dec. 574, that where waste is "done sparsim, or all over a wood, the whole wood shall be recovered." In Clemence v. Steere (1850) 1 R. I. 272, 55 Am. Dec. 621, it is remarked: "Waste in any particular place forfeits the place; as waste in a woods forfeits the woods; in the meadow, forfeits the meadow; a destruction of the dwelling house forfeits the whole place." But it seems that if waste be committed in a dwelling house, part of the property demised, only such parts of the dwelling house are forfeited as the waste is committed in. Jackson ex dem. Thomas v. Tibbits (1829) 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 341.

In Smith v. Mattingly (1894) 96 Ky. 228, 28 S. W. 503, it is said that, in case of voluntary waste of a portion of the land in which a tenant may have an estate for life or years, the entire tract is not forfeited under the Kentucky statute, which provides that only the particular thing wasted shall be forfeited, whether it be timber, fence, rails, and building, or other thing appertaining to the land.

III. Right of forfeiture as affected by character of waste.

a. In general.

The scope of this note necessarily confines the discussion of the question of the character of the waste committed, or as to what constitutes waste, to cases in which the right to forfeit a lease therefor was involved.

In the absence of injury to the reversion, it has been held that there can be no waste justifying a forfeiture of the lease. Thus, lack of good husbandry in getting in hay and grain crops, which resulted in injury to them, affords no basis for a judgment of forfeiture of the lease, where it does not appear that the farm was injured by the lessee's failure in this respect. Houghton v. Cook (1917) 91 Vt. 197, 100 Atl. 115.

Similarly, the use of a vacant lot, leased without specifying the purposes to which the property should be devoted, by temporarily depositing sand and gravel on it, does not constitute waste authorizing a forfeiture of the lease because lessening its value for agricultural purposes, where the lot is within the corporate limits of the city, and is not chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes. Moore v. Twin City Ice & Cold Storage Co. (1916) 92 Wash. 608, 159 Pac. 779, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 540.

So, digging clay for bricks is not a ground for a forfeiture of a lease, where it occurred a number of years previously, and the injury, if any, has long since ceased. Jackson ex dem.

Van Rensselaer v. Andrews (1821) 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 431.

If a tenant by turning the water of a creek, as an act of good husbandry, so that it will flow into a swamp, thereby kills timber which is growing there, it will not be deemed waste so as to produce a forfeiture of the lease, especially where the landlord has waited for twenty years before seeking to enforce the forfeiture, and, in the meantime, new trees have grown up of more value than the old. Ibid.

That the lessee of a right of way for a logging railroad graveled the right of way instead of timbering it, as agreed, is not such waste as authorizes a cancellation of the lease, where it is not shown that the graveling impaired the rental value of the land or materially affected the fee, and it is doubtful whether the drainage of the land by ditches constructed along the right of way has not benefited the property in excess of the damage sustained by the graveling. Northcraft v. Blumauer (1909) 53 Wash. 243, 182 Am. St. Rep. 1071, 101 Pac. 871.

Inclosure made by a hedge by a copyholder, which obstructs the lord's field course for sheep, was held not a ground for forfeiture in Paston v. Utber (1630) Hutton, 103, 123 Eng. Reprint, 1131, since forfeiture of a copyhold is by something done to the copyhold land itself, but the inclosure is better for the copyhold, and makes the land better.

Forfeiture of a mining lease will not be decreed in an equitable action, where the waste complained of is not only involuntary or permissive, but inconsequential. Continental Fuel Co. v. Haden (1918) 182 Ky. 8, 206 S. W. 8.

Injury to the demised premises, due to their occupancy for the purposes for which they were leased, is not ground for a forfeiture. Thus, one who leases premises for use as a bathhouse must be presumed to have anticipated the natural consequences to the building which would result from the stipulated use, and, whether such injury proves to be great or small, it could not afford justification for abrogation of the lease; especially where the lessee, when his attention was called to the injury being done to the building, took immediate steps to prevent, as far as possible, the continuance of the injury. Coy v. Title Guarantee & T. Co. (1912) 198 Fed. 275.

But removal by a tenant from land which he had leased with the avowed purpose of erecting a tenement house thereon, of oil, of the existence of which the lessor had no knowledge at the time of the making of the lease, constitutes waste for which the lessor may, in accordance with the terms of the California Code, § 1930, treat the lease as rescinded because of the wrongful act of the tenant in using the property for a purpose foreign to that for which it was let. Isom v. Rex Crude Oil Co. (1905) 147 Cal. 659, 82 Pac. 317.

b. Quality of husbandry.

Alleged violations of stipulations in leases concerning the care and management of leased agricultural property were relied upon as grounds of forfeiture in the following cases: Patton v. Bond (1879) 50 Iowa, 508, which holds that noncompliance with a stipulation in a lease that the lessee shall plow the oat stubble at least 6 inches deep by a specified date, and that failure to do so shall work a forfeiture of the lease, justifies the lessor in treating the lease as forfeited.

But that a tenant of a farm kept hogs in the horse barn is not such waste as calls for a forfeiture of the lease, under a clause providing therefor in case of voluntary waste. Schultz v. Lidtka (1917) 179 Iowa, 652, 161 N. W. 682.

A provision in a lease of farm lands that the lessee shall work the farm in a good and workmanlike manner, and that, upon his failure to do so the lessor may have the work done at the cost of the lessee, does not entitle the lessor to claim a forfeiture by reason of the lessee's failure to fulfil his agreement, where the lease contains no stipulation as to forfeiture. Hanaw v. Bailey (1890) 83 Mich. 24, 9 L.R.A. 801, 46 N. W. 1039.

Equity will cancel a lease of land set out in orchards, which the lease required the lessees to prune and cultivate according to the rules of good husbandry, where they permitted suckers and water sprouts to grow and overrun the apple orchard, and allowed both the apple and other orchards to become infected with insect pests, which seriously injured the healthful condition of the trees, killing some, and causing others to go into decay, which, if permitted to continue during the life of the lease, must result in the ruin and destruction of the orchards. Anderson v. Hammon (1890) 19 Or. 446, 20 Am. St. Rep. 832, 24 Pac. 228.

That the lessee permitted demised farming lands to become overgrown with lantana is not a breach of a covenant not to suffer any waste, and does not entitle the lessor to determine the lease, where lantana had been growing on the premises for ten years prior to the commencement of the lessee's term, and it does not appear that men of ordinary prudence and diligence would have cleared the land, which would have cost $3,000 or $4,000. Paris v. Vasconcellos (1903) 14 Haw. 590.

A covenant in a lease of land set out to fruit trees that the lessee may raise squash and pumpkins between the trees is not violated, so as to incur a forfeiture, by planting corn, beans, and nursery stock between the rows of fruit trees, over a small part of the farm, especially where the lessor had the right at all times to enter upon and inspect the demised premises, and made no objection to the corn or beans. Randol v. Scott (1895) 110 Cal. 590, 42 Pac. 976.

A covenant in a lease of farming lands that briars, weeds, and sprouts are to be kept down in the fence corners the same as in the fields means that this work shall be done during the term, and not at any time before its completion; but the breach of such a stipulation does not entitle the lessor to determine the tenancy by a ten days' notice to quit. Ricketts v. Richardson (1882) 85 Ind. 508.

A lease of farming lands will not be forfeited for an alleged failure to plant and replace apple trees, when it does not appear but that the missing trees were torn up by the wind, or otherwise destroyed, after the suit to recover possession of the premises was instituted. Clarke v. Cummings (1849) 5 Barb. (N. Y.) 839.

A diversion of irrigating waters from the leased premises, in violation of the terms of the lease, will not work a forfeiture where, owing to the destruction of a canal, they could not be utilized, and their use upon other lands was permitted by the lessee in good faith, and in consideration of a repair of the canal by the user. Semidey v. Central Aguirre Co. (1917) 152 C. C. A. 444, 239 Fed. 610, writ of certiorari denied (1917) in 243 U. S. 652, 61 L. ed. 947, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 479.

It has been held, with reference to cattle included in a lease of a farm, that while a failure to properly feed and care for them during the fall and winter months justifies a termination of the lease, under a provision therein, authorizing its cancellation at the option of the lessor upon failure to care and provide for the stock, yet the right to insist upon a forfeiture is waived when not attempted to be exercised until the following June. Catlin v. Wright (1882). 13 Neb. 558, 14 N. W. 530.

c. Cutting timber.

The act of a tenant in cutting timber not for the use or profit of the property, but for the purpose of selling it, constitutes waste, authorizing a judgment of forfeiture. Morehouse v. Cotheal (1850) 22 N. J. L. 521. This principle is recognized in Thurston v. Mustin (1828) 3 Cranch, C. C. 335, Fed. Cas. No. 14,013; Richards v. Noble (1807) 3 Meriv. 673, 36 Eng. Reprint, 258.

In the following cases the violation of provisions in leases concerning the cutting of wood on the demised premises was urged as a ground of forfeiture: Yarborough v. Hurt (1917) 131 Ark. 593, 199 S. W. 911, which holds that cutting timber without the written permission of the lessor, in violation of the terms of the lease, renders it subject to forfeiture, where such penalty is provided by its express terms.

A lease providing for a re-entry upon notice by the lessor, and in case the lessee violates a condition that he will not cut down or destroy any of the wood or timber on the premises, is not rendered absolutely void by a breach of the condition, but may be terminated upon the election of the lessor. Brooks v. Rogers (1892) 99 Ala. 433, 12 So. 61.

A breach of a condition in a lease not to sell or dispose of any wood or timber off and from the demised premises, without permission in writing from the landlord, works a forfeiture of the estate, although there is a reservation of 30 acres of woodland, out of the 180 acres comprising the farm, from which no timber is to be cut. Verplanck v. Wright (1840) 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 506.

Under a lease requiring one sixth of the farming lands demised to be set apart for woodland from which no timber or wood shall be taken except for building, repairing fences, or fuel, the fact of cutting or clearing off the wood so that but two thirds of the required area is left creates a forfeiture by the very terms of the covenant. Clarke v. Cummings (1849) 5 Barb. (N. Y.) 339.

That a tenant procured firewood and fencing timber from other lands does not justify him in cutting and selling, in violation of a covenant in the lease, valuable timber on the demised lands, which good husbandry would dictate should not be used for either of these purposes. Ibid.

In Baxter v. Lansing (1838) 7 Paige (N. Y.) 350, the right of a lessor to enforce a forfeiture of the lessee's estate for the breach of a covenant against cutting timber or trees is recognized, although the injury to the reversion be comparatively trifling.

That a tenant of a farm cut down trees to build a fence, and removed willows which interfered with a tile drain, does not show such waste as calls for a forfeiture of the lease, under a clause providing therefor, in case of voluntary waste. Schultz v.

Lidtka (1917) 179 Iowa, 652, 161 N. W. 682.

A judgment in general form awarding to the landlord the possession of lands demised, because of waste committed by the tenant by cutting timber, does not work a forfeiture of the tenant's rights under the lease so as to entitle the landlord to a crop growing on the lands, where it is not adjudged in conformity with the Indiana statute that the injury to the estate in reversion is equal to the value of the tenant's estate or unexpired term. Sullivan v. O'Hara (1890) 1 Ind. App. 259, 27 N. E. 590.

By the common law it is waste, and a forfeiture of the lease is incurred, when a tenant converts one species of edifice into another, even though its value is improved. Crowe v. Wilson (1866) 65 Md. 479, 57 Am. Rep. 343, 5 Atl. 427.

While it was for a time questionable whether a tenant could erect a new building upon the leased premises without subjecting himself to a loss of the property, it is now understood that it is not waste for the tenant to erect a new edifice upon the demised premises, provided it can be done without destroying or materially injuring the buildings or other improvements already existing thereon. Winship v. Pitts (1832) 3 Paige (N. Y.) 259.

The court should not instruct that the acts of a tenant in cutting, without the landlord's permission, a doorway through a partition and putting in a window, work a forfeiture of his interest, but the question should be submitted to the jury, to determine whether the acts done were in fact prejudicial to the property. Jackson ex dem. Thomas v. Tibbits (1829) 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 341.

The estate of a tenant for a fixed period of less than one year cannot be adjudged forfeited for voluntary waste committed by the tenant in making changes and alterations in the buildings, where it is not shown, in conformity with statutory requirement, that the injury to the property by the commission of the waste complained of was equal to the value of the tenant's unexpired term as the lessee of the property. Bollenbacker v. Fritts (1884) 98 Ind. 50.

Whether alterations in leased buildings, made by a tenant, will incur a forfeiture of the lease, under its provisions, was considered in the following cases: Jackson ex dem. Weldon v. Harrison (1819) 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 66, holding that a stipulation in a lease that the lessee shall not make alterations in the buildings, without the lessor's consent, rests in covenant, and is not a condition for which the lease may be forfeited.

The change by a tenant of the name of a hotel, which he had theretofore designated by his family name, to a more general title, is not an alteration of the property leased which would justify an annulment of the lease. Seward v. Denechaud (1908) 120 La. 720, 45 So. 561.

No breach of a stipulation in a lease not to make alterations, such as will sustain the lessor's right of entry for forfeiture, is shown by the lessee's erection of a building upon the adjacent lot of another person, and which, it is alleged, has affected the light and air in reference to the building leased. Atkins v. Chilson (1845) 9 Met. (Mass.) 52.

Alterations made by a tenant in leased buildings used for business purposes, and which consist in putting in a new floor in place of one which was insecure, and removing rotten partitions and an old stairway, and building a new front further back from the walk than the old one, do not constitute waste for which the lease should be declared forfeited, under a clause that the lessee will not commit any waste, where the building has not been so changed or altered that it cannot be restored. Abel v. Wuesten (1911) 141 Ky. 766, 133 S. W. 774, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 389, on rehearing in (1911) 143 Ky. 513, 136 S. W. 867, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 391.

But, on rehearing in 143 Ky. 513, the court held that the alterations were so radical as substantially to change the character of the building, and that in making them the tenant committed waste, working a forfeiture of the lease. In this case the tenant had the oral consent of the landlord to make the alterations, which was held not to protect him in view of the requirement of the statute that the landlord must consent in writing to the commission of the waste.

A lease containing a covenant to repair and to keep in repair the leased premises, together with such buildings, improvements, or additions as might be made during the term, is not forfeited by the acts of the lessee in changing the lower part of the house into a shop, enlarging windows and in making a new door in a partition and stopping up an old one. Doe ex dem. Dalton v. Jones (1832) 4 Barn. & Ad. 126, 110 Eng. Reprint, 403, 1 Nev. & M. 6, 2 L. J. K. B. N. S. 11.

Relief from forfeiture of a lease will not be granted, when the lessees have committed waste by opening a doorway and removing a wall, in violation of a covenant to keep in good repair the buildings, walls, and fences, where, instead of offering to make good the waste if it be possible to do so, they claim the right to maintain the alterations, which were made to convert the property into a theater. Rose v. Spicer [1911] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 234, 80 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1011, 104 L. T. N. S. 619, 55 Sol. Jo. 405, 27 Times L. R. 367.

Under a lease containing a proviso for re-entry if the lessee committed waste to the value of 10 shillings, the question whether waste was committed to that extent should be submitted to the jury, where the act complained of consisted in pulling down an old building, and it is possible that the value of the reversion might be increased by the alteration. Doe ex dem. Darlington v. Bond (1826) 5 Barn. & C. 855, 108 Eng. Reprint, 318, 8 Dowl. & R. 738, 5 L. J. K. B. 68, 29 Revised Rep. 436.

Breach of a covenant not to make any alterations in leased premises without the written consent of the lessor, under penalty of forfeiture, is held waived where the lessees requested the lessor to put in some stairs to give access to the basement of the demised premises, and the lessor told them they might use old stairs in the basement for that purpose, which they did, making the necessary opening in the floor. Moses v. Loomis (1895) 156 Ill. 392, 47 Am. St. Rep. 194, 40 N. E. 952, affirming (1894) 55 Ill. App. 342.

And in an action of forcible entry and detainer brought upon the ground of a forfeiture of a lease by making alterations in the building without the lessor's consent, and contrary to the terms of the lease, it is error to strike from the answer averments that the alterations were made with the full knowledge of the lessor, who continued to receive rent under the lease without notifying the lessee, until some time subsequently, that she intended to claim a forfeiture. Pettygrove v. Rothschild (1891) 2 Wash. 6, 25 Pac. 907.

Failure of a tenant to repair the demised property, in accordance with the terms of the lease, was considered a ground of forfeiture in O'Byrne v. Jebeles & C. Confectionery Co. (1910) 165 Ala. 183, 51 So. 633, holding that forfeiture of a lease in accordance with its terms, for the lessee's failure to keep in repair and in good sanitary condition, a building which he had erected thereon, in part consideration of the rent, will not be relieved against in equity, where the lessee had permitted the floors to sink 2 inches, and portions of the roof and floors to become rotten, and had failed to keep the plumbing in repair.

So, a lease by the state of river improvements to a navigation company will be rescinded, according to its terms, where the lessee permitted the improvements to become and remain out of repair to such an extent that one or more locks and dams were in danger of being washed out and destroyed, and the lessee was making no attempt to repair and preserve the improvements, and was unable to do so because of insolvency. Kentucky River Nav. Co. v. Com. (1877) 13 Bush. (Ky.) 435.

Such neglect of a tenant to repair the leased premises as will lead to a forfeiture of the lease is not shown by failure to replace forthwith a wooden conductor, the absence of which occasioned no injury to the leased buildings. Atkins v. Chilson (1845) 9 Met. (Mass.) 52.

A covenant in a lease of a cottage at a watering and bathing place, which provides that all rights of the lessee shall cease if he suffers the cottage to be out of repair for any one bathing season during the continuance of the term, is absolute, and not contingent upon any covenant on the part of the lessor to keep the adjacent hotel and grounds in good order and repair. Moyer v. Mitchell (1880) 53 Md. 171.

But a lessee's failure to repair buildings is waived where he prepared to make extensive improvements which would have covered the necessary repairs, but was instructed to wait awhile, by the lessor, who never directed him to proceed. Houghton v. Cook (1917) 91 Vt. 197, 100 Atl. 115.

APPEAL by defendants Dean Iron Company et al., from a judgment of the District Court for St. Louis County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to certain real property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Abbott, MacPherran, Lewis, & Gilbert and Baldwin, Baldwin, & Holmes, for appellants:

Plaintiff has not sustained any damage in consequence of the acts of defendants, either proximate or natural, and if any damage whatever has been sustained, it must be and is remote and speculative.

Quinn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action to recover damages for injury to real property. Plaintiff recovered a verdict of $400 against the defendants Arthur Mining Company and Dean Iron Mining Company. From a judgment entered thereon this appeal was taken.

The village of Spina is situated on the Mesaba range, which is one of the principal iron mining districts of northern Minnesota. A large part of the iron mining in this region is done by the system known as open pit mining. This system necessitates a stripping of the earth and other material overlaying the ore, and depositing the same in dump piles in convenient localities. The defendant Arthur Iron Mining Company held a mining lease upon the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 15, township 58 north, range 19 west, from the owners thereof. During the summer of 1912, that company entered into a contract with Butler Brothers, for the stripping of a certain mine near by, and, accordingly, thereafter, and prior to the month of December, 1915, the strippings therefrom were placed by Butler Brothers in a dump upon the tract of land above described, which lies immediately across the highway on the west line of the village of Spina. Thereafter the defendant Dean Iron Mining Company became the owner of such lease by assignment. The plaintiff owns lots 6 and 7 in block 5 in the village of Spina, upon which is situated, at a distance of 206 feet from the toe or base of the dump in question, an eleven-room two-story dwelling, in which he resides with his family. On June 13, 1916, near the northerly part of the east end of the dump a large mass of soft wet mortar-like material gushed out from the bottom of the dump, across the highway, and a distance of over 200 feet down one of the streets of said village, carrying with it for about 50 feet several houses with which it came in contact. The property of the plaintiff was not located upon this street, and was in no manner whatever reached by the material which was thus forced out from the bottom of the dump. The basis of plaintiff's claim to a right of recovery, as appears from the complaint, is that the ground where the dump was constructed is low, spongy, and slopes toward his premises; that the material constituting the dump was deposited thereon in a careless and negligent manner, by making the dump too high, the incline too steep, and by depositing thereon soft earth, quicksand, and gravel in such manner as to cause the same to give way and slide in large quantities; that a large portion thereof did give way and slide onto the streets in masses, and that another like slide is liable to occur, and strike and injure his premises, and that by reason thereof the market value of his property has been greatly diminished.

At the trial the issues were fully litigated. The controlling question here for consideration is whether the evidence sustains the verdict. Appellants contend that it is not sufficient to sustain the verdict, either as to negligence or damages. We are of the opinion that, even though there is sufficient showing to warrant a finding of negligence in the construction and maintenance of the dump, yet there is a fatal lack of evidence in support of the question of damages. Plaintiff contends, in both his pleading and proofs, that the reasonable market value of his property, immediately prior to the occurrence of the slide in June, 1916, was $4,000, and that immediately thereafter, because of the apprehension of another slide, it had no market value whatever. He rests his claim for damages squarely upon fear or apprehension that, because one slide has occurred, another is likely to happen at any time, which might strike his property, and that as the result of such apprehension the market value of his property has been greatly diminished. Respondent's contention cannot be sustained.

To recover damages for injury to real property, resulting from negligence, the owner must wait until the injury or damage has actually happened. It is the damage, and not the anticipation thereof, that gives rise to the cause of action. The following cases are analogous: West Leigh Colliery Co. v. Tunncliffe & Hampson [1908] A. C. 27, 5 B. R. C. 916, 77 L. J. Ch. N. S. 102, 98 L. T. N. S. 4, 24 Times L. R. 146, 10 Ann. Cas. 74; McGill v. Pintsch Compressing Co. 140 Iowa, 429, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 466, 118 N. W. 786; Robb v. Carnegie Bros. 145 Pa. 324, 14 L.R.A. 329, 27 Am. St. Rep. 694, 22 Atl. 649.

In the instant case, apprehension of a future slide, though founded on the known fact of a former one, does not give rise to a cause of action for damages. To hold otherwise would be to allow damages for depreciation in the market value, due to the apprehension of future injury by negligence, for an act which has not and may never happen. Such a rule of damages would be too remote and speculative. The judgment appealed from must be set aside.

ANNOTATION.

Depreciation in market value of land as affecting the general rule that cause of action arises when injury is inflicted, and not when cause is created.

There are some cases, infra, in which it was held that the cause of action, under certain particular circumstances arises as soon as the cause of injury is created, even though there is no actual physical injury inflicted at that time; since the creation of the cause depreciates the market value of the plaintiff's property, by reason of the fixed conclusion, from obvious facts, that injury must follow.

In none of these cases, however, was negligence the cause of the injury, so they can be distinguished readily from the holding in the reported case (JOHNSON v. ROUCHLEAU-RAY IRON LAND CO. ante, 679). The principle is not applicable to cases in which there is a right to successive actions, since it assumes that all consequences are obvious as soon as the cause is created, and the principle as to depreciation in market value of land, as a measure of damages, is not, as a rule, applied where there is a right to successive actions. Depreciation in market value, as a measure of damages, is not within the scope of this annotation, except to the extent that it affects the question of time when cause of action arises.

In Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. Cook (1893) 57 Ark. 387, 21 S. W. 1066, it was held that the depreciation in the salable value of the land, apart from actual injuries to the land, can form no part of the estimate of damages where there is a right to successive actions, the court saying: "In the case of Pinney v. Berry (1875) 61 Mo. 359, the court considered the correctness of the rule announced in the instruction under consideration, as applicable to this class of cases; and Judge Napton, for the court, says: 'It is obvious that this rule has no application to such nuisances as may be removed the day after the verdict, or for the continuance of which a second or third action may be maintained, or which may be abated at the instance of the injured party, by the order of a competent court. The plaintiff is only entitled to compensation for the loss actually sustained prior to the suit, by the nuisance.' The rule approved was that the damages were the loss to the rental value of the land, not to its salable value as an absolute estate, caused by the nuisance. To the same effect are a number of authorities. Battishill v. Reed (1856) 18 C. B. 696, 139 Eng. Reprint, 1544, 25 L. J. C. P. N. S. 290, 4 Week. Rep. 603; Troy v. Cheshire R. Co. (1851) 23 N. H. 83, 55 Am. Dec. 177; Uline v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1885) 101 N. Y. 98, 54 Am. Rep. 661, 4 N. E. 536; Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co. v. Compton (1892) 142 Ill. 511, 18 L.R.A. 390, 34 Am. St. Rep. 92, 32 N. E. 693; Bare v. Hoffman (1875) 79 Pa. 71, 21 Am. Rep. 42; 3 Sutherland, Damages, § 1039; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 16, 17 and note."

And where the injury is due to the negligent construction of a thing or structure, there is a right to successive actions, even though the thing or structure would be legal or nonabatable if it had been properly constructed. In Turner v. J. M. Brooks & Sons (1912) 151 Ky. 310, L.R.A.1916E, 958, 151 S. W. 948, the court said: "Defendants insist that as the blasting was all done, and the property permanently injured, prior to the time of its purchase by plaintiffs, the right of action for such injury was in Huff alone, and that, as plaintiffs purchased the property in its depreciated condition, they are not entitled to recover. If this were the case of a permanent structure, lawfully and properly built, the contention of the defendants would be sound, for in that event there could be only one recovery for all damages, past, present, and future, and the vendor Huff alone would be entitled to recover. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Lambert (1908) 33 Ky. L. Rep. 199, 110 S. W. 305; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Orr (1891) 91 Ky. 109, 15 S. W. 8; Hay v. Lexington (1903) 114 Ky. 669, 71 S. W. 867; Richmond

v. Gentry (1910) 136 Ky. 319, 136 Am. St. Rep. 255, 124 S. W. 337; Stickley v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (1892) 93 Ky. 323, 20 S. W. 261. But even in the case of a permanent structure, if the structure be unlawfully or negligently built, and by reason thereof injury is inflicted from time to time, there may be recurring recoveries. Louisville v. Coleburne (1900) 108 Ky. 420, 56 S. W. 681; Klosterman v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (1900) 22 Ky. L. Rep. 192, 56 S. W. 820; Finley v. Williamsburg (1903) 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1338, 71 S. W. 502; Madisonville, H. & E. R. Co. v. Graham (1912) 147 Ky. 604, 144 S. W. 737. This is not a case of a structure. The act of the defendants in blasting the stone into the river, and permitting it to remain there to the injury of others, was not based on any semblance of right. Being unlawful and wrongful from the very outset, we see no way in which it may become rightful as to the owners of the land, so long as any recurring injury occurs, unless by release, or grant, or the payment of a sum covering all damages, past, present, and future. Until this be done, or the nuisance be abated, recoveries may be had for each recurring injury. As recoveries may be had for each recurring injury, it follows that the right of action for each recurring injury is in the owner of the premises at the time the injury results, and a payment to a former owner after he has parted with title, for injuries resulting to the property while owned by him, is no defense to an action by a subsequent owner, for injuries to the premises occurring after his purchase. As there was evidence tending to show an injury to the property after its purchase by the plaintiffs, and that this injury resulted from an unlawful act of the defendants in blasting the stones into the river and diverting its flow, it follows that the trial court erred in giving a peremptory instruction in favor of defendants." A number of cases supporting this collateral point are cited in L.R.A.1916E, 1027, note 85.

It may also be said that the overwhelming weight of authority, both English and American, sustains the proposition that, unless there is an invasion of plaintiff's property such as to make an action on case or trespass an appropriate action, even though the injury is not caused by negligence, but by a nuisance, the right of action does not arise until some injury to plaintiff's property has accrued. See cases cited in L.R.A. 1916E, 999 and 1006, notes 13 and 16.

But in a few cases the courts have pointed out the fact that permanent depreciation in the value of plaintiff's property, caused by the certainty that injury must result from the cause, is in itself the real injury. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. Cook (1893) 57 Ark. 387, 21 S. W. 1066 (converse holding; see same case, supra); Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Lambert (1908) 33 Ky. L. Rep. 199, 110 S. W. 305; Heard v. Middlesex Canal (1842) 5 Met. (Mass.) 81; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Davis (1910) 26 Okla. 434, 109 Pac. 214; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Stephenson (1914) 43 Okla. 676, L.R.A.1916E, 966, 144 Pac. 387.

In none of these cases, however, did the case arise in consequence of the plaintiff having brought his action before there was any physical injury to his property. This fact may, or it may not, be important, depending upon whether or not the cause of action might be held to arise for one purpose, where it would not arise until a later time for another.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Lambert (1908) 33 Ky. L. Rep. 199, 110 S. W. 305, supra, the court said: "In this case appellant not only had the right to construct the wall, but was actually engaged in its construction at the time a portion of the property was sold. The work had progressed to such an extent as to make the construction of the wall reasonably certain. While the injury to the two lots first sold was not complete, the effect was practically the same, for every person desiring to purchase the lot in question had the right to assume, and would assume, that the wall would be completed, and as a matter of fact it was completed. The appellee being the owner of the lots when thus injured, we think he was entitled to recover such damages as his property sustained. Appellant next complains of the instructions given by the court. In order to find for appellee, the jury were told in effect that they must believe that the lots were damaged or impaired in their market value by the construction of said wall or the operation of trains thereon, by reason of obstructions to the view or to the ingress and egress to and from the same; that as to the lot that was sold after the completion of the wall, the measure of damage was the difference in the market value of the property just before it became generally known that the work would be done, and its market value just after the work was done; while in the case of the lots that were sold during the construction of the wall, the measure of damage was the difference in the market value before it became generally known that the work would be done, and the market value at the date of the sale of the property. This instruction, we think, is in accord with the rule laid down in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cumnock (1903) 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1330, 77 S. W. 933, and Henderson v. Crowder (1906) 28 Ky. L. Rep. 1255, 91 S. W. 1120, the only difference being that the instruction was changed so as to conform to the facts of this case. The next question is: When did the Statute of Limitations begin to run? The work was begun in April, 1901. A portion of it had been finished at the time of the sale of the first two lots. The wall was completed at the time of the sale of the third lot. The law is well settled that, where an injury to real estate results from the construction of a permanent structure, the cause of action accrues upon the completion of the structure. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Orr (1891) 91 Ky. 109, 15 S. W. 8; Hay v. Lexington (1908) 114 Ky. 665, 71 S. W. 867; Johnson v. Owensboro & N. R. Co. (1896) 18 Ky. L. Rep. 276, 36 S. W. 8; Oliver v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1903) 25 Ky. L. Rep. 235, 74 S. W. 1078. It may be contended, however, that as the cause of action does not accrue until after the completion of the permanent structure, and that as appellee sold two lots before the structure was complete, he thereby parted with his right of action. But this is not the case, for the purchaser did not purchase the right of action unless he paid what the land was worth before it became generally known that the structure would be erected. By buying the property at a reduced price because of the permanent injury, he left the right of action in him who owned the property when the injury to all intents and purposes was done. To hold otherwise would be to deprive the seller of a right of action for damages which he alone sustained, and to transfer the right of action to another who in fact suffered no damage. Of this rule the party causing the damage cannot complain, for he responds but once for all damages resulting from the construction of the elevated tracks and the lawful operation of the trains thereon."

So, in Heard v. Middlesex Canal (1842) 5 Met. (Mass.) 81, supra, where the action was under a statute giving a right of recovery for land flooded by a dam, similar to compensation for land taken by eminent domain, and the question was whether the action had been brought within one year after "the damage was done," the court said: "Upon this question, the court are of opinion that the application for damages, and the legal proceedings consequent thereon, must be commenced within one year from the time of the damage done, and that, within the meaning and true construction of this act, the damage is done to the proprietor of adjacent meadows, whose land will be flowed, when the permanent dam is erected, the natural and necessary effect and operation, as well as the obvious and avowed purpose, of which are, to raise a head of water for the permanent supply of a canal. This conclusion, we think, results as well from the terms, as from the manifest objects and policy of the act."

In St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Stephenson (1914) 43 Okla. 676, L.R.A.1916E, 966, 144 Pac. 387, supra, damages were claimed for injury to plaintiff's farm land and crops, caused by obstructing the flow of surface water therefrom by the defendant constructing a railroad embankment before plaintiff secured title to the land, the embankment having no culvert. It was held that the right of action arose when the embankment was constructed, for the reason that it was obvious that the embankment would stop the free flow of the water from the time that it was constructed, and plaintiff must have considered that issue when buying the land. The court said: "It will be observed that the petition alleges, and the uncontroverted testimony shows, that the only damage to the land of the plaintiff was occasioned by the act of the defendant in constructing the embankment and failing to provide proper and sufficient culverts to enable the surface water to run off as it had done before the construction of the embankment. There is neither allegation nor proof that plaintiff suffered damage by reason of the use and maintenance of the embankment by defendant, nor is it alleged or attempted to be shown by the evidence that said embankment was carelessly or negligently constructed or maintained. While the rule is well established that there may be as many successive recoveries as there are successive injuries caused by a permanent structure, when its construction and continuance are not in themselves necessarily injurious, yet, where the pleadings and evidence, as in the instant case, show conclusively that the permanent character of a railroad embankment, and its continuance as originally constructed, necessarily produced the injury to the freehold and caused the depreciation in the value thereof complained of at the time of construction, and that such injury had wholly occurred when plaintiff acquired the land, it must be held that she took it in its then known condition; and the issuance of a patent conveying to her such land did not confer upon her a right of action for the recovery of damages for injuries thereto, occurring prior to her acquisition of title."

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Anderson (1896) 62 Ark. 360, 35 S. W. 791, citing St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Morris (1880) 35 Ark. 622, and Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Chapman (1882) 39 Ark. 463, 43 Am. Rep. 280, it was held that where a railroad embankment was constructed solidly across a drain, causing damage to the land drained, so that the result was obvious and the damage capable of being estimated, the right of action arose when the embankment was constructed, that there could be but one recovery, and that the measure of damage would be the difference between the value of the land "as it would have been with the ditch open, and its value with the ditch closed." HENRY D. QUINBY, Individually and as Comptroller of the City of Rochester, et al., Appts.,

v.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION of the State of New York for the Second District et al., Respts.

(223 N. Y. 244, P.U.R.1918D, 30, 119 N. E. 433.)

Public Service Commission — alteration of contract rates.

1. Power conferred upon a Public Service Commission to regulate rates fixed by statute does not include power to regulate those fixed by contract between a municipal corporation and a street railway occupying its streets, as embodied in the railway company's franchise, which, under the Constitution, can be granted only on consent of the local authorities.

Prohibition — preventing action of Public Service Commission.

2. Prohibition will not lie to prevent action of the Public Service Commission in undertaking to change the fare fixed for a street car company by a franchise ordinance, if the Commission has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the only question is that of power to grant the particular relief prayed for.

Public Service Commission — power to increase rate.

3. A Public Service Commission has power to deal with the regulation of rates of fare charged by railroad companies, without limitation or restriction, and may increase as well as decrease such rates.

4. A provision in a city charter fixing the maximum rate to be charged by street railways operating within the city limits does not prevent an increase of fare by the Public Service Commission, which is granted authority, when it finds a maximum rate insufficient, to determine and fix a just rate, where the general railroad law fixes a maximum rate for street railways, but reserves the right to regulate the rates of any road operated under its provisions.

Contract — rates of street car company — power of municipality.

5. Power in a municipal corporation irrevocably to establish rates for a street car company is not essential to its consent to the use of its streets by the company and will not be implied, but the legislature is at all times supreme in the matter.

[See 19 R. C. L. 1159.]

Prohibition — when lies.

6. Prohibition is the proper remedy to prevent action by a Public Service Commission in matters over which it has no jurisdiction.

(Hiscock, Ch. J., and Collin, J., dissent.)

APPEAL by applicants from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming an order of a Special Term for Rensselaer County, denying an application for an alternative writ of prohibition to restrain the respondent Commission from proceeding upon a petition of the respondent railway for permission to increase its rate of fare to 6 cents. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. B. B. Cunningham, for appellants:

The legislature by a special act, passed after the Public Service Commissions Law, has definitely and conclusively fixed the rate of fare in the city of Rochester at 5 cents.

Willis v. Rochester, 219 N. Y. 427, 114 N. E. 851; People ex rel. Woodward v. Draper, 142 App. Div. 102, 127 N. Y. Supp. 14, affirmed in 202 N. Y. 612, 96 N. E. 1128; Young v. Dake, 5 N. Y. 463, 55 Am. Dec. 356; McDermott v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 85 Hun, 422, 32 N. Y. Supp. 884, affirmed in 147 N. Y. 700, 42 N. E. 724; People ex rel. Heinrich v. Travis, 175 App. Div. 721, 161 N. Y. Supp. 860; Excelsior Petroleum Co. v. Lacey, 63 N. Y. 422; Admiral Realty Co. v. New York, 206 N. Y. 110, 99 N. E. 241, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1054; Brooklyn Union Gas Co. v. New York, 188 N. Y. 334, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 763, 117 Am. St. Rep. 868, 81 N. E. 141; Richman v. Consolidated Gas Co. 114 App. Div. 216, 100 N. Y. Supp. 81, affirmed in 186 N. Y. 209, 78 N. E. 871; Pond v. New Rochelle Water Co. 183 N. Y. 330, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 958, 76 N. E. 211, 5 Ann. Cas. 504; Farnsworth v. Boro Oil & Gas Co. 216 N. Y. 40, 109 N. E. 860; Columbus v. Mercantile Trust & D. Co. 218 U. S. 645, 54 L. ed. 1193, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 105.

The railway company has agreed with the city of Rochester to limit to 5 cents its rate of fare within the city limits, and as a consideration therefor the city, under its constitutional powers, has granted consent to the street railway company to construct and operate its street railway lines.

Kittinger v. Buffalo Traction Co. 160 N. Y. 377, 54 N. E. 1081; People ex rel. West Side Street R. Co. v. Barnard, 110 N. Y. 548, 18 N. E. 354; Willcox v. Richmond Light & R. Co. 142 App. Div. 44, 128 N. Y. Supp. 266, affirmed in 202 N. Y. 515, 95 N. E. 1141; Public Service Commission v. Westchester Street R. Co. 206 N. Y. 209, 99 N. E. 536; Willis v. Rochester, 219 N. Y. 427, 114 N. E. 851; Allegheny v. Millville, B. & S. Street R. R. Co. 213 Pa. 544, 62 Atl. 1075.

The street railway company is estopped from attacking the rate as unreasonable.

Pond v. New Rochelle Water Co. 183 N. Y. 330, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 958, 76 N. E. 211, 5 Ann. Cas. 504; Farnsworth v. Boro Oil & Gas Co. 216 N. Y. 40, 109 N. E. 860.

The legislature, in granting power to the Public Service Commission to increase rates of fare, did not intend that such power should apply to rates fixed by contract or in franchises.

Mr. Ledyard P. Hale for respondent Public Service Commission.

Mr. Daniel M. Beach, with Messrs. Kernan & Kernan, for respondent rail-ways:

The power to regulate the rate of fare of a railroad corporation, whether by increasing or reducing the same, is at all times reserved to the state, and, in its discretion, the power may be de-veloped by the legislature upon a proper body organized and formed for such purpose.

the second district clearly has general jurisdiction of all street railroads within that district, including the railroad here in question, and general jurisdiction of the subject-matter here involved.

The Public Service Commission has no power, in the absence of the city's consent, or modification of the franchise contract, to make effective a fare in excess of that by which the company agreed, at the city's option, to remain bound, as one of the terms and part of the consideration which led the city to grant its consent to the construction of a street railroad along city streets; and the company should be left to reapply to the city for a modification of the franchise contract on suitable terms, if the Commission and the company feel that a higher rate of fare is necessary.

The special act annexing certain territory to the city of Rochester did not repeal the general law which reserves to the legislature and to the Public Service Commission the power to regulate fares, and did not oust the Commission for the second district from any jurisdiction or power it would otherwise have as to fares on street railroads in Rochester.

Pound, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts upon which the application for a writ of prohibition is based are as follows: The New York State Railways presented a petition to the Public Service Commission of the second district, praying that it be permitted to raise to 6 cents its rate of fare on street surface railways in the city of Rochester and a number of other cities. The city of Rochester filed objections to the jurisdiction of the Public Service Commission to entertain such application. Its objections were based, first, on chapter 359, Laws of 1915, amending the charter of the city of Rochester, and fixing a 5-cent rate for one ride over the road of any corporation operating a street surface railroad in such city; and, secondly, upon the like terms and conditions contained in the franchise of the street railroad company as a condition of the consent of the local authorities thereto. Briefs were filed with the Commission on behalf of the city of Rochester, in support of its claim that the Public Service Commission was without jurisdiction to entertain said petition of the New York State Railways, and oral argument was also made before the Commission by the corporation counsel of the city.

In November, 1917, the Public Service Commission made a decision in one of the cases (Re Huntington R. Co. 14 N. Y. Off. Dept. R. 305, P.U.R.1918A, 249; Re New York & N. S. Traction Co. 15 N. Y. Off. Dept. R. 70, P.U.R.1918A, 893), in which a petition for permission to increase rate of fare was presented to it, and held that the Commission had the power to permit fares to be increased to an amount beyond 5 cents, notwithstanding the provision of § 181 of the Railroad Law, and also that it had power to permit fares to be increased beyond the rate fixed in a franchise granted by a municipality to a street railway company, and beyond the rate fixed in a contract existing between a municipality and a street railway company. After such decision the Public Service Commission decided to hear the Rochester case on the merits. The Public Service Commission has thus assumed jurisdiction of the matter of the application of the New York State Railways for permission to increase its rate of fare in the city of Rochester to 6 cents.

In order to present the case before the Public Service Commission it would be necessary for the city to have a valuation made of the property of the New York State Railways, and it would cost the city of Rochester not less than $25,000 to present its evidence before the Commission.

A writ of prohibition will not lie in anticipation of the action of the Commission if the Commission has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the only question is that of power to grant the particular relief prayed for. It is an extraordinary remedy for unusual cases. People ex rel. Karr v. Seward, 7 Wend. 518; People ex rel. Bean v. Russell, 49 Barb. 351; People ex rel. Ballin v. Smith, 184 N. Y. 96, 76 N. E. 925; People ex rel. Patrick v. Fitzgerald, 73 App. Div. 339, 76 N. E. 865; People ex rel. Oakley v. Petty, 32 Hun, 443. In Metz v. Maddox, 189 N. Y. 460, 121 Am. St. Rep. 90, 82 N. E. 507, the sole question before this court was the constitutionality of chapter 538, Laws of 1907, providing for a recount of ballots cast in the McClellan-Hearst mayoralty contest of the year 1905, and the suitability of the procedure was not passed upon. The point that prohibition is not the proper remedy here is raised only by the intervening Public Service Commission of the first district, and the real parties are content to have this appeal disposed of on the merits.

We are therefore led to the inquiry, What is the jurisdiction of the Commission over rate regulation? The New York State Railways operates in the second public service district, which comprises all counties except those in Greater New York. Public Service Commissions Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 48), § 3. It is a street railroad corporation, within the meaning of that term as used in the Public Service Commissions Law (Public Service Commissions Law, § 2, subd. 7). The term "common carrier" includes street railroad corporations. Public Service Commissions Law, § 2, subd. 9. Section 5 of the Public Service Commissions Law, after providing that the Public Service Commission for the first district (Greater New York) shall have jurisdiction over common carriers operating within that district, provides as follows (Public Service Commissions Law, § 5, subd. 3): "3. All jurisdiction, supervision, powers and duties under this chapter not specifically granted to the Public Service Commission of the first district shall be vested in, and be exercised by, the Public Service Commission of the second district, including the regulation and control of all transportation of persons or property, and the instrumentalities connected with such transportation, on any railroad other than a street railroad from a point within either district to a point within the other district."

Section 181 of the Railroad Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 49 [Laws 1910, chap. 481]), so far as material here, is as follows: "No corporation constructing and operating a railroad under the provisions of this article, or of chapter two hundred and fifty-two of the laws of eighteen hundred and eighty-four, shall charge any passenger more than five cents for one continuous ride from any point on its road, or on any road, line or branch operated by it, or under its control, to any other point thereof, or any connecting branch thereof, within the limits of any incorporated city or village.

"... The legislature expressly reserves the right to regulate and reduce the rate of fare on any railroad constructed and operated wholly or in part under such chapter or under the provisions of this article; and the Public Service Commission shall possess the same power, to be exercised as prescribed in the Public Service Commissions Law."

Subdivision 1 of § 49 of the Public Service Commissions Law, as amended by Laws 1911, chap. 546, is in part as follows: "§ 49. Rates and Service to be Fixed by the Commission. 1. Whenever either Commission shall be of opinion, after a hearing had upon its own motion or upon a complaint, that the rates, fares or charges demanded, exacted, charged or collected by any common carrier, railroad corporation or street railroad corporation subject to its jurisdiction for the transportation of persons or property within the state, or that the regulations or practices of such common carrier, railroad corporation or street railroad corporation affecting such rates are unjust, unreasonable, unjustly discriminatory or unduly preferential, or in any wise in violation of any provision of law, or that the maximum rates, fares or charges, chargeable by any such common carrier, railroad or street railroad corporation are insufficient to yield reasonable compensation for the service rendered, and are unjust and unreasonable, the Commission shall with due regard among other things to a reasonable average return upon the value of the property actually used in the public service and to the necessity of making reservation out of income for surplus and contingencies, determine the just and reasonable rates, fares and charges to be thereafter observed and in force as the maximum to be charged for the service to be performed, notwithstanding that a higher rate, fare or charge has been heretofore authorized by statute, and shall fix the same by order to be served upon all common carriers, railroad corporations or street railroad corporations by whom such rates, fares and charges are thereafter to be observed."

It is clear that the New York State Railways, which operates in the city of Rochester and other cities of the state of New York outside the first district, is within the jurisdiction of the Public Service Commission for the second district, and that such Commission possesses some general jurisdiction to deal with the subject of regulating the rate of fare to be charged by the street railroads in the second district.

We must next consider whether this jurisdiction is limited.

1. By the charter amendment (Laws 1915, chap. 359, § 7), fixing a 5-cent fare in the city of Rochester, which reads as follows: "A corporation operating a street surface railroad must not charge any passenger more than 5 cents for one continuous ride from any point on its road to any other point thereon, within the limits of the city of Rochester. In case two corporations operate separate street surface railroads which connect or intersect in the city of Rochester, such corporations must not charge any passenger more than 5 cents for one continuous ride from any point on one road to any point on the other road, within the limits of the city of Rochester. In either of the above cases a transfer must be issued to a passenger when necessary for such passenger to transfer from one car to another, in order to complete one continuous ride. If two corporations affected by the provisions hereof cannot agree as to the method of division between them of fares collected, such method of division must be settled by the Public Service Commission of the second district of the state of New York. The word 'road' as used in this section includes all street surface railroads, lines and branches operated by one corporation, those leased by it and those under its control."

The policy of the state is said to be that the Public Service Commission should deal with the regulation of rates of fare charged by railroad corporations without limitation or restraint, and with the power to increase as well as decrease such rates. People ex rel. New York & N. S. Traction Co. v. Public Service Commission, 175 App. Div. 869, 162 N. Y. Supp. 405; People ex rel. Ulster & D. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, 171 App. Div. 607, 611, P.U.R.1916E, 243, 156 N. Y. Supp. 1065, affirmed in 218 N. Y. 643, 112 N. E. 1071.

The case last cited had to do exclusively with statutory mileage book rates, and it has not been held by this court that the Commission has power to raise ordinary rates of fare above the rate fixed by statute. The point was expressly saved for future consideration. "We are now simply dealing with the question of reduced rates to which those words [notwithstanding that a higher rate, fare, or charge had been heretofore authorized by statute] clearly do not apply," said Cochrane, J., in People ex rel. Ulster & D. R. Co. Case, supra, and his opinion was adopted by this court. But he also said that maximum statutory charges were to be considered, and raised if insufficient; and the only reasonable construction of § 49, subd. 1, is that, when the maximum

sation for the service rendered, the Commission may raise the rate. The words, "notwithstanding that a higher rate, charge, or fare has heretofore been authorized by statute," are not entirely apt; but the section, read as a whole, is susceptible of no other natural interpretation than that the legislature has, for greater certainty, expressly included in its general delegation of powers the power of the Commission to reduce a maximum rate fixed by the legislature. The purpose of the legislature was to provide for the regulation of statutory fares by a board which may be expected to pass equitably upon conflicting claims, with its single purpose the common good, even where a maximum rate had been fixed by the legislature.

The case of Willis v. Rochester, 219 N. Y. 427, 114 N. E. 851, merely upheld the charter amendment as a constitutional exercise of the legislative power to fix rates. Rates so fixed by special statute are still subject to regulation by the Public Service Commission. The jurisdiction of that body over such rates is not to be reduced by implication. The legislature merely fixed the rate pro tempore.

We have still to consider whether jurisdiction is limited.

2. By the fact that the consent of the local authorities was given on condition as to rates of fare.

The Constitution, art. 3, § 18, as it was amended in the year 1875, provides: "But no law shall authorize the construction or operation of a street railroad except upon the condition that the consent of the owners of one half in value of the property bounded on, and the consent also of the local authorities having the control of, that portion of a street or highway upon which it is proposed to construct or operate such railroad be first obtained, or in case the consent of such property owners cannot be obtained, the appellate division of the supreme court, in the department in which it is proposed to be constructed, may, upon application, appoint three commissioners who shall determine, after a hearing of all parties interested, whether such railroad ought to be constructed or operated, and their determination, confirmed by the court, may be taken in lieu of the consent of the property owners."

The power of the local authorities to impose, as a condition to giving consent to the construction and operation of a street railroad, that a stipulated rate of fare should be charged, has been repeatedly upheld. People ex rel. West Side Street R. Co. v. Barnard, 110 N. Y. 548, 18 N. E. 354; Kittinger v. Buffalo Traction Co. 160 N. Y. 377, 391, 392, 54 N. E. 1081; Public Service Commission v. Westchester Street R. Co. 206 N. Y. 209, 99 N. E. 536; People ex rel. Frontier Electric R. Co. v. North Tonawanda, 70 Misc. 91, 126 N. Y. Supp. 186; Allegheny v. Millville, E. & S. Street R. Co. 159 Pa. 411, 28 Atl. 202. But these cases dealt with the question of local power over the corporation, and not with the question of general legislative power over the municipality. The question presented is this: The consent of the local authorities being obtained, what jurisdiction has the legislature conferred upon the Public Service Commission to regulate rates by increasing the rate agreed upon without such consent? Again, it is urged that its jurisdiction is plenary; that "a municipal corporation is simply a political subdivision of the state, and exists by virtue of the exercise of the power of the state through its legislative department; . . . the city is the creature of the state"

(Worcester v. Worcester Consol. Street R. Co. 196 U. S. 539, 548, 49 L. ed. 591, 595, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 327, 329); that rate regulation is a matter of the police power of the state, and therefore contracts may be affected by its exercise without impairing their obligation (Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Mottley, 219 U. S. 467, 485, 55 L. ed. 297, 304, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 671, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 265; Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Miller, 221 U. S. 408, 414, 55 L. ed. 789, 795, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 534; Buffalo East Side R. Co. v. Buffalo Street R. Co. 111 N. Y. 132, 2 L.R.A. 284, 19 N. E. 63); that the power to regulate rates has not been irrevocably surrendered to the local authorities by the constitutional requirement that the consent of such authorities is requisite; that no immunity from the exercise of governmental power has been transferred to the municipalities, save only that their naked consent is requisite; that if conditions may validly be imposed upon such consent by the localities in the beginning, they are subject to alteration or repeal at the legislative will; that, as the state cannot be fully sovereign without full legislative power, such power is not deemed to be abridged (Rochester v. Rochester R. Co. 182 N. Y. 99, 70 L.R.A. 773, 74 N. E. 953, affirmed in 205 U. S. 236, 51 L. ed. 784, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 469; Portland R. Light & P. Co. v. Portland (D. C.) 201 Fed. 119, 125). It has been held that the legislature may, by virtue of its general power over municipalities, regulate the mode and manner in which the consent of the local authorities to the construction and operation of street railroads shall be given, and may regulate and limit by statute the conditions upon which it may be given. Re Thirty-fourth Street R. Co. 102 N. Y. 343, 7 N. E. 172; Beekman v. Third Ave. R. Co. 153 N. Y. 144, 152, 47 N. E. 277; People ex rel. South Shore Traction Co. v. Willcox, 196 N. Y. 212, 89 N. E. 459. Regulations are so made in certain cases by the Railroad Law, § 173, but that section expressly provides that nothing therein contained shall be construed as modifying or affecting the terms of the contract between the city of Rochester and the street railroad, and it looks to the future and does not attempt to regulate consents already granted. The Constitution does not expressly provide that the municipality may irrevocably establish rates for the entire period of a franchise, and it has been held invariably and in a legion of cases that such power to establish rates is not essential to the consent of local authorities, and will not be implied, and that the legislature is at all times supreme in the matter. Home Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Los Angeles, 211 U. S. 265, 53 L. ed. 176, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50; Board of Survey v. Bay State Street R. Co. 224 Mass. 463, 113 N. E. 273; State ex rel. Webster v. Superior Ct. 67 Wash. 37, L.R.A.1915C, 287, 120 Pac. 861, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 78; State ex rel. Missouri Southern R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, 259 Mo. 704, 168 S. W. 1156; Manitowoc v. Manitowoc & N. Traction Co. 145 Wis. 13, 140 Am. St. Rep. 1056, 129 N. W. 925; Dawson v. Dawson Teleph. Co. 137 Ga. 62, 72 S. E. 508; Woodburn v. Public Service Commission, 82 Or. 114, L.R.A.1917C, 98, P.U.R.1917B, 967, 161 Pac. 391, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 996; Collingswood Sewerage Co. v. Collingswood, — N. J. L. —, P.U.R.1918C, 261, 102 Atl. 901. In all such cases, the question was one of unrestricted legislative power, policy, and discretion over a city or town, where the local authorities were held to be mere instrumentalities through which the state exercised its sovereign power. The paramount power of the legislature over the subject of fares was upheld in the absence of a constitutional limitation. But our Constitution, by requiring the consent of the local authorities, recognizes that our municipalities are, pro tanto, independent of legislative control, exercising some fragment of power, otherwise legislative in character, which has been thus irrevocably transferred by the fundamental law from the legislature to the locality. The grant by the municipality of authority to use the streets is not a mere privilege or gratuity. Once accepted, it becomes a contract, which neither the state nor its agencies can impair. People v. O'Brien, 111 N. Y. 1, 2 L.R.A. 255, 7 Am. St. Rep. 684, 18 N. E. 692. And it is urged by the appellant that the franchise and the conditions upon which the consent of the local authorities are obtained are inseparable; that the very right of the railroad to operate depends upon its compliance with the obligation to keep such conditions (New York Electric Lines Co. v. Empire City Subway Co. 201 N. Y. 321, 329, 94 N. E. 1056, affirmed in 235 U. S. 179, 59 L. ed. 184, L.R.A. 1918E, 874, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 72, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 906); that it would be a vain thing if the consent were placed under the protection of the Constitution, and the conditions which induced such consent were immediately subject to extinguishment by the legislature, for that would mock the very purpose of the constitutional provision, and permit almost any interference by the legislature; that the local authorities in this matter are supreme over the Public Service Commission by virtue of the Constitution; that the obligation of a street surface railroad to carry passengers for an agreed fare may, in a constitutional sense, be neither a contract nor private property, but it is imposed by virtue of a delegated power, delegated by the people—not by the legislature—to the local authorities, and is thus beyond legislative recall; that, when any right is expressly protected by the Constitution, the police power may not be exercised to impair its validity (People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 389, 400, 4 Am. St. Rep. 465, 17 N. E. 343); and that the Public Service Commission, therefore, has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of rate regulations in the city of Rochester, because the legislature has no power to alter the rates fixed by consent of the company and the local authorities.

It is, however, unnecessary, and therefore improper, to decide at this time what the limits of legislative power are in this connection. The delegation of legislative power to commissions and other administrative officers and boards need not be assumed, if the general words from which such delegation may be inferred are not reasonably so construed.

In the absence of clear and definite language, conferring, without ambiguity, jurisdiction upon the Public Service Commission to increase rates of fare agreed upon by the street railroad and the local authorities, we should not unnecessarily hold that the legislature has intended to delegate any of its powers in the matter, whatever its powers may be. The Public Service Commissions Law (§§ 26, 49, subd. 1) and the Railroad Law (§ 181) deal with maximum rates of fare established by statute, but make no reference, in terms, to rates established by agreement with local authorities.

In regulating rates three courses were open to the legislature: (1) To prescribe rates itself; (2) to delegate the power to the Commission; (3) to leave the matter to agreement between the street railroad company and the local authorities. It has constitutionally conferred on the Public Service Commission certain functions (Saratoga Springs v. Saratoga Gas, E. L. & P. Co. 191 N. Y. 123, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 713, 83 N. E. 693, 14 Ann. Cas. 606), which plainly include the power to regulate rates fixed by statute; and while it may be said that it has undertaken to delegate to the Public Service Commission the same power that it has to regulate rates of fare (Railroad Law, § 181), it is impossible to find a word in the statutes which discloses the legislative intent to deal with the matter of rates fixed by agreement with local authorities. As it has often been held, in connections other than that of legislative power over them, that such agreements are valid, it may well be inferred that the legislature excluded them from consideration by failure to mention them, and that it has made no attempt to turn them over to the Public Service Commission for revision. Statutes should be read according to the natural and most obvious import of the language, without resorting to artificial or forced constructions, for the purpose of either limiting or extending their operation." Re New York & B. Bridge, 72 N. Y. 527, 529; Heerwagen v. Crosstown Street R. Co. 179 N. Y. 99, 71 N. E. 729. "A thing which is within the letter of the statute is not within the statute unless it be within the intention of the makers." Riggs v. Palmer, 115 N. Y. 506, 509, 5 L.R.A. 340, 12 Am. St. Rep. 819, 22 N. E. 188, 189; McDowall v. Sheehan, 129 N. Y. 200, 206, 29 N. E. 299. The authority of the Commission to regulate rates in such cases, and thus to extinguish an undoubted power of the local authorities, should fairly appear before it is assumed to exist.

It follows that the Public Service Commission is without jurisdiction; that prohibition is the proper remedy; that the order appealed from should be reversed; and that an absolute writ of prohibition be awarded to relators, with costs to appellants in all courts.

I concur. I am of the opinion that the reserve police power of the legislature has not been contracted away. I concur in the above opinion in so far as it states that the legislature has not in this instance given to the Public Service Commission the power of regulation.

NOTE.

Whether or not public service commissions have power to increase franchise rates is discussed in an annotation to SALT LAKE CITY v. UTAH LIGHT & TRACTION Co. post, 715. As is pointed out in that annotation, the question of whether or not public service commissions have power to increase franchise rates is, in reality, twofold. That is, it must be determined whether or not the state itself has power to increase franchise rates, and if so, whether this power has been delegated to the public service commissions. The decision in QUINBY v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION, ante, 685, passes merely upon the question whether the power of the state, whatever it may be, has been delegated to the public service commissions, and this phase of the question will be found in subdivision III. on page 744, of the annotation referred to.

ERROR to the Public Utilities Commission to review its order sustaining a demurrer to a complaint filed for the investigation of rates of fare in existence on complainant's road, and for an increase thereof. Affirmed.

Statement by Johnson, J.:

Plaintiff in error filed its complaint with the Public Utilities Commission, praying that the Commission enter into an investigation of rates of fare then in existence on the road of plaintiff in error, and praying for an increase thereof.

It appears from the complaint that certain grants have been made by different subdivisions of the state through which the complainant's line runs, which have been accepted by the company. These grants provide for certain rates of fare over the line.

The city of Cincinnati, one of the parties mentioned in the complaint, filed its demurrer to the complaint on the following grounds:

"(1) That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

"(2) That the Public Utilities Commission of Ohio has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of said complaint.

"(3) That said Commission has no jurisdiction over the city of Cincinnati."

This demurrer was sustained, and the complaint dismissed. To that order of the Commission error is prosecuted to this court.

Messrs. Dinsmore & Shohl, for plaintiffs in error:

Messrs. Joseph McGhee, Attorney General, and C. A. Radcliffe for defendant in error.

Messrs. Saul Zielonka, William Jerome Kuertz, and Charles E. Weber for city of Cincinnati.

Johnson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The grant involved in this case, in so far as it relates to the city of Cincinnati and Pleasant Ridge, was under investigation by this court in Interurban R. & Terminal Co. v. Cincinnati, 93 Ohio St. 108, 112 N. E. 186. The syllabus of that case is as follows: "An ordinance passed by a village council, granting a franchise to an interurban railway company to construct its line through the village, contained the following provision: 'Should the village of Pleasant Ridge be annexed to the city of Cincinnati, the rate of fare charged for a ride in either direction between any point in said village and the Cincinnati terminus shall not exceed 5 cents.' The company thereafter duly accepted the franchise and constructed, maintained, and operated its line thereunder. Subsequently, the village was annexed to the city. Held: The acceptance of the grant by the company constituted a binding contract between the parties. As long as the company retains the franchise and operates its

road thereunder, its terms must control."

The other portions of the plaintiff in error's line were constructed, maintained, and operated under similar grants of franchises, which were accepted by the company.

The provisions of the General Code with reference to the power to fix the terms and conditions of such grants apply both to councils of municipalities and the commissioners of counties through which the lines run.

Section 3443, Revised Statutes, which was in effect at the time of the making of these grants (and which is now § 9113, General Code), provides that the "council, or the commissioners, as the case may be, may fix the terms and conditions upon which such railways may be constructed, operated, extended, and consolidated."

In the case above referred to it is said (93 Ohio St. at page 122): "It is a familiar law that, when the terms of a valid ordinance are accepted by a grantee, such action constitutes a contract, and the rights of the parties are to be determined by the terms of the contract itself. Columbus v. Columbus Street R. Co. 45 Ohio St. 98, 12 N. E. 651; Cincinnati & S. R. Co. v. Carthage, 36 Ohio St. 631; East Ohio Gas Co. v. Akron, 81 Ohio St. 33, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 92, 90 N. E. 40, 18 Ann. Cas. 332; Cleveland v. Cleveland City R. Co. 194 U. S. 517, 48 L. ed. 1102, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 756."

"The statutes show that there was lodged by the legislature of Ohio in the municipal council of Cleveland comprehensive power to contract with street railway companies in respect to the terms and conditions upon which such roads might be constructed, operated, extended, and consolidated; the only limitation upon the power being that in case of an extension or consolidation no increase in the rate of fare should be allowed.

"That in passing ordinances, based upon the grant of power referred to, the municipal council of Cleveland was exercising a portion of the authority of the state, as an agency of the state, cannot in reason be disputed. If, therefore, the ordinances passed after August, 1879, and referred to previously, which ordinances were accepted by the predecessors of the complainant, with whom it is in privity, constituted contracts in respect to the rates of fare to be thereafter charged upon the consolidated and extended lines (affected by the ordinances) as an entirety, it necessarily follows that the ordinance of October, 1898, impaired these contracts.

"The question for decision then is: Did the consolidated ordinance of February, 1885, and the ordinances thereafter passed and accepted, already referred to, constitute binding contracts in respect to the rates of fare to be thereafter exacted upon the consolidated and extended lines of the complainant?

"That in the courts of Ohio the acceptance of an ordinance of the character of those just referred to is deemed to create a binding contract is settled. Cincinnati & S. R. Co. v. Carthage, 36 Ohio St. 631, 634; Columbus v. Columbus Street R. Co. 45 Ohio St. 98, 12 N. E. 651. But let us consider the question without treating the Ohio decisions as conclusive."

The Federal Supreme Court then proceeds, in keeping with its rule, to determine for itself the existence or nonexistence of the asserted contract, and whether its obligation had been impaired. After this independent inquiry, the court arrived at the conclusion that there was a binding contract.

In this proceeding, the Public Utilities Commission is a party. Plaintiff in error rests on the proposition that authority has been conferred upon the Commission to fix the rates to be charged by the complainant, notwithstanding, and in disregard of, the contract. It is contended that this may be done in the exercise of the police power of the state.

Many authorities are cited in support of the proposition, which is familiar and well settled, that the state itself cannot, by contract, deprive itself of the proper exercise of the police power.

Its elastic and undefined nature is everywhere recognized, as well as the limitations upon its exercise as against rights guaranteed and protected by the Constitution.

In Walla Walla v. Walla Walla Water Co. 172 U. S. 1, 43 L. ed. 341, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 77, the grant of the right to supply water to a municipality and its inhabitants through pipes and mains laid in the streets, upon the conditions named in the grant, was held to be a contract protected by the Federal Constitution against state legislation to impair it. In the opinion it is said (172 U. S. at page 15):

"The argument that the contract is void as an attempt to barter away the legislative power of the city council rests upon the assumption that contracts for supplying a city with water are within the police power of the city, and may be controlled, managed, or abrogated at the pleasure of the council. This court has doubtless held that the police power is one which remains constantly under the control of the legislative authority, and that a city council can neither bind itself, nor its successors, to contracts prejudicial to the peace, good order, health, or morals of its inhabitants; but it is to cases of this class that these rulings have been confined.

"If a contract be objectionable in itself upon these grounds, or if it become so in its execution, the municipality may, in the exercise of its police power, regulate the manner in which it may be carried out, or may abrogate it entirely, upon the principle that it cannot bind itself to any course of action which shall prove deleterious to the health or morals of its inhabitants. In such case an appeal to the contract clause of the Constitution is ineffectual. Thus, in Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659, 24 L. ed. 1036, an act of the general assembly of Illinois authorized the Fertilizing Company to establish and maintain for fifty years certain chemical works for the purpose of converting dead animals into agricultural fertilizers, and to maintain depots in Chicago for the purpose of receiving and carrying out of the city dead animals and other animal matter which it might buy or own. Subsequently the charter of the village of Hyde Park was revised, and power given it to define or abate nuisances injurious to the public health. It was held that under this power the village had the right to prohibit the carrying of dead animals, or offensive matter, through the streets; that the charter of the company was a sufficient license until revoked, but was not a contract guaranteeing that the company might continue to carry on a business which had become a nuisance by the growth of population around its works, or that it should be exempt for fifty years from an exercise of the police power of the state, citing Coates v. New York, 7 Cow. 585.

"Substantially the same ruling was made in Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 111 U. S. 746, 28 L. ed. 585, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 652, wherein an act of the legislature of Louisiana, granting exclusive privileges for maintaining slaughterhouses, was held to be subject to subsequent ordinances of the city of New Orleans opening to general competition the right to build slaughterhouses.

"The same principle has been applied to charters for the maintenance of lotteries, which, upon grounds of public policy, have been held to be mere licenses, and subject to abrogation in the exercise of the police power of the government: Boyd v. Alabama, 94 U. S. 645, 24 L. ed. 302; Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S. 814, 25 L. ed. 1079; Douglas v. Kentucky, 168 U. S. 488, 42 L. ed. 553, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 199, as well as to laws regulating the liquor traffic; Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. ed. 989; Metropolitan Bd. of Excise v. Barrie, 34 N. Y. 657, and even laws regulating the inspection of coal oil; United States v. De Witt, 9 Wall. 41, 19 L. ed. 593; Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S. 501, 24 L. ed. 1115. In the latter case it was held that a person holding a patent under the laws of the United States for an invention was not protected by such patent in selling oil condemned by a state inspector as unsafe for illuminating purposes.

"Under this power and the analogous power of taxation we should have no doubt that the city council might take such measures as were necessary or prudent to secure the purity of the water furnished under the contract of the company, the payment of its just contributions to the public burdens, and the observance of its own ordinances respecting the manner in which the pipes and mains of the company should be laid through the streets of the city. New York ex rel. New York Electric Lines v. Squire, 145 U. S. 175, 36 L. ed. 666, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 880; St. Louis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 148 U. S. 92, 37 L. ed. 380, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 485; Missouri ex rel. Laclede Gaslight Co. v. Murphy, 170 U. S. 78, 42 L. ed. 955, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 505. But where a contract for a supply of water is innocuous in itself, and is carried out with due regard to the good order of the city and the health of its inhabitants, the aid of the police power cannot be invoked to abrogate or impair it."

And in Vicksburg v. Vicksburg Waterworks Co. 206 U. S. 496, 51 L. ed. 1155, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 762, it was held that a state may, in matters of proprietary rights, exclude itself, and authorize its municipal corporations to exclude themselves, from the right of regulation of such matters as water rates. At page 508 of the opinion in 206 U. S. it is said: "That a state may, in matters of proprietary rights, exclude itself from the right to make regulations of this kind, or authorize municipal corporations to do so, when the power is clearly conferred, has been too frequently declared to admit of doubt" (citing authorities).

In Home Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Los Angeles, 211 U. S. 265, at page 273, 53 L. ed. 176, 182, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50, 52, it is said: "It has been settled by this court that the state may authorize one of its municipal corporations to establish by an inviolable contract the rates to be charged by a public service corporation (or natural person) for a definite term, not grossly unreasonable in point of time, and that the effect of such a contract is to suspend, during the life of the contract, the governmental power of fixing and regulating the rates. Detroit v. Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. 184 U. S. 368, 382, 46 L. ed. 592, 605, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 410; Vicksburg v. Vicksburg Waterworks Co. 206 U. S. 496, 508, 51 L. ed. 1155, 1160, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 762. But for the very reason that such a contract has the effect of extinguishing, pro tanto, an undoubted power of government, both its existence and the authority to make it must clearly and unmistakably appear, and all doubts must be resolved in favor of the continuance of the power."

Plaintiff in error cites State ex rel. Webster v. Superior Ct. 67 Wash. 37, L.R.A. 1915C, 287, 120 Pac. 861, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 78, and Puget Sound Traction Co. v. Reynolds, 244 U. S. 574, 61 L. ed. 1825, P.U.R.1917F, 57, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 705, in support of its view. Both cases arose in the state of Washington. In the Puget Sound Traction Case the Federal Supreme Court shows that the Constitution of Washington specifically limits the powers of cities touching the subjects here involved. Mr. Justice

Pitney says (244 U. S. at page 579): "The Constitution of Washington (article 12, § 18) requires the legislature to pass laws establishing reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight, and to correct abuses and prevent discrimination in rates by railroads and other common carriers, and provides that 'a railroad and transportation commission may be established, and its powers and duties fully defined by law.' By article 11, § 10, any city containing a population of 20,000 inhabitants or more is permitted to frame a charter for its own government, 'consistent with and subject to the Constitution and laws of this state.' This Constitution was adopted in 1889, long previous to the date of the earliest of plaintiff's franchise ordinances. The supreme court of Washington has held that the provisions of municipal charters are subject to the legislative authority of the state, that the Public Utilities Act superseded any conflicting ordinance or charter provision of any city, and that contractual provisions in franchises conferred by municipal corporations without express legislative authority are subject to be set aside by the exercise of the sovereign power of the state. Ewing v. Seattle, 55 Wash. 229, 104 Pac. 259; State ex rel. Webster v. Superior Ct. 67 Wash. 37, 43-50, L.R.A. 1915C, 287, 120 Pac. 861, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 78."

It will be observed that the Constitution of the state of Washington itself determined the question, and that the Ohio Constitution contains no such provisions.

The Federal Supreme Court points out that the Washington cases are very clearly distinguishable from another recent case, Detroit United R. Co. v. Michigan, 242 U. S. 238, 248, 61 L. ed. 268, 273, P.U.R.1917B, 1010, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 87. In that case franchises for city lines had been given by ordinances of Detroit. Franchises for suburban lines had been given by village and township ordinances, which fixed the fares on a basis more favorable to grantees. Thereafter the limits of the city were extended, so as to embrace parts of the outlying railways. The state courts held that the outlying lines, which were embraced within the extended limits, came also within the fares fixed by the city ordinances. At page 253 of 242 U. S., the Federal Supreme Court says: "Because of the provision of § 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, it was not within the power of the state of Michigan by any subsequent legislation to impair the obligations of those contracts, and since the judgments of the supreme court of that state gave such an effect to the Annexation Acts of 1905 and 1907, in conjunction with the ordinances of 1889, as to impair those obligations, the judgments must be reversed."

The two recent cases from the United States Supreme Court, just cited, fairly comprehend and dispose of the questions here suggested.

The contract in this case is of harmless character, "innocuous in itself," and is entitled to the constitutional protection.

As we have seen, it has been conclusively determined that in Ohio full authority had been conferred for the making of the contract. In addition to this the people, by an amendment to the Constitution, have invested the municipalities of the state with plenary power to deal with the subject by binding contracts. Section 4 of article 18 provides that "any municipality may acquire, construct, own, lease and operate within or without its corporate limits, any public utility the product or service of which is or is to be supplied to the municipality or its inhabitants, and may contract with others for any such product or service."

Therefore the municipality does not now get its authority from the legislature, but from the Constitution. The legislature cannot deprive it of that power.

The constitutional provision referred to was not adopted until after the making of the contract involved in this case, and the validity of that contract is, of course, to be determined by the law in effect at the time it was made. But in as much as, under the authorities already cited, the contract was valid and binding when made, we see no Constitutional law—impairment of municipal contract. reason to deny to the municipality authority to insist upon its rights under the contract, now that its power to deal with the subject is sanctioned by the organic law.

Moreover, we are not able to find that the legislature has attempted to confer upon the Public Utilities Commission the authority to change rates fixed by contract between the company and local authorities.

It is contended that such authority has been conferred upon the Commission by §§ 524 et seq., Page & A. General Code. Section 524 provides for the filing of a complaint before the Commission of rates, fares, etc., that are alleged to be unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory. The succeeding sections provide that upon an investigation, if the rate or rates are found to be unreasonable or unjustly discriminatory, the Commission may fix, and order substituted therefor, such rate or rates as it shall have determined to be just and reasonable. There is no provision in any of these sections which expressly authorizes the Commission to change rates fixed by contract.

In the very recent case of Quinby v. Public Service Commission (decided April 5, 1918, by the court of appeals of New York) 223 N. Y. 244, ante, 685, P.U.R.1918D, 30, 119 N. E. 433, the power of the Public Utilities Commission of New York to change rates of a street railroad constructed under consent of the property owners and local authorities, where such consent was based upon a stipulated maximum fare, was attacked. Subdivision 1 of § 49 of the Public Service Commissions

Law of that state (Consol. Laws, chap. 48) provides that whenever the Commission shall be of opinion, after a hearing had upon its own motion or upon a complaint, that the rates, etc., charged for the transportation of persons or property by any common carrier, street railroad, etc., subject to its jurisdiction, are unjust, discriminatory, or unduly preferential, it may determine the just and reasonable rates and fares thereafter to be observed. The Constitution of New York (article 3, § 18) provides that "no law shall authorize the construction or operation of a street railroad except upon the condition that the consent of the owners of one half in value of the property bounded on, and the consent also of the local authorities having the control of, that portion of a street or highway upon which it is proposed to construct or operate such railroad be first obtained."

The section further provides that, if consent cannot be obtained, a proceeding may be conducted in court for the determination of the subject.

The extent of the authority of the Commission, where a railroad was operated by the consent of the local authorities, as stated, was considered in that case, and it was held in ¶ 4 of the syllabus in 119 N. E. 433, that "under Const. art. 3, § 18, providing for consent of property owners and local authorities to the construction and operation of street railroads, where such consent was based upon a stipulated maximum fare, the Public Service Commission is without jurisdiction over the subject-matter of changing such rate, and the law does not attempt to give it such authority."

It will be observed that the provisions of subdivision 1 of § 49 of the New York statute are similar to those of the Ohio statute.

The court, at page 263 of the opinion in 223 N. Y., says:

"In the absence of clear and definite language, conferring, without ambiguity, jurisdiction upon the Public Service Commission to increase rates of fare agreed upon by the street railroad and the local authorities, we should not unnecessarily hold that the legislature has intended to delegate any of its powers in the matter, whatever its powers may be. The Public Service Commissions Law (§§ 26, 49, subd. 1) and the Railroad Law (§ 181) deal with maximum rates of fare established by statute, but make no reference in terms to rates established by agreement with local authorities.

"In regulating rates three courses were open to the legislature: 1. To prescribe rates itself. 2. To delegate the power to the Commission. 3. To leave the matter to agreement between the street railroad company and the local authorities. It has constitutionally conferred on the Public Service Commission certain functions [citing authorities] which plainly include the power to regulate rates fixed by statute; and while it may be said that it has undertaken to delegate to the Public Service Commission 'the same power' that it has to regulate rates of fare (Railroad Law, § 181), it is impossible to find a word in the statutes which discloses the legislative intent to deal with the matter of rates fixed by agreement with local authorities. As it has often been held, in connections other than that of legislative power over them, that such agreements are valid, it may well be inferred that the legislature excluded them from consideration by failure to mention them, and that it has made no attempt to turn them over to the Public Service Commission for revision."

This reasoning applies with singular force to the situation in Ohio and to the question we have here.

The Public Utilities Commission of Ohio is created, and its duties defined, by statute. In the recent case of Cincinnati v. Public Utilities Commission, 96 Ohio St. 270, 117 N. E. 381, it is declared in the syllabus: "The powers of the Public Utilities Commission are conferred by statute, and it possesses no authority other than that thus vested in it."

The general assembly not having provided that the Commission may interfere with valid and binding contracts, we may well conclude that it excluded them from consideration.

Public Service Commission—power to change contract rates.

In cases such as we have here, it is a prerequisite of the grant to the company that a certain proportion of the abutting property owners shall first consent; and the statute requires that a municipality shall award the franchise to the bidder who proposes to carry passengers on the route for the lowest rate of fare, after public advertisement. The presumption is that such consents are given in consideration of the terms of the grant, to be complied with by the company, including the rate of fare agreed on. It would not only be a vain and empty arrangement, but a deceptive one, if these provisions could be disregarded, and the company nevertheless retain and exercise all of the valuable rights and privileges granted to it in consideration thereof.

The order of the Commission will be affirmed.

NOTE.

The question of the power of public service commissions to increase franchise rates is discussed in the annotation attached to SALT LAKE CITY v. UTAH LIGHT & TRACTION Co. post, 715. The decision in INTERURBAN R. & TERMINAL Co. v. PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION, ante, 704, follows the Ohio rule, which, as is shown in subdivision II. a, 5, of the annotation referred to, differs from the rule prevailing in the majority of jurisdictions, and is that the municipalities in Ohio have been delegated, by the Constitution and statutes of the state, the power to make inviolable contracts as to rates.

ERROR to the Public Utilities Commission to review its order overruling motions to dismiss the complaint and for a rehearing, in a proceeding to have a rate for gas fixed by ordinance suspended, and to fix and determine a just and reasonable rate, to be charged and collected by complainants. Reversed.

Statement by Johnson, J.:

The Union Gas & Electric Company and the Cincinnati Gas & Electric Company in September, 1917, filed their complaint with the Public Utilities Commission, in which it is set forth that the council of the city of Cincinnati on August 20, 1917, passed an ordinance regulating the price to be charged for natural gas consumed. A copy of the ordinance was attached to the complaint. The companies complained that the price fixed by the ordinance for natural gas to be furnished for a period of ten years from and after the date thereof, to the city of Cincinnati for street lighting and all other purposes, and to private consumers, at the rate of 35 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, with a discount of 5 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, making a net rate of 30 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, if paid at the office of the company within five days after the delivery of bill, is unreasonable and insufficient to yield reasonable compensation for the service, having due regard to the value thereof and of all the property of complainants actually used and useful for the convenience of the public. They state that they have not accepted the ordinance, but do consent to continue to furnish gas to the city and its inhabitants and to devote their property to such public use during the term fixed by said ordinance, or by the provisions of law. They prayed that the rate fixed by the ordinance be suspended; and the complainants, electing to charge the rate in force immediately prior to the taking effect of the ordinance, and offering to give an undertaking in such an amount as the Commission may determine, prayed further that the Commission proceed to fix and determine the just and reasonable rate to be charged and collected by the complainants.

In 1905, the city of Cincinnati passed an ordinance granting a franchise to the Cincinnati Gas & Electric Company to furnish natural gas for heat, light, and power purposes, to public and private consumers, through its system of gas mains, pipes, fixtures, and appliances in the streets and public ways of the city, and to occupy such streets and public places for the purposes stated. Paragraph 6 of the franchise ordinance contained the provision: "The grant herein made shall continue for twenty-five (25) years from and after the passage and acceptance of this ordinance, subject, however, to the right of the city to regulate the price of natural gas from time to time, as provided by law, and to purchase the plant and works of the gas company, as reserved in its contract with said city in that behalf."

The company duly accepted the franchise ordinance, and thereafter leased its plant, pipes, contracts, and franchise to the Union Gas & Electric Company, which has since been operating the same. On the 20th of August, 1917, the council of the city passed the ordinance referred to in the complaint, regulating the price to be charged for natural gas by the companies for ten years, and said ordinance was approved by the mayor on the 29th of August, 1917. Thereafter the companies filed the complaint as above stated with the Commission.

The city on the 5th of October filed its motion with the Commission to dismiss the complaint, on the ground that the Commission was without jurisdiction, for the reasons stated in the motion. This motion was overruled by the Commission, and on the application of the company it made its order directing the company to give an undertaking in the sum of $250,000, without additional surety, upon their election to charge the rate in force immediately preceding the effective date of the ordinance. Motions for rehearing having been overruled, this proceeding in error was brought to reverse the orders of the Commission.

Plaintiff in error contends that the Commission is without jurisdiction, for the reason that §§ 614-44, to and including 614-47, Page & A. General Code, are unconstitutional and void, in violation of § 1f of article 2 of the Constitution, and have been repealed by the adoption of that section and of §§ 4227-1, to and including 4227-13, General Code (§§ 4227-1 to 4227-5 amended, and §§ 4227-6 to 4227-13 added by 104 Ohio Laws, p. 238); that its order permitting an undertaking without surety is unreasonable and unlawful; and that its refusal to dismiss the petition is unlawful, because §§ 614-44 et seq., Page & A. General Code, referred to, are in violation of §§ 4 and 5, article 18 of the Constitution, and impair the obligation of a contract, in violation of § 10, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States.

Messrs. Charles A. Groom, Saul Zielonka, William Jerome Kuertz, Charles E. Weber, and Powell Croasley for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Joseph McGhee, Attorney General, C. A. Radcliffe, Lawrence Maxwell, Miller Outcalt, and Lawrence K. Langdon for defendant in error.

S. 517, 48 L. ed. 1102, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 756.

The passage of the ordinance in December, 1905, granting the right, for the term of twenty-five years, to the company to furnish gas for heating, lighting, and power purposes to public and private consumers, through its mains and appliances in the streets, and with the right to occupy the streets and public places with such appliances, and the acceptance of that ordinance by the company, constituted a valid and binding contract between the parties. The power of the city to make the grant, and its validity, are amply shown by the above-cited authorities. That contract will, by its terms, expire in 1930.

The rights of the parties "are to be determined by the contract itself."

As shown in the foregoing statement, § 6 of the contract provides that "the grant herein made shall continue for twenty-five (25) years from and after the passage and acceptance of this ordinance, subject, however, to the right of the city to regulate the price of natural gas from time to time, as provided by law."

The parties themselves stipulated that the grant to the company was dependent on and subject to that right of the city. The law then in force provided that the city might regulate the price of gas from time to time. At the time of the making of the contract in 1905, §§ 2478 and 2479, Revised Statutes, which are now §§ 3982 and 3983, General Code, were in effect. The pertinent portions of those sections are as follows:

Section 3982: "The council of a municipality in which . . . natural or artificial gas companies . . . are established . . . may regulate from time to time the price which such companies may charge for . . . gas for lighting or fuel purposes, . . . for public or private consumption, furnished by such companies. . . . Such companies shall in no event charge more for . . . natural or artificial gas . . . than the price specified by ordinance of council."

Section 3983: "If council fixes the price at which it shall require a company to furnish . . . either natural or artificial gas to the citizens, or public buildings or for the purpose of lighting the streets, . . . or for other purposes, for a period not exceeding ten years, and the company or person so to furnish such . . . gas assents thereto, by written acceptance, . . . the council shall not require such company to furnish . . . gas . . . at a less price during the period of time agreed on, not exceeding such ten years."

These statutory provisions by operation of law entered into and became part of the contract. Queen Ins. Co. v. Leslie, 47

1072; Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co. v. Russell, 65 Ohio St. 230, 255, 56 L.R.A. 159, 62 N. W. 338, 19 Cyc. 659. The obligation of a contract is measured by the standard of the laws in force at the time it was entered into, and its performance is to be regulated by the terms and rules which they prescribe. 6 R. C. L. 325.

It will be observed that, by the sections quoted, two entirely different Gas-price fixing-statute. situations are contemplated and provided for, viz:

First. By § 3982 the city is given power to regulate the price of gas from time to time.

Second. By § 3983 it is provided that if the city fixes the price of gas for a period of ten years, and the company assents thereto, the city shall not require it to furnish gas at a less price during the period agreed on, not exceeding such ten years.

In this case the parties themselves provided that the grant of the franchises and privileges to the gas company was dependent on the right of the city to regulate the price of gas from time to time, as provided by law; that is, the city could, under § 3982, at any time during the twenty-five years, the life of the franchise, fix the price generally without fixing any definite period for which the rate should be in force, or it could, under § 3983, at any time during the twenty-five years, fix a rate for a definite period not exceeding ten years, and, if the company assented thereto, the city could not reduce the price during that ten-year period. That procedure was followed in the present case. After the contract was made in 1905, the city fixed a rate for a ten-year period. This was assented to by the company, and after the expiration of that period the city, pursuant to the terms of the franchise contract, fixed a price for another ten-year period. Thereupon the gas company filed its complaint with the Public Utilities Commission. The fixing of the first ten-year rate, and its acceptance by the company, did not annul or change the franchise contract by which the grant of privileges was made to the company, nor did it exhaust the power reserved to the city to fix rates. Such action was in conformity to that contract, and carried out its express terms. To give exclusive attention to the action of the parties in fixing the rate for the first ten years of the franchise period of twenty-five years is to disregard the provisions of the agreement upon which the grant of privileges to the company is made to depend.

Section 3982, General Code, is the section which confers the regulatory powers on the city. The only place in the statute in which the words "regulate from time to time" are found is in § 3982, General Code (§ 2478, Rev. Stat.). Section 3983, General Code (§ 2479, Rev. Stat.), is not a regulatory statute. It simply limits the term for which the city can fix the rate with the assent of the company. As above shown, both sections entered into and became part of the franchise contract itself. And §§ 3982 and 3983 are entirely consistent with each other.

In State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Iron-ton Gas Co. 37 Ohio St. 45, it was decided that a provision in an ordinance fixing the price of gas for a certain period, if accepted by the gas company, precludes the city from lowering the price for the period named, but, "if not thus accepted, the power of the council to regulate the price is as ample as if the ordinance contained no such provision."

Notwithstanding this, if the city at any time should fix a rate which is so unjust or unreasonable, and beneath a proper compensatory return, as to amount to a taking of the property of the company without just compensation, it would have recourse to the courts for the protection of its rights and property. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Tucker, 230 U. S. 340, 347, 57 L. ed. 1507, 1509, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961; Newark Natural Gas & Fuel Co. v. Newark, 92 Ohio St. 393, 111 N. E. 150; Cedar Rapids Water Co. v. Cedar Rapids, 118 Iowa, 234, 91 N. W. 1081.

Suppose the company had not assented to the rate fixed by the city for the first ten-year period, in that event the power of the city would have been as ample as if no period had been fixed; and when the company did not assent to the rate fixed by the city for the second ten-year period, the power is equally ample. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Iron-ton Gas Co. supra.

In Freeport Water Co. v. Freeport City, 180 U. S. 587, 45 L. ed. 679, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493, the water company was given the exclusive right to supply the city with water for thirty years, subject to certain terms and conditions named in the ordinance, which also contained provisions for the payment of water rates by consumers. In discussing the power of the municipality to make regulations the court say at page 599 of 180 U. S.:

"An example is afforded by the Act of June 6, 1891. By that act the corporate authorities of any city which have authorized or shall authorize any individual, company, or corporation to supply water, be and are hereby empowered to prescribe by ordinance maximum rates and charges for the supply of water

furnished by such individual, company, or corporation.' . . . There is no explicit provision for repetitions of the power—none declaring the power conferred a continuing one. Who now doubts that it is? If rights were claimed and were pleading for a different interpretation, we might have to listen to them; but now, undisturbed by them, we yield without resistance to that meaning which the subject-matter demands in the absence of negating words.

"Our conclusion is that the powers conferred by the Statutes of 1872 can, without straining, be construed as distributive. The city council was authorized to contract with any person or corporation to construct and maintain waterworks 'at such rates as may be fixed by ordinance, and for a period not exceeding thirty years.' The words, 'fixed by ordinance,' may be construed to mean by ordinance once for all, to endure during the whole period of thirty years, or by ordinance from time to time as might be deemed necessary. Of the two constructions, that must be adopted which is most favorable to the public, not that one which would so tie the hands of the council that the rates could not be adjusted as justice to both parties might require at a particular time."

Some years after the making of the contract, to wit, in May, 1911, §§ 614-44 to and including 614-47, Page & A. General Code, were enacted. These sections permit an appeal to the Public Utilities Commission from ordinances of municipalities fixing rates for any commodity, utility, or service.

It is contended that, as this law was in effect in August, 1917, when the council passed the ordinance fixing the 80-cent rate, the Commission was authorized to entertain the complaint filed by the companies. The pertinent part of § 614-44, Page & A. General Code, is as follows: "Any municipal corporation in which any public utility is established, may, by ordinance, at any time within one year before the expiration of any contract entered into under the provisions of §§ 3644, 3982 and 3983 of the General Code between the municipality and such public utility with respect to the rate, . . . to be made . . . for any commodity . . . by such public utility, . . . proceed to fix the price . . . that such public utility may charge . . . for an ensuing period, as provided in §§ 3644, 3982 and 3983 of the General Code."

Then follow the provisions for the filing of a complaint with the Commission by dissatisfied parties. The ordinance complained of in this case was not passed "at any time within one year before the expiration of any contract . . . between the municipality and such public utility with respect to the rate."

We think it clear that a contract, made between a municipality and a public utility, in full compliance with express statutory provisions, before the passage of § 614-44, Page & A. General Code, is not affected by the provisions of that section, and that no steps can be taken Statute—
application. under §§ 614-44 et seq. until within one year of the expiration of the contract. A different construction would violate the express terms of the contract between the parties in 1905, in which the company agreed that the city should have the power to fix the rates. For by the provisions of §§ 614-44 et seq., it is provided that the Commission may fix the rates to be charged, on a hearing of the complaint permitted to be filed with it.

There is not only nothing in §§ 614-44 et seq. to indicate that the legislature intended to interfere with or abrogate valid contracts already in existence, but there is the express language we have quoted which demonstrates that there was no such intention. The purpose was that the new law should be put into operation as to contracts about to expire and those thereafter made.

Section 614-44 not only confers upon the public utility the right to invoke the jurisdiction of the Public Utilities Commission, when not satisfied with the price fixed by the municipality, but it also enables electors of the municipality (even if the public utility accepts the rate) to invoke the same jurisdiction, and the Commission on the hearing may lower the rate paid to the company.

The parties had the right to make the contract and to rely on the enforcement of it as they made it. Who can say that the city or the company would have entered into the contract if they had realized that a board or commission not then contemplated might, without their consent, be afterwards created, by which an essential element might be altered? As was said by Judge Spear in Wellston v. Morgan, 59 Ohio St. 147, 157, 52 N. E. 130: "The paper presented undertakes to stipulate for the furnishing of light, and an agreed price therefor, for . . . ninety-nine years. The proposition is that we now treat it as a contract for ten years; that is, that the court shall make a new contract for the parties for ten years, and then enforce it. How can we say that the company would have incurred the great expense and outlay of money and labor, which the petition declares was incurred, for the period of ten years only? And if the court were of opinion that probably the company would have been willing to so contract, where is there any authority in the court to now alter the terms that they did agree upon, and then enforce them as changed?"

In that case the court say in the syllabus: "The only semblance of a contract between the city and the electric light company was in the form of an ordinance passed by the council, which undertook to grant to the company the exclusive use of the streets for the erection of its poles, et cetera, for the period of ninety-nine years, and to bind the city to purchase light of the company during that time at a stated sum per month."

The contract of 1905, in the present case, having been entered into by the city in the exercise of contractual capacity and authority expressly conferred upon it, and having conferred upon the company valuable privileges and rights in the public streets and places of the city on the conditions named therein, is protected by the provisions of § 10, article 1, of the Federal Constitution, <sup>Constitutional law—franchise contract—impairment.</sup> that no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts. A franchise is included within the broader term "grant," and the same general principles are applicable to it in reference to the constitutional inhibition as to the impairment of the obligation of contracts. 6 R. C. L. 340; 12 C. J. 1009; Cleveland v. Cleveland City R. Co. 194 U. S. 534, 48 L. ed. 1102, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 756.

It is urged that the creation of the Public Utilities Commission is expressly authorized by § 2, article 13, of the Constitution, as adopted in 1912. This court, in the exercise of its revisory jurisdiction under § 2, article 4, of the Constitution, has given full recognition to the power and jurisdiction of the Public Utilities Commission, and to the efficient aid it has given as an administrative agency of the government, but it is neither advisable nor possible to confer upon it power in disregard of rights protected by the guarantees of the Constitution.

In Gunn v. Barry, 15 Wall. 610, 21 L. ed. 212, it was held that a state can no more impair an existing contract by a constitutional provision than by a legislative act. Both are within the prohibition of the national Constitution.

Counsel also urge that the right to establish rates by compulsion is distinguished from the power to contract for a rate; that the power of a municipality to regulate is a police power, and rests upon legislative grant, which may be modified by the legislature at will.

We are mindful that the police power is an essential and vital attribute of government to be exercised in the interest of the public health, safety, and welfare. Government cannot, even if it would, divest itself of this inherent incident of sovereignty. The duty of its watchful exercise is a continuing one. But here is a matter of contract. It expresses a meeting of minds on a subject which the parties were competent to contract about. The situation is one in which the city had been expressly given full power by the state to enter into an agreement touching all the matters covered by the terms of the contract, and, conceding that the grant of power to the city was subject to repeal or modification at the will of the legislature, no such modification had been made at the time the contract became binding on the parties.

As was said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Cleveland v. Cleveland City R. Co., supra:

"That in passing ordinances, based upon the grant of power referred to, the municipal council of Cleveland was exercising a portion of the authority of the state, as an agency of the state, cannot in reason be disputed. If, therefore, the ordinances passed after August, 1879, and referred to previously, which ordinances were accepted by the predecessors of the complainant, with whom it is in privity, constituted contracts in respect to the rates of fare to be thereafter charged upon the consolidated and extended lines (affected by the ordinances) as an entirety, it necessarily follows that the ordinance of October, 1898, impaired these contracts.

"The question for decision then is: Did the consolidated ordinance of February, 1885, and the ordinances thereafter passed and accepted, already referred to, constitute binding contracts in respect to the rates of fare to be thereafter exacted upon the consolidated and extended lines of the complainant?

"That in the courts of Ohio the acceptance of an ordinance of the character of those just referred to is deemed to create a binding contract is settled."

It was held in the above case that a consolidated ordinance of February, 1885, of the city, and ordinances thereafter passed by the municipality and accepted by the companies, constituted such binding contracts in respect to the rate of fare to be exacted on the lines of the company as to deprive the city of its right to exercise the reservations in the original ordinances as to changing rates of fare, and that the ordinance of October, 1898, reducing fare to be charged, was void and unconstitutional within the impairment clause of the Federal Constitution. In the cases of Cincinnati v. Public Utilities Commission, 96 Ohio St. 554, P.U.R.1918B, 257, 118 N. E. 97, and 96 Ohio St. 270, 117 N. E. 381, the questions determined in this case were not presented to the court.

Counsel for defendant in error cite State ex rel. Webster v. Superior Ct. 67 Wash. 37, L.R.A.1915C, 287, 120 Pac. 861, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 78, in which case it was held that a city which granted a franchise to a telephone company, fixing rates, could not attack the constitutionality of a Public Utilities Act passed thereafter, under which the rates were raised, on the ground that the contract in the franchise was impaired thereby. In that case, the case of Cleveland v. Cleveland City R. Co. supra, was relied on by counsel for the city. But the supreme court of Washington points out that in the Cleveland City R. Co. case express authority had been conferred on the city by the Ohio statute, while in the Washington case the power to fix rates was a right reserved to the legislature of the state by the Constitution of that state, and so was not incident to a freehold charter. See also Woodburn v. Public Service Commission, 82 Or. 114, L.R.A.1917C, 98, P.U.R.1917B, 967, 161 Pac. 391, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 996, which is likewise cited by the defendant in error where it was also held that the right was reserved to the state.

As we have seen, the state and Federal courts have held that, in Ohio, "express and unmistakable authority" was conferred on the city to make a contract, such as is involved here, and during the life of the contract the parties operating under it are bound by its terms.

These views as to the contractual relations of the parties, whose interests are concerned in the proceeding, are conclusive of the case, and it is not necessary to decide the other questions suggested.

The order of the Commission will be reversed.

Nichols, Ch. J., and Wanamaker and Newman, JJ., concur.

Jones, J., dissenting:

I find it impossible to concur in the judgment. The municipality seeks to avoid the jurisdiction of the Public Utilities Commission of the state, because the original franchise ordinance contained a stipulation subjecting the utility "to the right of the city to regulate the price of natural gas from time to time, as provided by law."

This ordinance was passed December 26, 1905. The legislative grant to the municipality limited the contractual period to ten years. After the ten-year period the city, by ordinance, attempted to impose a reduced and compulsory rate of service upon the grantee, ignoring the ad interim legislation, which had in the meantime placed the control of rate regulation in the hands of the Public Utilities Commission.

1. The original ordinance of 1905, to which the grantee gave its statutory assent, reserved to the city the right to regulate the price of natural gas from time to time, as provided by law. This could only mean as provided by law in force at the time the regulation was to be made; otherwise, this provision would be meaningless. Before the new reducing-rate ordinance of August 20, 1917, was passed, the legislature had in the meantime provided by law the method by which the price of natural gas should be established. When the city attempted to enforce its unilateral and compulsory rate provision in its new ordinance, it violated its original contract made with the utility.

2. If it is assumed that this contract was for a longer period than ten years, the answer to that contention is that the municipality had no legislative authority to make it.

Sections 3982 and 3983, General Code, which were in force at the time the original ordinance was adopted, granted the only power the municipality had touching rate regulation. The first section delegates the power to city councils to regulate, and the second section provides for the contractual relation between the city and company, which shall not extend beyond a period of ten years. Under these sections neither the city nor the utility had any authority to contract as to the price of gas for a longer period.

In construing a similar section relating to price regulation this court held, in the case of Wellston v. Morgan, 59 Ohio St. 147, 52 N. E. 127, as follows: "Where a statute gives power to a municipal corporation to contract for the lighting of its streets and other public grounds for a period not exceeding ten years, the conclusive implication is that such corporation is forbidden to contract for a longer period."

In construing the grant of legislative power in the two Code sections noted, in the case of Logan Natural Gas & Fuel Co. v. Chilli-cothe, 65 Ohio St. 186, 62 N. E. 122, the following proposition is stated in the syllabus: "A city council has no power under Revised Statutes, §§ 2478 and 2479 [now §§ 3982 and 3983, General Code], to compel a gas company, without its assent to the ordinance, to furnish gas in a manner and at a rate entirely at the option of the consumer."

And on page 206 of 65 Ohio St. the court say: "It is also provided that, if the gas company assents to such limitation in writing, it then becomes a binding obligation on both the city and the company for ten years, and no more. This is the extent of the authority granted to the council, and no other or different power is either expressed or implied. When, therefore, the council undertakes, even in the absence of a prior ordinance, to compel the gas company, without its consent, to furnish gas in a manner and at a rate entirely at the option of the consumer, it not only transcends the power conferred by the legislature, but it also undertakes to seize private property without due process of law."

It must be remembered that the only power given to municipalities by § 3983, General Code, was regulation by contract, and not a compulsory regulation. In this connection the statement of the Oregon supreme court in the case of Woodburn v. Public Service Commission, 82 Or. 114, 127, L.R.A.1917C, 98, 105, P.U.R.1917B, 967, 161 Pac. 395, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 996, 1000, is peculiarly apt: "The right of the state to regulate rates by compulsion is a police power, and must not be confused with the right of a city to exercise its contractual power to agree with the public service company upon the terms of a franchise. The exercise of a power to fix rates by agreement does not include or embrace any portion of the power to fix rates by compulsion."

3. Since municipalities are political subdivisions of the state and mere agents of the latter, it is within the province of the state to change its rate regulation at will before the municipality has entered into a legal and effective contract with a public utility. Before the ten-year period of limitation had expired, and before the city had assumed to renew its status with the utility, and prior to municipal action fixing the new rate, the legislature had created a public utilities commission and vested it with sole control over coercive rate regulation. That the legislature had ample power to do this is supported by overwhelming authority, especially in view of the provisions of § 2, article 13, of the Constitution, which reserved to the legislature the right to alter or repeal laws conferring corporate franchises. People ex rel. Bridge Operating Co. v. Public Service Commission, 153 App. Div. 131, 138 N. Y. Supp. 434; Richmond County Gaslight Co. v. Middletown, 59 N. Y. 228; Stanislaus County v. San Joaquin & K. River Canal & Irrig. Co. 192 U. S. 201, 48 L. ed. 406, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 241; Home Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Los Angeles, 211 U. S. 265, 53 L. ed. 176, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50.

4. The new rate ordinance was passed by the council of the city of Cincinnati on August 20, 1917. The city is now assuming an attitude wholly inconsistent with its former action. Prior to the passage of the new ordinance, the city had expressly recognized the jurisdiction of the Public Utilities Commission of the state to control the rate regulation of this public utility.

In the case of Cincinnati v. Public Utilities Commission, 96 Ohio St. 554, P.U.R.1918B, 257, 118 N. E. 97, the city itself invoked the jurisdiction of the Commission by adopting a resolution on February 10, 1914, requesting the Commission to investigate and ascertain the value of this public utility for rate-making purposes. This proceeding was brought under §§ 499-8 et seq. General Code, as added by Act May 5, 1913 (103 Ohio Laws, p. 807) which authorized the Commission to fix the valuation, "for the purpose of ascertaining the reasonableness and justice of rates and charges for the service rendered by public utilities," etc. In that case, at the instance of the city, this court rendered a judgment in its favor, modifying the order of the Commission in the matter of valuation, upon which rates are necessarily based.

Likewise, in the case of Cincinnati v. Public Utilities Commission, 96 Ohio St. 270, 117 N. E. 381, the city also recognized the authority of the Commission to deal with rates of this utility during the noncontractual period, for, after the expiration of the ten-year gas rate contract in controversy, the city applied to the Commission, asking it to fix an emergency rate for this utility. It may not be amiss to say that in the opinion in the above case it is suggested that the ordinance of December 26, 1905, was not a twenty-five-year, but a ten-year, contract, expiring October 26, 1916, by virtue of § 3983, General Code, and that such rate contract becomes operative "upon its acceptance by the public utility."

NOTE.

The decision in CINCINNATI v. PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION, ante, 705, is in line with other Ohio decisions in holding that the Constitution and statutes of Ohio have delegated to the municipalities of that state the power to make inviolable contracts as to rates. The power of public service commissions to increase franchise rates is discussed in the annotation to SALT LAKE CITY v. UTAH LIGHT & TRACTION Co. post, 730, and the Ohio rule is discussed in subdivision II. a, 5, of that annotation.

(— Utah, —, P.U.R.1918F, 377, 173 Pac. 556.)

Public service corporation — contract for rates — power to change.

1. Constitutional prohibition of the granting of a right to construct and operate street railways without the consent of the local authorities does not authorize the local authorities to contract for rates which cannot be changed by the legislature.

Contract — acceptance of franchise ordinance.

2. The acceptance by a street railway company of a franchise ordinance passed by a municipal corporation, granting rights in the city streets and fixing the fares to be charged for service, constitutes a contract between the street railway company and the municipality.

[See 19 R. C. L. 1159.]

Constitutional law — impairing obligation of contract fixing rates.

3. In the absence of express constitutional authority to a municipal corporation to contract for rates to be charged for street car service within its limits, a contract with the street car company fixing such rates is not protected against impairment by the contract clause of the Federal Constitution, so as to prevent the state, in its sovereign capacity, from altering the rates fixed.

Statute — construction — protection of commutation rates.

4. A provision in a statute authorizing a Commission to fix rates of public utilities, that nothing in the act shall be construed to prevent carrying out contracts for free or reduced rates for passenger transportation, founded upon adequate consideration and lawful when made, does not protect from alteration contracts between municipalities and street railway companies for commutation rates upon the railways.

Estoppel — commutation rates — establishment of homes.

5. No estoppel against the changing of commutation rates of a street car company exists because individuals have established homes in reliance upon them.

[See 10 R. C. L. 716.]

Public Service Commission — opinion — effect.

6. The opinion filed by the Public Service Commission with its findings, in fixing a rate for a public service corporation, may be considered in determining whether or not the findings are sufficient.

Courts — power to review decision of Public Service Commission.

7. The power of the court to review the decision of the Public Service Commission in fixing a rate for a public service corporation is, unless expressly increased by statute, limited to determining whether or not there is any evidence to sustain the finding, whether or not it has exceeded its authority according to law, and whether or not any constitutional rights of the complaining party have been invaded or disregarded.

Constitutional law — remedy — interfering with legislative powers.

8. A constitutional provision that every person shall have a remedy for an injury done does not confer authority upon the courts to interfere with the powers of the legislature.

[See 7 R. C. L. 1049.]

Public service corporation — right to adequate return — effect of war.

9. A public utility need not be assured a fair and reasonable return on its investments over and above the actual cost of providing adequate, efficient, and safe service, when the conditions are grossly abnormal on account of a war, and are necessarily temporary.

The Public Utilities Act of 1917 vested in the Public Utilities Commission the right to regulate and control all public utility rates, whether prescribed by municipal franchise, private contract, or otherwise. The preserved exceptions of "free and reduced rate" service contracts are permissive to the utility, and not limitations upon the power of the Commission, nor are they applicable to a general commutation rate.

The Public Utilities Commission, in prescribing a rate, acts as an arm of the legislature, a co-ordinate branch of the government. The rate when prescribed is, in effect, a legislative rate, and there is no constitutional right of review of the facts on which the Commission's decision is based, if it has acted within its jurisdiction and authority, and has violated no constitutional right.

Frick, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Utah Light & Traction Company, a corporation owning and operating a street railway system in Salt Lake City and suburbs, hereinafter called defendant, made application to the Public Utilities Commission of Utah, hereinafter called Commission. The defendant made application to the Commission in due form to be permitted to increase or raise the fares for transportation on its street railway system, for the alleged purpose of meeting the increased costs and expenses incident to the maintenance and operation of its railway system in Salt Lake City and suburbs. The defendant's street railway system extends throughout Salt Lake City, which now has a population of approximately 115,000, and from thence to Murray City, which is located about 5 miles south of Salt Lake City, and from thence south and southwesterly in Salt Lake county to two other small towns. It also owns and operates a branch line running northwesterly from Salt Lake City to the town of Bountiful, which is about 14 miles from Salt Lake City. After the application was filed, Salt Lake City, Murray City, and the other plaintiffs named in the title appeared before the Commission and opposed the application. A hearing was had before the Commission, at which much evidence was produced, both for and against the application. After the hearing was concluded, the Commission in due time rendered an opinion and made findings, whereby it in effect found that, owing to the increase in the cost of labor and material, etc., the defendant was entitled to some relief, although not all of the relief prayed for. The Commission therefore made an order, authorizing the defendant to raise its fares in certain particulars, to which we shall make more specific reference hereinafter. The application of the defendant, the hearing, and the order of the Commission were had and made in pursuance of chapter 47, Utah Laws 1917, p. 128, popularly known as the Utilities Act, which hereinafter will be referred to by that name. The Utilities Act is too long for insertion here. We shall, however, refer to such portions as are deemed material in the course of the opinion. It may be stated here, however, that the Utilities Act of this state does not differ materially from similar acts in force in many of the other states in the Union. The general jurisdiction of the Commission is defined in § 1, art. 4, of the act in the following words: "The Commission is hereby vested with power and jurisdiction to supervise and regulate every public utility in this state, as defined in this act, and to supervise all of the business of every such public utility in this state, and to do all things, whether herein specifically designated, or in addition thereto, which are necessary or convenient in the exercise of such power and jurisdiction."

Section 3 of the same article also confers power on the Commission as follows: "Whenever the Commission shall find after hearing that the rates, fares, tolls, rentals, charges, or classifications, or any of them, demanded, observed, charged, or collected by any public utility for any service or product or commodity, or in connection therewith, including the rates or fares for excursion or commutation tickets, or that the rules, regulations, practices, or contracts, or any of them affecting such rates, fares, tolls, rentals, charges or classifications, or any of them are unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory or preferential, or in anywise in violation of any provisions of law, or that such rates, fares, tolls, rentals, charges, or classifications, are insufficient, the Commission shall determine the just, reasonable, or sufficient rates, fares, tolls, rentals, charges, classifications, rules, regulations, practices, or contracts to be thereafter observed and in force, and shall fix the same by order, as hereinafter provided.

"The Commission shall have power to investigate a single rate, fare, toll, rental, charge, classification, rule, regulation, contract, or practice, or any number thereof, or the entire schedule or schedules of rates, fares, tolls, rentals, charges, classifications, rules, regulations, contracts, and practices, or any number thereof of any public utility, and to establish, after hearing, new rates, fares, tolls, rentals, charges, classifications, rules, regulations, contracts, or practices, or schedule or schedules, in lieu thereof."

For the purpose of review the act provides for rehearings before the Commission in all cases. Section 15 of article 5, so far as material here, provides that, within thirty days after an application for a rehearing is granted or denied, an application may be made to this court "for a writ of certiorari or review." After specifying how and when the writ shall be issued and returned, that section provides: "The case shall be heard on the record of the Commission as certified to by it."

The section then proceeds: "The review shall not be extended further than to determine whether the Commission has regularly pursued its authority, including a determination of whether the order or decision under review violates any right of the petitioner under the Constitution of the United States or of the state of Utah. The findings and conclusions of the Commission on questions of fact shall be final and shall not be subject to review."

As before stated, the Commission found the facts and made an order in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiffs have applied for and obtained a writ of review as above stated, and the case has been presented to this court upon plaintiffs' objections to the findings and order of the Commission.

We remark that, while the attorney general appeared on behalf of the Commission, as he is required to do by the Utilities Act, yet he has filed no brief or argument in the case.

Twenty-three specific reasons are assigned by plaintiffs why the order made by the Commission should not prevail. It is not necessary to refer to all of those reasons in detail, and we shall now proceed to consider those which come within the powers conferred on this court by the Utilities Act, and which we deem material to the controversy.

The first, and perhaps the principal, contention made by the plaintiffs is that the Commission, by its order, has set aside and annulled the contracts which were entered into between the defendant and Salt Lake City, and between the defendant and Murray City, wherein the rates of fare that the defendant was authorized to charge and collect were agreed upon and fixed. The contracts just referred to are in the form of ordinances which were duly adopted both by Salt Lake City and Murray City pursuant to article 12, § 8, of the Constitution of this state which was in force at the time the ordinances were passed. The constitutional provision just referred to reads as follows: "No law shall be passed granting the right to construct and operate a street railroad, . . . within any city or incorporated town, without the consent of the local authorities who have control of the street or highway proposed to be occupied for such purposes."

The ordinances or contracts will hereinafter be referred to as the franchise ordinances.

In this connection we at this time also desire to call attention to two other constitutional provisions that are deemed material, namely, article 12, § 12, which provides: "All railroad and other transportation companies are declared to be common carriers, and subject to legislative control;" and to § 15 of the same article which provides: "The legislature shall pass laws establishing reasonable maximum rates of charges for the transportation of passengers and freight, for correcting abuses, and preventing discrimination and extortion in rates of freight and passenger tariffs by the different railroads, and other common carriers in the state, and shall enforce such laws by adequate penalties."

In view, therefore, that § 8 of the article of the Constitution referred to prohibits the legislature from passing any law by which any street railway may be constructed or operated in the cities and towns of this state without the consent of the local authorities, plaintiffs contend that the authorities of the cities and towns have the exclusive right and power to impose the conditions upon which street railways may be constructed and operated in cities and towns, and that the right to determine and fix the rates of fare is necessarily implied in the foregoing section. In the franchise ordinances which were adopted by both Salt Lake City and Murray City, and the terms of which were accepted by the defendant, what is termed the "regular fare" was fixed at 5 cents for one continuous ride, and in addition to such fare the defendant also agreed as follows: "Said grantee further hereby agrees that it will issue commutation tickets of fifty fares for $2, the holders of which tickets shall have the same transfer privileges accorded to passengers paying regular fare, and shall also issue to students of public schools commutation tickets of fifty fares for $1.50 with transfer privileges as aforesaid, good only to and from school attended by such students, and good only on days when school is in regular session between the hours of 7:30 o'clock A. M. and 5:30 o'clock P. M. City policemen and firemen in uniform shall be entitled to free passage on regular cars."

Transfer rights were also provided for in the franchise ordinances.

The defendant, in connection with other privileges, accepted all of the provisions contained in the foregoing ordinances, and has operated its street car system in conformity therewith.

The Commission, in its order, relieved the defendant from issuing the so-called $2 commutation tickets, and authorized it to charge and collect a fare of 5 cents for each continuous ride in Salt Lake City and to charge a 5-cent fare for each zone in certain zones outside of the city. The Commission also changed the rate somewhat in other particulars on defendant's system operated outside of Salt Lake City and Murray City, all of which rates had been fixed in the franchise ordinances. In view, however, that a decision upon the so-called $2 commutation tickets settles all questions affecting the increase of rates, it is not necessary to set forth the other changes that were made by the Commission.

The order of the Commission increasing the fares as aforesaid presents three questions: (1) Did the passing of the franchise ordinances fixing the fares, and their acceptance by the defendant, constitute a contract between Salt Lake City and the defendant, and between Murray City and the defendant? (2) If the franchise ordinances constituted contracts, was it within the power of the legislature to authorize the Commission to change the fares? (3) Does the constitutional provision by which the city authorities are given the exclusive right to permit or to refuse permission to street railway companies to construct and operate street cars within the cities of this state prevent the state, through its legislature, from exercising its sovereign prerogative to regulate and change the fares fixed in the franchise ordinances?

In view that the franchise ordinances, after acceptance by the defendant, possess all the elements of a contract, and that such ordinances are generally regarded by the courts as constituting contracts binding as between the parties, we, for the purposes of this decision, shall treat them as contracts binding alike on Salt Lake City and on Murray City and on the defendant, to the extent hereinafter stated.

acceptance of franchise
ordinance.

The answer to the first question must therefore be in the affirmative.

The second proposition, for the reasons herein stated, in our judgment, must also be answered in the affirmative, while the answer to the third question, under the great, the overwhelming, weight of authority, must be answered in the negative. The second and third questions, however, logically blend, and for that reason we shall treat them together.

We may as well, at this point, consider the contention of plaintiffs that by reason of the constitutional provision above referred to, which prohibits the legislature from interfering with the city authorities in authorizing the construction and operation of street railways, the legislature is likewise powerless to authorize the Commission to interfere with any rates that have been fixed by the franchise ordinances, as before stated. To do that, plaintiffs insist, is not only "impairing the obligation of contracts" (which is prohibited by both the Federal and state Constitutions), but amounts to a complete nullification of such contracts. This objection has often been made in cases where either the city or the street car company has sought relief from a rate fixed by franchise ordinances like those in question here. It should be observed, however, that where the controversy has arisen between the contracting parties merely, and in ordinary actions or proceedings, the courts have usually compelled compliance with the provisions of the franchise ordinances, treating them as contracts. Where, however, as here, the application was made to utilities commissions in pursuance of a legislative act, the courts have, with few exceptions, held that a constitutional or statutory provision prohibiting the legislature from passing laws authorizing the construction and operation of street railways in cities without the consent of the local authorities does not authorize such authorities to fix rates which may not be changed by the legislature or by a utilities commission created for that purpose. In other words, it is universally held that the regulation and fixing of rates is a governmental function, that is, a legislative function, which will not be deemed to have been surrendered by the sovereign state unless it has been done in clear and unequivocal terms. A mere cursory reading of § 8 of the Constitution, which we have before quoted, shows that no express right is conferred upon the local authorities of this state to enter into any contract respecting the fixing of rates. True it is that, in determining the conditions upon which street railways may be constructed and operated within the cities, the local authorities may determine the fares that may be charged and collected. The authority to do that is, however, merely implied, and there is nothing in the Constitution which prohibits the legislature from exercising its prerogative in changing the rates of fare in case they are found to be unreasonable, unfair, or oppressive as against the public, on the one hand, and unfair, or unjust, or confiscatory as against the railway company, upon the other. Such right is an attribute of sovereignty, and is always reserved to the state unless expressly delegated or surrendered. Whether the right and corresponding duty of the state to regulate rates can be surrendered at all is not before us now, and as to that we express no opinion. It is manifest that the constitutional provision does not, in express terms, delegate or surrender such a power to the city authorities, and it is equally manifest that there is nothing in the provision from which such a power is necessarily implied.

In this connection it must also be remembered that by another constitutional provision, which we have also quoted above, the duty of passing laws by which maximum rates to be charged by all common carriers shall be established is especially imposed on the legislature. The right to regulate the rates or charges demanded by common carriers was, therefore, not only reserved to the state when acting in its governmental capacity, but the duty to regulate and fix maximum rates or charges is expressly imposed on the legislature without any exceptions. In passing the Utilities Act the legislature, therefore, merely complied with the constitutional mandate, and the Commission is the mere arm of the legislature, through which the constitutional mandate aforesaid is made effective.

All of the foregoing propositions are exhaustively considered, and are sustained by the following authorities: Home Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Los Angeles, 211 U. S. 265, 53 L. ed. 176, 29 Sup. Ct. In State ex rel. Webster v. Superior Ct. 67 Wash. 37, L.R.A. 1915C, 287, 120 Pac. 861, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 78, in the course of the opinion, it is said: "The power to fix rates, if exercised by a city, unless that power is clearly expressed by legislative grant, is in the nature of a license, and is revocable at the will of the legislature when, in its judgment, the common good demands its reassertion. The state does not act by contract, but by grant, license, or reservation. It is not usually bound by the contracts of others when exercising its police power. So jealous is it of the sovereignty of its police power that, in the case of the Home Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Los Angeles, the Supreme Court of the United States held that a grant by the legislature of the state of the right 'to fix and determine charges for telephone, telephone service, and connections,' did not carry with it the right to agree upon rates. In other words, as that court and others have universally held, the delegation of power must be 'clear and unmistakable.' In dealing with the sovereign power of the people, nothing can be left to inference. The court accordingly said that, the power to fix and determine rates being within the police power, the city might establish rates, but that it could not, under the delegation quoted, contract so as to bind itself or the other party as against the exercise of the police power. In principle its holding could not have been otherwise, for the strength of the police power lies in the fact that it is not a subject of contract; that it cannot be bartered or bargained away."

In Puget Sound Traction, Light, & P. Co. v. Reynolds, 244 U. S. 574, 61 L. ed. 1325, *P.U.R.*1917F, 57, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 705, the court uses the following language: "Assuming

(what is not clear) that the provision in the franchise ordinance respecting the rates of fare and the transfer privilege are contractual in form, still it is well settled that a municipality cannot, by a contract of this nature, foreclose the exercise of the police power of the state unless clearly authorized to do so by the supreme legislative power."

In Milwaukee E. R. & Light Co. v. Railroad Commission, 153 Wis. 592, *L.R.A.*1915F, 744, 142 N. W. 491, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 911, the court, in the course of the opinion, says: "Assuming that under this language a city might make a contract with a public utility, fixing rates or tolls for a definite period, which would bind the city itself and prevent any change of rates by the city authorities during the contract period, the question still remains whether the section can be construed as giving the city authorities any power to bargain away the sovereign right of the state to regulate fares and tolls and lower them, if found to be excessive. If this question were a new one in this state, we should entertain no doubt that it should be answered in the negative, but we cannot regard it as new."

While it is true that two of the justices dissented from the majority opinion in the foregoing case, yet it is equally true that the case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the opinion of the majority was affirmed.

In the case of Woodburn v. Public Service Commission, 82 Or. 114, *L.R.A.*1917C, 98, *P.U.R.*1917B, 967, 161 Pac. 391, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 996, the supreme court of Oregon, in passing on the question here involved, in the course of the opinion, said: "The right of the state to regulate rates by compulsion is a police power, and must not be confused with the right of a city to exercise its contractual power to agree with a public service company upon the terms of a franchise. The exercise of a power to fix rates by agreement does not include or embrace any portion of the power to fix rates by compulsion. When Woodburn granted the franchise to the telephone company, the city exercised its municipal right to contract, and it may be assumed that the franchise was valid and binding upon both parties until such time as the state chose to speak; but the city entered into the contract, subject to the reserved right of the state to employ its police power and compel a change of rates, and when the state did speak, the municipal power gave way to the sovereign power of the state."

In all of the cases we have cited similar language is used, and in nearly all of them constitutional or statutory provisions conferring the authority on the local authorities of cities to grant or refuse permission to construct and operate street railways in such cities, similar to our own, were construed and passed on, and in all of those cases it is held that those provisions do not foreclose the state from changing the rates of fare agreed upon in the franchise ordinances. We shall refrain from quoting further from the decided cases.

We desire to add, however, that this court, in the case of Brummitt v. Ogden Waterworks Co. 33 Utah, 289, 93 Pac. 829, which was decided in 1908 and before practically all of the foregoing cases were decided, and before the legislature of this state passed a law for the purpose of regulating rates, announced the doctrine laid down in all of the foregoing cases. In the Brummitt Case the constitutional provision in question here was, however, not applicable, and hence was not considered.

Against the foregoing array of authority plaintiffs have cited and rely upon the following cases: Allegheny v. Millville, E. & S. Street R. Co. 159 Pa. 411, 28 Atl. 202; Pittsburgh's Appeal, 115 Pa. 4, 7 Atl. 778; Plymouth Twp. v. Chestnut Hill & N. R. Co. 163 Pa. 181, 32 Atl. 19; People ex rel. New York v. New York R. Co. 217 N. Y. 310, 112 N. E. 49; Adamson v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 89 Hun, 261, 34 N. Y. Supp.

1073; People ex rel. Frontier Electric R. Co. v. North Tonawanda, 70 Misc. 91, 126 N. Y. Supp. 186; Detroit v. Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. 184 U. S. 368, 46 L. ed. 592, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 410; Public Service Commission v. Westchester Street R. Co. 206 N. Y. 209, 99 N. E. 536; Gaedeke v. Staten Island Midland R. Co. 43 App. Div. 514, 60 N. Y. Supp. 598; People ex rel. South Shore Traction Co. v. Willcox, 133 App. Div. 556, 118 N. Y. Supp. 248, and Re New York & N. S. Traction Co. 15 N. Y. Off. Dept. R. 70, P.U.R. 1918A, 893.

Every one of the cases last above cited, however, is clearly distinguishable from the cases we have first above referred to, except the last one. That case squarely supports plaintiffs' contention that the franchise ordinances constituted contracts which may not be altered in any material part except by the consent of the parties in interest. That case originated, however, before the Public Service Commission of the state of New York, and therefore merely represents the views of the Commission. While no doubt the decision is entitled to respectful consideration, yet it is not authority, since it does not emanate from a court of last resort. The case of Re Huntington R. Co. 14 N. Y. Off. Dept. R. 305, P.U.R. 1918A, 249, also originated before the Public Service Commission of the second district of the state of New York, and is a decision of that Commission. That decision is, however, squarely in opposition to the decision from the Commission of the first district, and is, therefore, in harmony with the great weight of authority. Many, if not all, of the cases relied on by plaintiffs are also cited and relied on in the opinion of the Public Service Commission of the first district of New York. In many of those cases it is held that franchise ordinances, like those in question in the case at bar, constitute contracts which are binding and enforceable between the parties. The further question was, however, not decided, whether such contracts are also binding upon the state in its sovereign capacity. Indeed, in many of the cases it is clearly enough intimated that if that question had been presented for decision the result might have been different.

We have no difficulty in reconciling the decisions in those cases. It is now settled law that, so long as the state does not interfere, the rates agreed upon between the cities and the street railway companies in the franchise ordinances are binding and enforceable. Neither party, without the consent of the other, may disregard any rate that is agreed upon between them. Either party may, however, make application to the utilities commission, if one is created by legislative enactment, for the purpose of being relieved from the rates fixed in the franchise ordinance; and if it be made to appear that the rates under existing conditions have become unfair or unreasonable, in that they are either too high or too low, the Commission may establish a rate which will again respond to the existing conditions, and may so adjust it as to make it fair, just, and reasonable, both to the railway company and to the public. In doing that, the constitutional rights of the parties are neither invaded nor disregarded, for the simple reason that when the original rate was fixed by agreement it was still subject to modification at any time by the sovereign power of the state, providing the fare as fixed is found to be unfair and unreasonable. Every contract fixing rates, entered into between the cities of this state and street railway companies, both under the Constitution and the statute, is always subject to change by the paramount power of the state, and the right of the state to so change the rates continues, unless and until the legislature has in express terms surrendered the power or delegated it to some other arm of the state.

Plaintiffs' contention, therefore, that the rates of fare fixed by the franchise ordinances should have been affirmed by the Commission, upon the ground that such rights were contractual, cannot prevail, and must be overruled.

Plaintiffs, however, also insist that the commutation tickets are not within the purview of the Utilities Act, but are excluded therefrom by a certain exception found in subdivision "c" of § 5 of article 3 of that act. It is there provided: "Nothing in this act contained shall be construed . . . to prevent the carrying out of contracts for free or reduced-rate passenger transportation or other public utility service heretofore made, founded upon adequate consideration and lawful when made."

The foregoing provision is found among the exceptions in favor of employees and respecting agreements with other utilities. While the language of the exception is not as clear as it could have been made, yet it is manifest that it was not intended to refer to the rates fixed in franchise ordinances. In our opinion the manifest purpose of the legislature was to prevent an injustice like that in the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Mottley, 219 U. S. 467, 55 L. ed. 297, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 671, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 265, in which case life passes were issued to Mottley and his wife upon a valuable consideration received by the railroad company. In that case the Supreme Court of the United States held that, under the act of Congress of February 4, 1887, chap. 104, 24 Stat. at L. 379, as subsequently amended (Comp. Stat. 1916, §§ 8563 et seq., 4 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. pp. 337, 359), common carriers were prohibited from transporting either freight or passengers except at the regular rates, which had to be paid in cash. Under that decision, therefore, the Mottleys were prohibited from riding on their passes, although they had paid for them before the congressional act had been passed. Moreover, it sometimes happens that passes are issued in payment for right of way and other privileges granted by the owners of land to common carriers. Under the Mottley decision, however, all such passes would be void, regardless of the consideration that the owners had paid to the common carriers. The legislature, therefore, very properly and, as we think, wisely, excepted such cases from the operation of the Utilities Act in so far as intrastate business is concerned. That is all that was attempted, and all that was done, by the adoption of the exception aforesaid. This contention must, therefore, likewise fail.

It is, however, further contended that, because the franchise ordinances provided for the so-called commutation tickets, and in reliance on them many persons have built homes in the suburbs of Salt Lake City and along defendant's line of street railway outside of Salt Lake City, for that reason the defendant should be held to be estopped from increasing the rates of fare without the consent of those persons. It needs no argument to

rates—
establishment of homes.

show that the elements of estoppel are lacking in this case. A conclusive answer to the contention, however, is that anyone who purchased commutation tickets and who built a home did so subject to the right of the state to change or alter the fares fixed in the franchise ordinances, in case it was found that such fares were unfair or unreasonable. Let us assume, however, that the rate fixed in the franchise ordinance passed by Salt Lake City (which, it seems, is for the term of fifty years) in the course of ten or fifteen years should become unreasonably high, would those same persons then consent that the defendant might continue to charge and collect a rate for the full period of fifty years, although such rate, by reason of unforeseen conditions, had become grossly unfair and unjust? Moreover, the public, as well as the persons living along the line aforesaid, are directly interested in maintaining an adequate, efficient, and safe service on the part of the defendant. In order to maintain such a service the rates of fare must be sufficient to pay adequate wages to the defendant's employees and sufficient to defray the other incidental costs and expenses necessary to operate the street railway system. When the rates no longer are sufficient to produce adequate revenue to meet the costs of giving an adequate, efficient, and safe service and the service for that reason deteriorates, it is the man with limited means, and the wage-earner, neither of whom has the means to provide private transportation, who suffer first. They will be first affected, and will sustain the greatest inconvenience, if not loss. While it is true that under such circumstances all will suffer more or less, yet the class first named will necessarily suffer most. It is the duty of the state, therefore, to see that the rates continue to be fair and just both to the public and to the street railway company. If plaintiffs' contention, therefore, that the defendant be estopped, should prevail, it, in the long run, might result in far greater injury to the persons now insisting upon the estoppel than will the increased rate. In no event, however, can it be held that the state is estopped from regulating the rates, whenever it becomes necessary to do that so as to make them reasonable and fair, unless the state has surrendered that right, as before stated.

From what we have said we do not wish to be understood as either affirming the rate fixed by the Commission or disapproving it. For the reasons hereinafter stated it will appear that we do not possess the power to review the Commission's findings in respect of whether a certain rate is reasonable or otherwise.

The plaintiffs, however, also contend that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings and order of the Commission by which the rates were found to be inadequate and were increased, and, further, that the findings are in and of themselves insufficient. Referring to the last objection first, we are of the opinion that, in view of the elaborate opinion of the Commission, which was filed with the findings, the findings are sufficient. While it is true that the Utilities Act expressly requires the Commission to make findings, and while it is also true that the Commission should be careful to make proper findings respecting the material, ultimate facts upon which an order is based, yet we cannot see wherein the plaintiffs, or anyone else, could have been, or can be, benefited if the findings had been far more specific. When the findings and the opinion filed by the Commission are considered together, as in this case we think they should be, we are of the opinion that the objection that the findings are insufficient is not tenable, and hence that objection must fail.

It is, however, earnestly insisted that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding that the rates fixed by the franchise ordinances are unreasonably low, and are no longer sufficient to enable the defendant to furnish adequate and efficient service to meet the public necessities. Notwithstanding that it was suggested at the hearing that, in view of the limited powers that the Utilities Act has conferred on this court, and that for that reason we are prohibited from passing on the evidence or upon whether the Commission should have adopted some other rate, counsel have filed elaborate briefs on the subject. After a careful examination of the authorities we are more than ever confirmed in the opinion that all that we can review in cases of this kind is whether there is any evidence to sustain the findings of the Commission, whether it has exercised its authority according to law, and whether any constitutional rights of the complaining party have been invaded or disregarded. In view that the Commission is merely an arm of the legislature through whom that body acts in matters of this kind, but a moment's reflection convinces anyone that this court may not interfere, except for the reasons just stated.

If interference were extended beyond those limits, it would, in effect, be an interference by this court with the lawmaking power of this state. It requires no argument to show why that may not be done. We have no more right to interfere with the duties and powers of the legislature than that body has to interfere with the powers and duties imposed upon us as a court. True, the legislature could, perhaps, have given us somewhat greater powers to pass upon the findings and orders of the Commission. Such has been done in some other jurisdictions. The legislature of this state has, however, not seen fit to clothe this court with greater powers of review, and we have neither the inclination nor the right to exercise a power which is neither inherent nor properly conferred. It is also true, as plaintiffs' counsel suggest, that the Constitution of this state provides that the courts shall always be open, and that "every person, for an injury done to him or in his person, property, or reputation, shall have remedy by due course of law which shall be administered without denial or unnecessary delay." Article 1, § 11.

That provision, however, applies only to judicial questions. It is not meant thereby that this court may reach out and usurp powers which belong to another independent and co-ordinate branch of the state government. The power conferred upon the legislature is supreme respecting the regulation and establishing of rates. We may not interfere with or review any legislative act unless some judicial question is presented for review. Unless a rate established by the Commission is clearly oppressive on the one hand or confiscatory on the other, no judicial question is presented. So far, therefore, as the questions are judicial, the Utilities Act has conferred power upon this court, and in so far as the acts of the Commission are properly administrative, or in their nature legislative, the power has been wisely and properly withheld from us. Whether there is any substantial evidence to support any finding of fact that the Commission may make is a judicial question, and may be determined by this court. A mere cursory reading of the record, however, discloses that there is, at least, some substantial evidence in support of every essential fact found by the Commission. While it is true that in this case plaintiffs contend that the rates, as fixed by the franchise ordinances, provide sufficient revenue to enable the defendant to provide an economical, adequate, and safe service, and to yield a fair return on its investments, yet it is equally true that the defendant insists to the contrary, and the Commission has so found. The evidence in support of both contentions was submitted to, considered by, and passed on by the Commission, and, as the act provides, its findings are conclusive upon us. The record, however, discloses that the defendant always has obtained an income over and above the cost of operation and maintenance of its railway system. The only matter, therefore, that now divides the parties is that, owing to the increased cost of labor and material, the present rates no longer yield to defendant a reasonable net return on its investments. The parties also differ with respect to the amount invested and what would amount to a reasonable return on the investments. The Commission has, however, fully considered and passed on those questions. Since we are powerless to review the findings of the Commission in that respect, it is of no consequence what conclusion the writer, or, for that matter, this court, might arrive at upon those questions. It may, however, not be improper to suggest that, while the Commission in establishing and fixing rates is invested with great powers, it also assumes great responsibilities. It is, therefore, of the utmost importance that the Commission should proceed with great care in changing rates. While caution in that regard should always be exercised, yet, at this time, when the whole world is engaged in a most destructive war and every condition is grossly abnormal, to do so is of special importance. While, generally speaking, every utility that serves the public must be allowed a fair and reasonable return on its investments, over and above the actual cost and expense of providing adequate, efficient, and safe service when economically managed, yet it is not true that such a return must be assured to every utility when, as now, the conditions are grossly abnormal on account of the war, and while such conditions are necessarily temporary. At such a time and under such conditions every individual and every enterprise must bear his or its share of the burden incident to the great conflict, and while rates should be made adequate to permit every public utility to pay a reasonable wage to its employees and to provide adequate, safe, and efficient service, yet rates should not be so high as to become oppressive, and they should be so regulated as to be fair both to the utility and to the public. A careful reading of the opinion filed by the Commission has, however, convinced us that in allowing the moderate increase in the present instance the Commission has kept in mind the foregoing propositions. If the Commission has not done so to the full extent herein outlined, yet it has not entirely overlooked the propositions.

After the foregoing was written counsel for defendant called our attention to the case of Quinby v. Public Service Commission, 223 N. Y. 244, ante, 685, P.U.R.1918D, 30, 119 N. E. 493. That case was decided on the 5th day of April, 1918, by the New York court of appeals. The decision is by a divided court, the chief justice and another justice dissenting, while another justice concurs specially. The decision is, however, based upon the narrow ground that, in the opinion of the majority, the New York Utilities Act (Consol. Laws, chap. 48) has not conferred the power upon the Public Service Commission of New York to raise the rates that were agreed to between cities and street railway corporations. That decision, therefore, can have but little if any effect upon what the decision should be in this case. At all events it can have no controlling influence. Indeed, in view that every proposition that we contend for herein, except the one stated, is expressly approved in the majority opinion, the decision is really in harmony with all that we have decided. We here call attention to the decision, however, for the express purpose of avoiding any misunderstanding respecting the two cases of Re Huntington R. Co. 14 N. Y. Off. Dept. R. 305, P.U.R.1918A, 249, and Re New York & N. S. Traction Co. 15 N. Y. Off. Dept. R. 70, P.U.R.1918A, 893, the first one being cited in this opinion by us in support of our views, and the second one also being referred to herein in support of plaintiffs' contentions. While the decision in Re Huntington R. Co. is overruled upon the ground stated, yet none of the propositions decided in Re New York & N. S. Traction Co. is sustained. Upon the contrary, every proposition decided in that case is tacitly, at least, overruled. The late New York case is, therefore, an authority on the main propositions decided here. We make this statement for the reason that in our Utilities Act the very ground on which the New York decision is based is obviated, as will appear from an examination of the powers that are conferred by that act upon the Commission, a part of which we have quoted herein.

In concluding this opinion we desire to express our appreciation to counsel for both sides for the able and helpful briefs and arguments presented by them. We also desire to extend our thanks to counsel for defendant for having called our attention to the late New York case. We especially appreciate an act of that kind, since this court has but one purpose, and that is to decide every case in accordance with the declared law upon the questions presented for decision.

For the reasons stated, the findings and order of the Commission are affirmed at plaintiffs' costs.

Power of public service commission to increase franchise rates.

    - 4. Distinction between power of municipality to make rates for itself and power to make rates for its inhabitants, 735.

I. Introductory.

The question whether a public service commission has power to increase franchise rates is, in reality, twofold: First, has the state itself power to increase such rates; if so, has such power been delegated to the public service commission. The first of these questions is one of fundamental constitutional law. May rates fixed by a franchise be increased without impairing the obligation of contracts, contrary to the constitutional guaranty? The second is merely one of statutory construction, that is, conceding that the state itself has power to increase such rates, has such power been delegated to the public service commission, by the statute creating the commission.

As a matter of practice the answer to the constitutional question is immaterial, provided the second question be answered in the negative. That is, if the commission, being merely a creature of statute, has not, by the statute creating it, been given power to increase franchise rates, it is immaterial whether the state itself has such power or not. But as in many cases it is assumed that the commission has any power which the state itself possesses in the premises, the constitutional question will be discussed first.

It is perhaps needless to say that no question of impairment of contract obligations, because of action by a public service commission in increasing rates, can arise in any case unless the franchise rates were established by a contract valid as between the parties.

Thus, if the franchise or ordinance fixing the rate was invalid in itself, no question of impairment of contract obligations could arise; as, for instance, in Re Joplin Waterworks Co. (1915) 2 Mo. P. S. C. 235, P.U.R.1915C, 125, the ordinance was not valid because it had not been properly passed.

And the rule has been laid down in Pennsylvania that a stipulation in a franchise as to rates is not binding, where it is for an unlimited time. Turtle Creek v. Pennsylvania Water Co. (1914) 243 Pa. 415, 90 Atl. 199; Bellevue v. Ohio Valley Water Co. (1914) 245 Pa. 114, 91 Atl. 236. In both of these cases the city sought to enjoin a proposed increase in rates by the utility. In its opinion in the Bellevue Case, the supreme court, at page 117, in referring to Turtle Creek v. Pennsylvania Water Co. (Pa.) supra, says: "We did decide in that case that a contract of this kind, unlimited by its terms, and hence indeterminate as to time, could not be enforced indefinitely, and must give way to the general policy of the law under which the legislature created a special tribunal to pass upon and determine questions relating to the reasonableness of rates charged by public service corporations. The learned court below in the present case very properly followed the decision in that case, and held that the borough of Bellevue could not enforce, through the courts, a compliance with the rates thus established."

Following the above cases, the Pennsylvania Commission held that an advance of the rates of a public utility may be made although a franchise ordinance provides, among other things, that the municipality shall have the right to purchase the utility at specified times, and that the annual rates to private consumers shall not exceed those specified therein; since, in this form, the contract is indeterminate and uncertain in length of time, so that the company is not bound to maintain the rates therein provided for. Mt. Union v. Mt. Union Water Co. (1915; Pa.) P.U.R.1915D, 1.

Again, if the municipalities have no power whatever, either express or implied, to fix rates, franchise rates need not be considered by the commission. It has been so held in Maine: Re Guilford Water Co. (1918; Me.) P.U.R. 1918C, 916; Re Cumberland County Power & Light Co. (1918; Me.) P.U.R. 1918C, 937.

So, too, no question of impairment of contract obligations can be raised by the city, where the power of the state to modify the authority of the city is expressly reserved to the state.

Thus, the consent of a New Jersey municipality to the construction of a sewerage system by a public utility company, specifying maximum rates, does not interfere with the rate-making power of the commission, since such consent is not a contract nor even the conditional grant of a franchise, where the legislature itself has granted the right to construct a system, and merely suspended it until the consent of the municipality has been obtained. Collingswood Sewerage Co. v. Collingswood (1918) — N. J. —, P.U.R.1919B, 585, 105 Atl. 209.

So, too, no unconstitutional impairment of contract results, so far as the city is concerned, from a change by the state of rates fixed by a franchise granted by the municipality to a telephone company, if the municipal charter is, by its terms, subject to the general laws of the state. State ex rel.

And even if the provision in the Missouri statute, requiring the consent of local authorities before granting permit for the construction of a street railway in any city, town, etc., is to be considered as a grant of power to impose or fix rates by agreement with the utility, such franchise contract was necessarily accepted, subject to the provisions of the Constitution reserving the rate-making power to the state and requiring the charter and ordinances of the city to conform always to the laws of the state. Re United R. Co. (1918; Mo.) P.U.R. 1918D, 392.

And a city, even if authorized so to contract as to prevent the state from exercising its power of regulation, does not exercise this right by granting a franchise fixing rates, subject, in terms, to all laws that may be enacted by the legislature for the regulation of such rates. Winfield v. Public Service Commission (1918) — Ind. —, P.U.R.1918B, 747, 118 N. E. 531.

a. As affected by power of city to make inviolable contracts as to rates.

1. In general.

In a number of cases, a franchise rate contract has been held to be a valid contract which the utility of itself cannot ignore, but the power of the commission to increase the rates fixed thereby was not at issue. Cases of this character are not within the scope of this note, which deals merely with the power of the state, acting through a public service commission, to increase franchise rates.

Conceding that the franchise contract is valid as between the utility and the municipality, the next step in the reasoning is to determine whether the city has the power to make contracts as to rates which are beyond the power of the state itself to change.

It seems settled that it is not beyond the power of the state to grant to a municipality the power to make irrevocable contracts as to rates. Thus, the United States Supreme Court in Home Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Los Angeles (1908) 211 U. S. 265, 53 L. ed. 176, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 50, said: "The power to fix, subject to constitutional limits, the charges for such a business as the furnishing to the public of telephone service, is among the powers of government, legislative in its character, continuing in its nature, and capable of being vested in a municipal corporation." The court further said: "It has been settled by this court that the state may authorize one of its municipal corporations to establish, by an inviolable contract, the rates to be charged by a public service corporation (or natural person) for a definite term, not grossly unreasonable in point of time, and that the effect of such a contract is to suspend, during the life of the contract, the governmental power of fixing and regulating the rates."

So, in Re Lincoln Water Co. (1919; Me.) P.U.R.1919B, 752, the Maine Commission said that it is competent for the state not to abdicate or destroy the power to control subjects falling within its police power, but to delegate to one of its political subdivisions irrevocably the power to exercise it, for and to the exclusion of the entire state. The Commission said: "The power cannot be destroyed, but it can, by appropriate enactment, be lodged in other agencies, and if so lodged, the action of such agency may be binding upon the state."

It is possible, however, that the grant by the state of rate-making power to a municipality may be prohibited by the Constitution of the state. Thus, the Oklahoma supreme court has said that while it has been held that, in well-defined cases, a surrender by contract of the power of government may be made by legislative authority, such a surrender cannot be made where prohibited by the Constitution, and the Oklahoma Constitution expressly prohibits the surrender by the legislative branch of the state government, of the "power to regulate the charges for public service." Pawhuska v. Pawhus-

The Pennsylvania supreme court has also based the power of the state to increase contract rates upon the constitutional provision that the exercise of the police power of the state shall never be abridged. Leiper v. Baltimore & P. R. Co. (1918) 262 Pa. 328, P.U.R.1919C, 397, 106 Atl. 551.

Again, the Missouri supreme court, in State ex rel. Sedalia v. Public Service Commission (1918) — Mo. —, P.U.R.1919C, 507, 204 S. W. 497, in discussing the effect of the provision in the Constitution of Missouri, that the exercise of the police power of the state shall never be abridged, said: "Under it the sovereign police power of the state is preserved intact, irrespective of contracts with reference to rates for public service. Under it, no contract as to rates will stand as against the order of the Public Service Commission for reasonable rates, whether such reasonable rates be lower or higher than the contract rates."

2. Power not to be implied.

But the grant to a municipality of the power to make any inviolable contract as to rates must be made in clear and unequivocal terms, and the intent to make such a delegation of power must clearly and unmistakably appear, and will not be implied.

Thus, in State ex rel. Billings v. Billings Gas Co. (1918) — Mont. —, P.U.R.1918F, 768, 178 Pac. 799, the Montana court said: "Though the state may confer upon a city authority to enter into a contract for specific rates for a given period, since the effect of such a grant is to extinguish, pro tanto, a governmental power of first importance, the courts will not indulge the presumption that such a surrender of power has been made, unless the legislative intention is expressed in clear and unmistakable language, or is necessarily implied from the powers expressly granted; and all doubts will be resolved in favor of the continuance of the power."

And "unless the right to exercise the police power of regulating rates is referable to an unmistakable grant, the prices specified in the franchise are not exempt from interference by the legislative assembly." Woodburn v. Public Service Commission (1916) 82 Or. 114, L.R.A.1917C, 98, P.U.R.1917B, 967, 161 Pac. 391, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 996.

So, in Sandpoint Water & Light Co. v. Sandpoint (1918) 31 Idaho, 498, L.R.A.1918F, 1106, P.U.R.1918F, 737, 173 Pac. 972, the Idaho supreme court said: "When such abrogation [of the rate-making power of the state] is based upon an alleged contract, made through the agency of a municipality of the state, the power of the municipality so to bind the state must appear in clear and unmistakable language."

And it is only where the right is very clearly conferred that the state will be held to have relinquished its power to enact laws regulating rates. Manitowoc v. Manitowoc & N. Traction Co. (1911) 145 Wis. 13, 140 Am. St. Rep. 1056, 129 N. W. 925.

The general law of Maine does not confer upon any municipality the right to regulate the rates which water companies may charge domestic consumers; nor can such power be implied from the power granted in the charter of a municipality to contract for water for "municipal and fire purposes." Re Lincoln Water Co. (1919; Me.) P.U.R. 1919B, 752.

A constitutional provision that a city of a certain class "may frame a charter for its own government" does not give it authority to include in its charter the power to fix rates, so as to take away from the commission such power. Yuma Gaslight & Water Co. v. Yuma (1919) — Ariz. —, 178 Pac. 26. To the same effect, see State ex rel. United R. Co. v. Public Service Commission (1917) 270 Mo. 429, P.U.R.1917E, 752, 192 S. W. 958, 198 S. W. 872.

And the power of a municipality to make a franchise contract, binding as against the state's power to regulate rates through a commission, is not to be inferred from a home rule feature of a Constitution giving cities the right to frame, adopt, and amend their charters, and pass all laws and ordinances relating to their municipal concerns. Traverse City v. Michigan R. Commission (1918) — Mich. —, P.U.R. 1918F, 752, 168 N. W. 481.

A statutory provision that no license or franchise shall be granted to a utility to operate within the streets or alleys of a city, in any other form or manner than by ordinance passed and published in a prescribed manner, does not limit or prohibit the assumption of rate-making power by the legis-

3. Effect of control of municipality over streets.

And the power of a municipality to make an inviolable contract as to rates is not to be inferred or implied from the power granted to a municipality to control its streets and to regulate the use thereof by public utilities.

Utah.—SALT LAKE CITY v. UTAH LIGHT & TRACTION CO. (reported herewith) ante, 715.

Thus, in SALT LAKE CITY v. UTAH LIGHT & TRACTION CO. (reported herewith), in speaking of the constitutional provisions that no law shall be passed granting the right to construct and operate a street railroad within any city without the consent of the local authorities, it was said: "It is universally held that the regulation and fixing of rates is a governmental function, that is, a legislative function, which will not be deemed to have been surrendered by the sovereign state unless it has been done in clear and unequivocal terms. A mere cursory reading of § 8 of the Constitution, which we have before quoted, shows that no express right is conferred upon the local authorities of this state to enter into any contract respecting the fixing of rates. True it is that, in determining the conditions upon which street railways may be constructed and operated within the cities, the local authorities may determine the fares that may be charged and collected. The authority to do that is, however, merely implied; and there is nothing in the Constitution which prohibits the legislature from exercising its prerogative in changing the rates of fare in case they are found to be unreasonable, unfair, or oppressive as against the public on the one hand, and unfair or unjust or confiscatory as against the railway company upon the other."

So, in State ex rel. Billings v. Billings Gas Co. (1918) — Mont. —, P.U.R.1918F, 768, 173 Pac. 799, in speaking of the provision giving the municipality power to control the use of the street, the Montana court said: "We do not believe that it was the purpose of the legislature, by the very general language in the paragraphs cited, to surrender fully the distinctively governmental function to regulate rates, but rather to permit municipalities to protect themselves and their inhabitants against extortionate rates until the state itself should act in the premises."

And in State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Mitchell v. Chicago & W. T. R. Co. (1916) 275 Ill. 555, P.U.R. 1917B, 1046, 114 N. E. 325, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 50, in speaking of a similar provision in the Illinois Constitution, the court said: "That provision is simply a limitation of the general power of the legislature, and in one particular only. It provides, in substance, that the legislature may not grant the right to construct and operate a street railroad within a municipality without requiring the consent of the local authorities having control of the streets or highways proposed to be occupied. That section of the Constitution does not, by implication or otherwise, . . . deprive the legislature of its power to fix rates for such companies."

So, the power of a municipality to regulate rates cannot be inferred from power "to have and exercise exclusive control over the streets and alleys, avenues and sidewalks, of the town." Tempe v. Mountain States Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1915; Ariz.) P.U.R.1915D, 716.

The power of the Pennsylvania Commission to determine the reasonableness of street railway rates is not affected by a maximum rate provision in a municipal ordinance, attached as a condition to the grant of the right to occupy the street, under a constitutional provision that no "street passenger railway shall be constructed within the limits of any city, borough, or township, without the consent of the local authorities." Wilkesburg v. Pittsburgh R Co. (1918; Pa.) P.U.R.1918F, 131; Harbor Creek Twp. v. Buffalo & L. E. Traction Co. (1918; Pa.) P.U.R.1918F, 164.

The constitutional provision against granting the right to construct and operate a street railway within any city, town, or village, without acquiring the consent of the local authorities, is rather a limitation upon the power of the legislature than a grant of power to the city, and cannot be construed to be a grant of power to fix or regulate rates. Re United R. Co. (1918; Mo.) P.U.R.1918D, 392.

The power of a public service commission to increase franchise rates is not barred by a constitutional provision that the legislature shall not grant the right to construct and operate a street railway within a city without acquiring the consent of the local authorities, where the constitutional provision does not give the city any right to impose conditions upon granting the consent required; since, although the power to impose conditions upon granting admission must be deemed to be included in the greater power to exclude absolutely the street railway, nevertheless, since the Constitution is silent upon the question and does not give the municipality the express power to prescribe such conditions as, for instance, the fixing of the fares to be charged, such rate-making power must be deemed to be left in the state, and consequently can be delegated by the state to the public service commission. St. Louis v. Public Service Commission (1918) — Mo. —, P.U.R.1919C, 10, 207 S. W. 799.

4. Distinction between power of municipality to make rates for itself and power to make rates for its inhabitants.

A distinction has been noted between cases in which the service for which the franchise fixes the rates is to be rendered to the city itself, and those in which the service is to be rendered to inhabitants of the city.

Thus, in People ex rel. South Glens Falls v. Public Service Commission (1919) 225 N. Y. 216, P.U.R.1919C, 374, 212 N. E. 777, the New York court of appeals, in holding that the Commission had power to increase rates for gas fixed in a municipal franchise, said: "In the first place, we must note the distinction between a contract made by a gas company to furnish the municipality 'itself' with light, and the terms and conditions upon which a municipality grants a franchise to furnish gas to its 'inhabitants.' In the first instance, the arrangement may be a contract pure and simple, protected by the Constitution, both Federal and state, from subsequent abrogation even by the legislature, unless such power is reserved."

And in Re Lincoln Water Co. (1919; Me.) P.U.R.1919B, 752, the same distinction was noted; but it was held that the general law of Maine does not confer upon any municipality the power to regulate the rates which water companies may charge domestic consumers, and such power cannot be implied from the power granted in the charter of a municipality to contract for water for "municipal and fire purposes;" nor does such power to contract constitute a delegation of the power to fix rates for such water, beyond the power of the state to alter.

In the following cases the commission was, as a matter of fact, dealing with rates for service to be rendered to the city itself, but no distinction is noticed, and the decision is based upon general grounds which would be equally applicable if the rates fixed were to be paid by the inhabitants of the city: Sausalito v. Marian Water & P. Co. (1915; Cal.) P.U.R.1916A, 244; Re City Water Co. (1916) 4 Mo. P. S. C. 140, P.U.R.1917B, 624; Ben Avon v. Ohio Valley Water Co. (1917; Pa.) P.U.R.1917C, 390.

That the state, acting through a public service commission, may increase rates fixed in a franchise for service to be rendered to the city itself, was expressly held by the Federal circuit court of appeals in Salem v. Salem Water, Light, & P. Co. (1919) — C. C. A. —, 255 Fed. 295. It was here contended by the city that the right to obtain hydrant service, at rates not to exceed those specified in a franchise, was held by the city purely in its proprietary capacity. The court, however, in answer to this contention, said: "But as the municipal corporation is but a political subdivision of the state, and exists by virtue of the exercise of the power of the state through its legislative department, it is our opinion that the city had no absolute property right to demand continued hydrant service at a given rate, as against the right of the state to modify such rates of service with the consent of the water company, notwithstanding the fact that as to the water company itself the contract might be unalterable except with its consent."

In many cases, of course, the city itself may be interested in the rates charged ordinary consumers; as, for instance, in the case of street railway rates where the city has to pay for the transportation of its employees, or in gas and electric cases where the ordinary rates for domestic or commercial service are applicable to the lighting of public buildings; there does not seem to be any distinction made in these cases, however.

In a number of cases it has been held that the commission has power to abolish requirements that service be given free to municipalities, although such requirements are provided for in franchises, but this view is usually based upon the theory that contracts for free service, being discriminatory, are illegal, and consequently invalid; if not void ab initio, they become illegal after the passage of the Public Service Act: Tempe v. Mountain States Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1915; Ariz.) P.U.R.1915D, 716; Landon v. Lawrence (1915; Kan.) P.U.R.1915E, 763; Re Augusta Water Dist. (1916) 2 Am. Rep. Me. P. U. C. 183, P.U.R. 1916E, 31; Public Service Electric Co. v. Public Utility Comrs. (1915) 87 N. J. L. 128, P.U.R.1915C, 229, 98 Atl. 707, affirmed in (1916) 88 N. J. L. 603, P.U.R.1916D, 107, 96 Atl. 1015; Kenosha v. Kenosha Home Teleph. Co. (1912) 149 Wis. 338, 135 N. W. 848.

In Sandpoint Water & Light Co. v. Sandpoint (1918) 31 Idaho, 498, L.R.A. 1918F, 1106, P.U.R.1918F, 737, 173 Pac. 972, the court held that the commission had the right to eliminate discriminatory rates contained in the franchise in favor of the municipality; but the decision was not based upon the fact that such rates were illegal, but rather upon the general ground that the state, as principal, has power to waive any rights which the city, its agent, had in the contract.

5. Rule in Ohio and Virginia.

The rule in Ohio seems to be definitely settled that the municipalities in that state have the power, both constitutional and statutory, to make inviolable contracts as to rates.

Article 18, § 4, of the Constitution, provides as follows: "Any municipality may acquire, construct, own, lease and operate within or without its corporate limits, any public utility the product or service of which is or is to be supplied to the municipality or its inhabitants, and may contract with others for any such product or service."

Section 9113 of the General Code of the state, in speaking of the powers of the municipality councils and county commissioners, provides that the "council or the commissioners, as the case may be, shall have the power to fix the terms and conditions upon which such railways may be constructed, operated, extended, and consolidated."

The Ohio supreme court in INTER-URBAN R. & TERMINAL CO. v. PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 696, in passing upon the power of the Public Utilities Commission to authorize an increase in rates beyond the rates fixed in certain grants by municipalities in the state, held in the syllabus by the court, as follows: "A contract concerning proprietary rights and harmless in itself, made by a municipality in the exercise of powers clearly conferred, is protected by the Constitution, and the police power cannot be invoked to abrogate or impair it." Similar decisions were made at the same time in the cases of Mahoning & S. R. & Light Co. v. Public Utilities Commission (1918) — Ohio St. —, 120 N. E. 835, and Toledo, B. G. & S. Traction Co. v. Public Utilities Commission (1918) — Ohio St. —, 120 N. E. 835.

The Ohio Public Utilities Commission had previously taken the same position in Re Mahoning & S. R. & Light Co. (1918; Ohio) P.U.R.1918B, 69.

The same principle was enunciated in CINCINNATI v. PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 705, although an entirely different state of facts was presented. The city of Cincinnati had granted to a gas company the right for twenty-five years to operate in its streets, subject to the right of the city to regulate the price of gas from time to time, this right being also contained in statutes then in effect. After the grant had been accepted by the utility, the city fixed rates for a ten-year period. After the expiration of this time, the city again fixed the rate for ten years, and the utility, claiming that this new rate was unreasonable, appealed to the Commission to fix a reasonable rate, but the supreme court, in holding that the Commission had no power to regulate the rates, said: "As we have seen, the state and Federal courts have held that, in Ohio, 'express and unmistakable authority' was conferred on the city to make a contract such as is involved here, and, during the life of the contract, the parties operating under it are bound by its terms."

In Columbus R. Power & Light Co. v. Columbus (1918) 253 Fed. 499, the United States district court, in construing the Ohio statute, said: "The law, as settled by these cases, is that the legislature has, by these sections, delegated to municipal corporations full power and authority to enter into contracts for the maintenance and operation of street railway lines; that whatever the city in fact does pursuant thereto is the act of the state, and is mutually binding upon the parties. Franchise grants for fixed terms not exceeding twenty-five years, and for a fixed rate of fare to continue during the term of such grants, may lawfully be made by the city under this legislative delegation of power. If the city passes an ordinance purporting to grant a franchise for a fixed term, with a rate of fare to endure during that term, and this ordinance is accepted, expressly or impliedly, a contract is engendered, mutually binding and unalterable, except by the consent of both parties, during the term thereof."

The decision in this case was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court in Columbus R. Power & Light Co. v. Columbus (U. S. Adv. Ops. 1918-19, p. 416) — U. S. —, 63 L. ed. —, P.U.R.1919D, 239, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 849. It should be noted that this case is not strictly in point, as it was an action in equity for an injunction to restrain the city from enforcing an ordinance which would compel the street railway company to operate in accordance with the provisions of the franchise.

A decision of the Virginia Commission is in line with these Ohio cases. Thus, in Com. ex rel. Clifton Forge v. Virginia-Western Power Co. (1918; Va.) P.U.R.1918F, 791, the Virginia Commission held that the constitutional and statutory provisions of the state constituted express authority to the councils of the cities and towns to enter into contract with public service corporations, fixing the maximum rates of charge for services rendered within said cities and towns, and the Commission had no jurisdiction to authorize an increase above the maximum fixed by the ordinance.

The great weight of authority is to the effect that while a municipality may, in the absence of any direct action by the state, enter into a contract with a public utility, whereby the rates to be charged by the latter are fixed, and such contract, as between the parties themselves, is binding, nevertheless the state has power which it may delegate to an administrative body, such as a public service commission, to increase such rates, when because of increased costs or any other reason such rates are no longer reasonable. In other words, franchise rate contracts are not such contracts as may not be increased by the state, without infringing the constitutional guaranty.

This rule apparently has not been expressly repudiated in any jurisdiction except Ohio and Virginia, where, as is shown above, the cities have been given express and definite power to make inviolable contracts as to rates.

In general terms it may be said that these decisions rest on two general grounds. First, franchise contracts must be deemed to have been entered into with knowledge of the inherent and reserved power of the state to alter such contracts when necessary so to do for the public welfare; second, municipalities being merely agents of the state, the state may, at any time, waive the rights of the municipality in the contract.

Not every case which passes upon the question makes the distinction between these two grounds, and frequently both reasons are given for the decision. The attempt has been made, however, to separate the decisions, according as they lay the greater emphasis upon the one or the other of the two doctrines.

That franchise rate contracts must be deemed to have been made subject to the governmental power of the state to alter for the public welfare has been held in a large number of cases in which it has been sought to have franchise rates increased.

It is to be noted that the rule adopted by the above cases, that the power of the public service commission to increase rates fixed by franchise is based upon the reserve and paramount power of the state over rate regulation, is applicable, even if the attempt is made to reduce rates; the utilities cannot rely upon the franchise to protect a favorable rate any more than can the city. Both parties must yield to the paramount power of the state.

This double-edged effect of the rule is illustrated in a case coming before the Missouri Commission.

Thus, in Louisiana v. Louisiana Water Co. (1918; Mo.) P.U.R.1918B, 774, the city of Louisiana claimed that the rates of the utility were excessive, and asked that they be reduced notwithstanding the existence of the franchise fixing the rates. The company, in its original answer, denied that the rates were excessive, and further denied the power of the Commission to interfere in the contractual relation between the company and the city. Later, this objection was withdrawn, and the company acknowledged the jurisdiction of the Commission, and asked it to grant a more compensatory rate. The Commission said: "While the attitude of the parties in this proceeding is, in a sense, reversed by the above changes, the question of the Commission's jurisdiction over franchise rates is again in question." The Commission held that it had power to increase the rates notwithstanding the franchise terms.

A number of concise judicial statements of this rule will tend to give a better idea of its far-reaching effect.

Thus, a franchise contract, fixing rates which a telephone company may charge within a city, is permissive only, and although binding between the parties to it in the absence of governmental interposition, "is to be construed as having been entered into with reference to the right and power of the government to assert and exercise its inherent and paramount authority." Traverse City v. Michigan R. Commission (1918) — Mich. —, P.U.R.1918F, 752, 168 N. W. 481.

So, in SALT LAKE CITY v. UTAH LIGHT & TRACTION Co. (reported herewith) ante, 715, the court said: "Every contract fixing rates entered into between the cities of this state and street railway companies, both under the Constitution and the statute, is always subject to change by the paramount power of the state, and the right of the state to so change the rates continues unless and until the legislature has, in express terms, surrendered the power or delegated it to some other arm of the state."

So, too, franchise rate contracts, "when entered into without express legislative authority, are permissive only, and subject to the exercise of the sovereign power of the state, and do not partake of the quality of contracts, as that term is employed in the contract clause of the Federal Constitution." State ex rel. Webster v. Superior Ct. (1912) 67 Wash. 37, L.R.A. 1915C, 287, 120 Pac. 861, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 78.

Again, it cannot be said that the Public Utilities Act, conferring power upon the Commission to regulate rates, impairs the obligation of a franchise contract fixing the rates which a public utility may charge, since both parties to the contract "must have entered into it with full knowledge that in the state itself reposed the sovereign power of rate regulation." State ex rel. Billings v. Billings Gas Co. (1918) — Mont. —, P.U.R.1918F, 768, 173 Pac. 799.

The Missouri Public Service Commission in Louisiana v. Louisiana Water Co. (1918; Mo.) P.U.R.1918B, 774, very concisely states the principle in the following language: "Contracting parties to these franchise ordinances should not overlook the fact that there is yet another party at interest to these contracts, which is the state of Missouri, exercising its right of regulation of the subject-matter of these contracts by virtue of the sovereign police power of the state."

If the franchise granted by a city to a utility is to be deemed a contract, then the mere fact that it was made prior to the enactment of a public utility statute, and before the state had attempted to regulate the rates, does not debar the state from increasing the rates fixed in the contract, for the reason that the law wrote into it a stipulation by the city that the state could, at any time, exercise its police power and change the rates; and therefore, when the state does exercise its police power, it does not work an impairment of any obligation of the contract. Woodburn v. Public Service Commission (1916) 82 Or. 114, L.R.A.

And in People ex rel. South Glens Falls v. Public Service Commission (1919) 225 N. Y. 216, P.U.R.1919C, 374, 121 N. E. 777, the New York court of appeals expressly held that regulations regarding rates which municipalities may impose in granting licenses or permission to use their streets to public service corporations cannot be said to form contracts beyond the police power of the legislature to modify for the public welfare. This decision was based upon the broad ground that changing conditions, improvements in the art, inventions, and growth in population might render such regulations detrimental to the public welfare and therefore, under the broad police powers of the state, such regulations might be modified.

A state is not deprived of the right to regulate the rates of a public utility by a franchise rate contract, granted under a statute giving the municipality exclusive power over its streets, since such contract, although valid and binding as between the city and the utility, is subject to the state's power to protect the public, reserved because not expressly waived. Winfield v. Public Service Commission (1918) — Ind. —, P.U.R.1918B, 747, 118 N. E. 531. The Indiana Commission at first held that it was not invested with power to regulate rates of a public utility, where a valid contractual rate had been established between the utility and the municipality. Tipton Teleph. Co. v. Tipton (1915; Ind.) P.U.R.1915C, 351; Re Union Traction Co. (1917; Ind.) P.U.R.1918B, 663. These decisions, however, have been overruled in effect by the supreme court of Indiana, in the Winfield Case.

The rule that franchise rates may be increased by public service commissions, exercising the paramount power of the state over rate regulations, has been adopted in the following cases, in which some unusual features either of law or fact were present:

Thus, any implied power to make a rate contract which a city may possess, arising out of its charter power to "contract and be contracted with," or otherwise, is inferior to the reserve power of the state to regulate rates of public utilities. Benwood v. Public Service Commission (1914) 75 W. Va. 127, L.R.A.1915C, 261, 83 S. E. 295.

And notwithstanding Oklahoma statutes had conferred upon cities of the first class the express power to fix rates, such power, not being conferred by the Constitution, could be subsequently taken away by the legislature and conferred upon the Commission; and, the legislature having done so, the Commission had the power to increase rates fixed by franchise by such a city before its power had been taken away. Pawhuska v. Pawhuska Oil & Gas Co. (1917) — Okla. —, P.U.R.1917F, 226, 166 Pac. 1058.

The Missouri supreme court has held that, under a constitutional provision that the exercise of the police power of the state shall never be abridged, the legislature itself cannot abridge the police power of the state and has no power to delegate to a municipality the right to limit the police power in any way. Consequently, a provision in a franchise limiting the rate which a utility may charge within the city, although a valid contract as between the municipality and the utility themselves, cannot stand as against the order of the Public Service Commission for reasonable rates, whether such reasonable rates be lower or higher than the contract rates. State ex rel. Sedalia v. Public Service Commission (1918) — Mo. —, P.U.R. 1919C, 507, 204 S. W. 497. This decision was followed in Fulton v. Public Service Commission (1918) — Mo. —, 204 S. W. 386.

And in Kansas City Bolt & Nut Co. v. Kansas City Light & P. Co. (1918) — Mo. —, 204 S. W. 1074, in speaking of the Sedalia Case, the Missouri supreme court said: "It was there held (1) that the power to make rates for public service arises from the police power of the state; (2) that the instrumentality designated by statute to exercise such rate-making power is a public service commission: (3) that under the provision of article 12, § 5, Constitution of Missouri, the police power cannot be abridged by contract; (4) that, therefore, when the Public Service Commission fixes a schedule of reasonable rates for public service, in conformity with the provisions of the Public Service Commission Act, such rates automatically supersede all contract rates coming in conflict therewith."

The case of Leiper v. Baltimore & P. R. Co. (1918) 262 Pa. 328, P.U.R. 1919C, 397, 105 Atl. 551, indicates the attitude of the Pennsylvania courts, although the case is not strictly in point, because dealing with a contract between an individual and a utility. In holding that that Commission had the power to increase the rates fixed in the contract, the court set out the provision of the Pennsylvania Constitution to the effect that the exercise of the police power of the state shall never be abridged, or so construed as to permit corporations to conduct their business in such manner as to infringe the equal rights of individuals, or the general well-being of the state. The court then said: "To permit the contract made between the appellee and the appellant to stand as against rates established in a legal and orderly method, in conformity with the provisions of the law, would be to nullify the purposes of the act. It would be impossible for the Commission to enforce an equality of reasonable rates except upon the basis that it is not bound by contract previously entered into between a public service company and either a municipality, another corporation, or a private individual." The court further said: "It therefore follows that when, as in this case, the parties enter into a contract with a public service corporation relating to rates, they are presumed to have done so with the knowledge that the right of the state to exercise the police power in the future is expressly reserved, and that, where the common weal and the interest of the public demand that the provisions of the contract thus entered into shall be modified, it can be done without any violation of the provision of the Constitution of the United States with reference to the impairment of the obligations of contracts."

In Manitowoc v. Manitowoc & N. Traction Co. (1911) 145 Wis. 13, 140 Am. St. Rep. 1056, 129 N. W. 925, which was an action to enjoin a street railway company from raising the rates fixed in a municipal franchise, the Wisconsin supreme court directed judgment to be entered, enjoining the defendant railroad company from raising the rates "until such time as such rates are changed by the legislature, or through a legislative agency, in the manner provided by law."

3. Power of state, as principal, to waive rights of city, its agent.

Again, the view is asserted that while franchise contracts as to rates may have been valid when made, the city, as one of the contracting parties, was acting only as the agent of the state, and the state, as principal, may at any time waive any of its rights therein.

Thus, in Winfield v. Public Service Commission (Ind.) supra, the Indiana supreme court said: "The municipality, so far as affects the public welfare, acts, in granting franchises to public service corporations, as the agent of the state."

And in Salem v. Salem Water, Light & P. Co. P.U.R.1919C, —, — C. C. A. —, 255 Fed. 295, which was an action by a water company against a city to recover for fire hydrant service furnished to the city, the charges for which service were based upon an order of the Public Service Commission, and not upon a lower maximum rate, named in the franchise granted by the city to the water company, the Federal circuit court of appeals held that as the municipal corporation was but a political subdivision of the state, and existed by virtue of the exercise of the power of the state through its legislative department, it had no absolute property right to demand continued hydrant service at the franchise rate, as against the right of the state to modify such rate with the consent of the water company, notwithstanding the fact that, as to the water company itself, the contract might be unalterable except with its consent.

So, too, a municipality has no vested right to the exercise of rate-making power, nor can it obtain a vested right in any contract entered into or property acquired through the exercise of such powers, as against the right of the state, its creator, to assume complete control of its affairs. Sandpoint Water & Light Co. v. Sandpoint (1918) 31 Idaho, 498, L.R.A.1918F, 1106, P.U.R.1918F, 737, 173 Pac. 972.

And in People ex rel. South Glens Falls v. New York Public Service Commission (1919) 225 N. Y. 216, P.U.R.1919C, 374, 121 N. E. 777, the New York court of appeals said: "A municipal corporation is simply a political subdivision of the state and exists by virtue of legislative enactment. Rate regulation is a matter of the police power of the state and the terms and conditions, such as here in question, contained in a franchise to a service corporation, may be modified, without impairing the obligation of a contract within the provisions of the Constitution."

So, the Oregon Commission may increase street railway rates beyond the amount fixed by city ordinance, without impairing the contract or depriving the city of property without due process; since the city, in making the contract, acts as agent of the state, and the state, by the action of the Commission, consents to this change in the agreement. Portland v. Public Service Commission (1918) 89 Or. 325, P.U.R.1919A, 127, 173 Pac. 1178.

In granting locations to street railways, boards of selectmen and boards of aldermen are public officers, and not agents of their respective towns and cities, and the state exercises its sovereign power through them as its instruments. Therefore, the legislature has the power, so far as concerns these public officers and the municipality by which they were elected, to change or abrogate the terms of such location. Board of Survey v. Bay State Street R. Co. (1916) 224 Mass. 463, 113 N. E. 273. The court said: "Although phrased in the form of a contract and securing valuable financial obligations to the cities and towns, the power of the legislature to modify to their loss such locations has been settled, after great consideration and vigorous protest from the interested municipalities."

"The municipality, created by the state as an agency for the convenient administration of the state government, holds rights acquired in that capacity for its principal, to be dealt with by the latter at its pleasure; and . . . while it may, if clothed with appropriate authority, vest in a public utility or other corporation certain inviolable property rights growing out of contracts, the benefits which it receives for itself are held subject to the will of the state." Re Lincoln Water Co. (1919; Me.) P.U.R.1919B, 752.

So, a contract between a municipality and a water company, fixing rates to private consumers, does not prevent the Board of Public Utility Commissioners from fixing a higher rate, as against the objection of the municipality and consumers, since the state, through the agency of the board, may waive the contract rights of the public, without improperly impairing the obligation of the contract. North Wildwood v. Public Utility Comrs. (1915) 88 N. J. L. 81, P.U.R.1916B, 77, 95 Atl. 749.

In Atlantic Coast Electric R. Co. v. Public Utility Comrs. (1916) 89 N. J. L. 407, P.U.R.1917B, 949, 99 Atl. 395, the supreme court of New Jersey held that a rate fixed in a franchise could not be reduced by the Commission. This was construed as authority by the Commission, in Re Northampton, E. & W. Traction Co. (1917; N. J.) P.U.R. 1917F, 123, for the ruling that the Commission could not increase the rates fixed in a franchise. But the order of the Commission was set aside by the supreme court, in Northampton, E. & W. Traction Co. v. Public Utility Comrs. (1918) — N. J. L. —, 102 Atl. 930. It should also be noted that the court of errors and appeals reversed the supreme court, in the Atlantic Coast Electric R. Co. Case (1918) — N. J. L. —, — A.L.R. —, P.U.R.1919C, 489, 104 Atl. 218, and held that the power of the municipality to grant or refuse consent to a location of tracks, and to impose lawful restrictions, did not carry with it the implied power to make an inviolable contract as to rates, which could not be reduced by the Commission without violating the constitutional prohibition against impairment of contract obligations.

Of course, the Commission will be considered as having power to increase rates if a municipality waives any rights which it may have in the contract. Re People's Natural Gas Co. (1915; N. Y. 2d Dist.) P.U.R.1916A, 349; Re Hudson Valley R. Co. (1918; N. Y. 2d Dist.) P.U.R.1919B, 448.

It is to be noted that the rule that municipalities, in making rate contracts, are acting merely as agents of the state, would not apply were the attempt made to reduce the franchise rates against the protest of the utility, and it apparently carries the implication that as to the utility the franchise constitutes an inviolable contract. But it should also be noted that this rule is very frequently stated as merely supplementary to the rule above set forth, that the rights of both parties must yield to the paramount power of the state.

III. Delegation of power of state to commission.

As was stated above, it is assumed in many cases that the commission has been delegated the plenary power of the state over rates, but the question whether there has been such delegation has been expressly raised and passed upon in some of the cases.

In several jurisdictions it has been held that, whatever may be the power of the state to increase franchise rates, this power has not been delegated to the commission.

Thus, under a constitutional provision that the general assembly shall not authorize the construction of any street railway within the limits of any incorporated town or city without consent of the corporate authorities, a city may reasonably and legally impose terms fixing the rates of such utility before granting its consent to the use of the streets; such a contract, when accepted by the utility, although made subject to the right of the state to change the same, is beyond the power of the Georgia Commission to change, where the statute giving the Commission power over street railways contains the proviso that nothing therein contained shall be construed to impair any valid subsisting contract now in existence between any municipality and any company, and that the act shall not operate as the repeal of any existing municipal ordinance. Re Georgia R. & P. Co. (1918; Ga.) P.U.R.1918F, 624.

Again, in QUINBY v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 685, the New York court of appeals held that the legislature had not delegated power to the Commission to increase rates of fare on street railways, which had been agreed upon by the railway and the local authorities. The court said that, in the absence of clear and definite language conferring such power upon the Commission, it should not unnecessarily hold that the legislature had intended to delegate any of its powers in the matter, whatever such powers might be.

The following statement includes practically everything said by the court: It is impossible to find a word in the statute which discloses the legislative intent to deal with the matters of rates fixed by agreement with local authorities. As it has often been held in connections other than that of legislative power over them, that such agreements are valid, it may well be inferred that the legislature excluded them from consideration by failure to mention them, and that it has made no attempt to turn them over to the Public Service Commission for revision. The authority of the Commission to regulate rates in such cases, and thus to extinguish an undoubted power of the local authorities, should fairly appear before it is assumed to exist.

But in People ex rel. South Glens Falls v. New York Public Service Commission (1919) 225 N. Y. 216, P.U.R. 1919C, 374, 121 N. E. 777, it was held that the New York Commission had the power to fix the price of gas for a company operating in a community, for which the legislature itself had not fixed a price, notwithstanding the price fixed in a contract by virtue of which the gas company was occupying the streets of the village. Standing by itself this decision is apparently in accord with the great weight of authority, but it is extremely difficult to reconcile this case with the decision of the same court in QUINBY v.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION (cited above and reported herewith). In speaking of the QUINBY CASE, Judge Crane, who wrote the prevailing opinion in the South Glens Falls Case, said: "This case is not inconsistent or contrary to what is here stated. The matter there at issue was a railroad rate, fixed by city charter, and contained in the street franchise to the company. We held that in view of article 3, § 18, of the Constitution, requiring the consent of the local authorities to the construction of a railroad, the power given to the Public Service Commission to modify this rate should be distinctly and expressly conferred, and such power had not been given." Judge Chase, however, in a dissenting opinion, after calling attention to the fact that the constitutional provision in question did not in any way prescribe or limit the fares to be charged by a street railway corporation, said: "It does not in any way affect the question now before us, relating to the power of the Public Service Commission to increase the maximum rate of fare to be charged by street railroad corporations, or the price of gas to be charged by gas corporations, over and above the amount agreed upon by the street railroad or gas companies, respectively, and the municipality. . . . Both cases should, in my judgment, stand upon the language quoted from the Quinby opinion, to the effect that the legislature did not intend to delegate its power in cases where the rates of fare or price of gas had been established by and between the street railroad or gas companies, respectively, and the municipality."

In an attempt to reconcile these decisions, it should be borne in mind that there is one distinction between street railway cases and gas or other utility cases. Article 3, § 18, of the New York Constitution, provides that no law shall authorize the construction or operation of a street railroad, except upon the condition that the consent of the owners of one half in value of the property bounded on, "and the consent, also, of the local authorities having the control of that portion of a street or highway upon which it is proposed to construct or operate, such railroad, be first obtained." There appears to be no such constitutional provision applicable to utilities other than street railways. Of course, if the view is taken that this constitutional provision does give the municipality certain rights with regard to the fixing of rates, such right cannot be taken away by any act of the legislature. But the view may possibly be taken that, under this constitutional provision, the municipalities had for years assumed certain rights which had been more or less recognized by the legislature and by the courts, and it would not be assumed that such rights, whatever in fact they might be, were taken away by the legislature, in the absence of "clear and definite language." It must be admitted that the language used by Judge Pound in the QUINBY CASE is general, that no apparent distinction was made between street railways and any other utility, and that the decision apparently turned upon nothing other than the power of the commission in "the matter of rates fixed by agreement with local authorities." But the court was, as a matter of fact, dealing with a street railway company, and the Constitution had given the municipality some power with reference to street railways which it had not given to them with respect to other utilities.

Prior to the decision of the New York court of appeals in the QUINBY CASE, the New York Commission, first district, had held that it did not have authority to increase the rates of a street railway company in excess of the maximum charge stipulated in a franchise. Re New York & N. S. Traction Co. (1918; N. Y.) P.U.R.1918A, 893.

The appellate division, third department, of the New York supreme court, had, however, held to the contrary, in People ex rel. New York & N. S. Traction Co. v. Public Service Commission (1916) 175 App. Div. 869, P.U.R.1917B, 957, 162 N. Y. Supp. 405. This decision of the appellate division was followed by the New York Commission, second district, in Walton v. Walton People's Teleph. Co. (1917; N. Y.) P.U.R.1917E, 774; Frankfort v. Utica Gas & E. Co. (1917; N. Y.) P.U.R.1917E, 900; South Glens Falls v. United Gas, Electric Light & Fuel Co. (1917; N. Y.) P.U.R.1918A, 888; Re Huntington R. Co. (1917; N. Y.) P.U.R.1918A, 249.

The decision of the appellate division must be considered as overruled, in effect, by the decision of the court of appeals in the QUINBY CASE, while the decision of the Commission in the South Glens Falls Case was affirmed by the court of appeals in People ex rel. South Glens Falls v. Public Service Commission (1919) 225 N. Y. 216, P.U.R.1919C, 374, 121 N. E. 777. This decision of the court of appeals may be considered as supporting the decision of the Commission in the Frankfort Case, which was another gas case, and also in the Walton Case, which was a telephone case.

The QUINBY CASE was subsequently followed by the New York Commission, first district, in Re Third Ave. R. Co. (1918; N. Y.) P.U.R.1918E, 100.

The Federal court in Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co. v. Binghamton R. Co. (1919) P.U.R.1919C, 780, 255 Fed. 378, recognized the principles enunciated by the New York court of appeals in QUINBY v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 685, to the effect that the Public Service Commissions of New York had not been granted the power by the legislature to increase fares fixed in a franchise to a street railway company; but held further that a maximum-fare provision in a franchise ordinance, in which the motive power of a street railway was limited to horses or mules, is abrogated by a subsequent ordinance, silent as to fares, which authorized the company to change its motive power to electricity.

In a number of jurisdictions it has been held that the public service commission has plenary power to increase rates, although fixed in municipal franchises; in other words, the legislature has delegated to the commission any power which it, itself, may have had in the premises.

Thus, in Robertson v. Wilmington & P. Traction Co. (1918) — Del. —, P.U.R.1919B, 129, 104 Atl. 839, the court said: "When the board is given power to hear complaints concerning rates charged by a railway company, or other public utility, and make such orders as it may deem proper concerning such rates, we must conclude that it had the power to change any rate which the legislature could have changed."

So, in Benwood v. Public Service Commission (W. Va.) supra, the court said: "The language of the act is so plain that all doubt as to the power of the commission for general and statewide administration of rates, for service rendered by corporations or individuals to the public, must be eliminated."

And in Pawhuska v. Pawhuska Oil & Gas Co. (1917) — Okla. —, P.U.R. 1917F, 226, 166 Pac. 1058, the court said that the Corporation Commission is vested with authority to make all valid and lawful orders prescribing rates, which the state, in the exercise of its sovereign capacity, could prescribe or make.

So, too, in Board of Survey v. Bay State Street R. Co. (1916) 224 Mass. 463, 118 N. E. 273, after setting out various provisions of the statute, including provisions that the Commission has power to increase rates insufficient to yield a reasonable return for the service rendered, the court said: "It is manifest that such broad powers justly cannot be exercised to the extent conferred by the words used, except when joined either with equally full power to regulate charges, rates, and fares, or with freedom of action by the carrier in these respects, so as to enable the carrier to receive a fair return for the service required.

. . . The statute is a legislative determination that it is unwise and inexpedient longer to permit the full development of interurban transportation by street railways to be hampered by conditions as to fares, contained in locations granted by the public officers of different municipalities." This decision was cited and followed in the Bay State Rate Case (1916) 4 Ann. Rep. Mass. P. S. C. 3, P.U.R. 1916F, 221.

That the power to increase franchise rates had been delegated to the Commission is also asserted in Re Norfolk & B. Street R. Co. (1915) 3 Ann. Rep. Mass. P. S. C. 112, P.U.R. 1915E, 411, where the Massachusetts Public Service Commission cited the Middlesex & B. Rate Case (1914) 2 Ann. Rep. Mass. P. S. C. 99, in which the Commission laid down the following ruling: "The Commission rules as a matter of law that any alleged conditions or limitations as to fares, contained in original grants of locations or growing out of agreements, or attempted agreements, between municipal authorities and the petitioning railway company or any of its antecedent constituent corporations, are not valid and controlling as against the rate-making power now vested in this Commission by the Public Service Act."

Again, in Collingswood Sewerage Co. v. Collingswood (1918) 91 N. J. L. 20, P.U.R. 1918C, 261, 102 Atl. 901, the supreme court of New Jersey said that the commission was authorized to raise rates by § 16c of the Public Utility Act, which authorizes the commission, after hearing upon notice, by order in writing, to fix just and reasonable individual rates whenever an existing rate is unjust, unreasonable, insufficient, or unjustly discriminatory or preferential. The court said: "It is too plain to require statement that a rate may be unjust and unreasonable because too low as well as because too high; the statute aims to secure justice to both sides. If the words, 'just and reasonable,' were not enough, the inclusion of the case where the existing rate is insufficient would remove all doubt. Injustice and unreasonableness due to an insufficient rate can only be corrected by raising it, and injustice due to discrimination or preference may require that one rate be raised, or that the other rate be lowered, in order to produce a rate that shall be just and reasonable. Only by adhering to the express language of § 16c can the result be reached that is set forth in § 15, that the board shall have general supervision and regulation of, jurisdiction and control over, all public utilities, and over their property, property rights, equipments, facilities, and franchises, so far as necessary to carry out the provisions of the act."

"The legislature by the Public Service Company Law has clearly, by broad and general terms, vested in the Public Service Commission full and complete authority to inquire into and regulate the reasonableness of rates of all public utilities." New Castle v. New Castle Water Co. (1918; Pa.) P.U.R. 1919A, 775.

There is no statutory limit upon the jurisdiction of the Georgia Commission to fix electric light and power rates, similar to the limitation upon its power to fix railway rates where prescribed by municipal contracts and ordinances. Re Georgia R. & P. Co. (1918; Ga.) P.U.R.1918F, 624.

The rule in Indiana appears to be that, in case of an emergency, the Commission has been delegated jurisdiction to entertain a petition for relief from rates specified by municipal franchise. State ex rel. Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Lewis (1918) — Ind. —, P.U.R.1918F, 111, 120 N. E. 129.

The Minnesota Commission has authority to change the rates for telephone service fixed by franchise, upon the utility's compliance with the statute giving the Commission jurisdiction, namely, the surrender of its franchise for an indeterminate permit. Re Standard Teleph. Co. (1917; Minn.) P.U.R.1918B, 573.

In some cases it has been contended that the statutory power of the commission to regulate rates has been limited by exceptions contained in the statute as to certain contracts, but this contention has been generally overruled.

Thus, in State ex rel. Billings v. Billings Gas Co. (1918) — Mont. —, P.U.R.1918F, 768, 173 Pac. 799, it was held that the provision in § 12 of the act that "this, however, does not have the effect of suspending, rescinding, invalidating, or in any way affecting existing contracts," applied only to the preceding part of the section relative to rebates, concessions, etc., and did not apply to the terms of the act in its entirety.

A similar decision was made by the Maine Commission in construing a similar provision in the statute of that state. Re Lincoln Water Co. (1919; Me.) P.U.R.1919B, 752.

The Indiana statute legalizes franchises for the use of streets, alleys, and other public places in cities and towns, and such franchises are "made valid and shall be as effective as if granted under the provisions of this act;" but the act also requires franchises and other contracts to be reasonable, and therefore, if existing franchises are unreasonable, they are subject to revision by the commission, the same as franchises made under the act. Winfield v. Public Service Commission (1918) — Ind. —, P.U.R. 1918B, 747, 118 N. E. 531.

But in Re Georgia R. & P. Co. (Ga.) supra, the Georgia Commission held that it did not have power to change street railway rates fixed by municipal contracts, since the statute extending the power of the Railroad Commission over street railways expressly provided "that nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair any valid subsisting contract now in existence between any municipality and any such company." v.

CITY OF NEWPORT NEWS.

(— Va. —, 96 S. E. 307.)

Fish — lease from state — pollution.

1. A lease by the state to an individual of land under tidal waters for the purpose of planting and propagating oysters thereon, which guarantees the absolute right to continue to use and occupy such grounds, subject only to the right of fishing in the waters over said bottom, confers no right in derogation of the common-law right of municipalities to drain their sewage into such waters.

Eminent domain — exercise of sovereign power over public water.

2. All privileges granted in public waters are subject to the exercise of the sovereign power over such waters, and an exercise of such power to the injury of the privilege granted is not a taking for which compensation must be made.

Deed — construction — derogation of public right.

3. Grants in derogation of the common or public right are strictly construed against the grantee.

[See 11 R. C. L. 1025.]

Evidence — common knowledge — land for oyster culture.

4. It is a matter of common knowledge that there are vast areas of land in the tide waters of Virginia remote from the centers of population and suitable for oyster culture.

(Sims, J., dissents.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the City of Newport News sustaining a demurrer to and dismissing a bill filed to recover damages for injury to plaintiff's oyster beds, alleged to have been caused by defendant's sewer system. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Jones & Woodward and J. Winston Read for appellant.

Mr. J. A. Massie for appellee.

Prentis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant filed his bill against the appellee, basing his claim for relief upon the fact that he is the lessee from the state of very valuable oyster planting grounds, located in Hampton Roads, on the northern side thereof near the city of Newport News, and that a considerable portion thereof has already been damaged and the oysters thereon polluted because of the sewer system of the city, which conducts sewage into Salter's creek and thence into the tidal waters of Hampton Roads, across the appellant's oyster beds, and that other and greater damage therefrom is probable. To this bill the appellee filed a demurrer, which the lower court sustained because of opinion that the case of Hampton v. Watson, 119 Va. 95, L.R.A.1916F, 189, 89 S. E. 81, is controlling upon the main question involved.

In this conclusion of the trial court we concur. The syllabus of that case fairly states the conclusions of this court as follows:

"1. There is a marked and well-defined distinction between the pollution of a small non-navigable stream and the pollution of large tidal navigable bodies of salt water, for the reason that in the first case the bed of the stream and the waters are owned by the riparian owners, while in the latter case the bed of the navigable, tidal salt water and the waters themselves are owned and controlled by the state, for the use and benefit of all the public, subject only to navigation. It is for the state to say what uses shall be made thereof and by whom, subject always to the right of the public, and for the state, through the legislative branch of the government, to say how much pollution it will permit to be emptied into and upon its waters, so long as the owners of the land between low-water and high-water mark are not injured.

"2. A municipal corporation situated on an arm of the sea, adjacent to tidal waters, has the right to use such waters for the purpose of carrying off its refuse and sewage to the sea, so long as such use does not create a public nuisance, and any injury occasioned thereby to private oyster beds is damnum absque injuria."

Additional authorities to those cited in Hampton v. Watson, supra, all relating, however, to the Federal government, to the effect that the power of the sovereign state or nation is perpetual, not exhausted by one exercise, and that all privileges granted in public waters are subject to that power, the exercise of which is not the taking of private property for public use, but only the lawful exercise of a governmental power for the common good, are: Scranton v. Wheeler, 179 U. S. 141, 45 L. ed. 126, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 48; Greenleaf Johnson Lumber Co. v. Garrison, 237 U. S. 251, 59 L. ed. 939, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 551; Willink v. United States, 240 U. S. 572, 60 L. ed. 808, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 422; State v. Cleveland & P. R. Co. 94 Ohio St. 61, L.R.A.1917A, 1014, 113 N. E. 677.

The appellant relies upon Huffmire v. Brooklyn, 162 N. Y. 584, 48 L.R.A. 421, 57 N. E. 176, and this case appears to sustain his contention, though it is observed that the New York statute, under which the owner of the oyster bed claimed there, provided that he should have "the exclusive property in the oysters so planted and the exclusive use of such oyster beds" (Laws 1868, chap. 734), while the Virginia statute employs different language, and provides that the oyster beds may be occupied "for the purpose of planting or propagating oysters thereon," and that so long as the rent is paid annually in advance the state will guarantee to the renter for twenty years "the absolute right to continue to use and occupy such grounds, subject only to the right of fishing in the waters above the said bottom." Sections 6 and 9, General Oyster Law (Acts 1910, p. 543).

In Seaman v. New York, 176 App. Div. 608, 161 N. Y. Supp. 1002, the pollution of tidal waters by sewage is held damnum absque injuria as to a riparian owner who had his oysters, over which, while stored in his cellar, the polluted waters of Jamaica bay ebbed and flowed.

The authorities upon the general subject are collected and summarized in the note to Winchell v. Waukesha, 84 Am. St. Rep. 921, and in 9 R. C. L. 682.

Grants in derogation of the common or public right are always strictly construed against the grantee. Nothing passes except what is granted specifically or by necessary implication.

As Mr. Justice Shiras states the rule in his dissenting opinion in the case of Illinois C. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 468, 36 L. ed. 1048, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 124: "It must be conceded, in limine, that in construing this grant the state is entitled to the benefit of certain well-settled canons of construction that pertain to grants by the state to private persons or corporations, as, for instance, that if there is any ambiguity or uncertainty in the act that interpretation must be put upon it which is most favorable to the state; that the words of the grant, being attributable to the party procuring the legislation, are to receive a strict construction as against the grantee; and that, as the state acts for the public good, we should expect to find the grant consistent with good morals and the general welfare of the state at large and of the particular community to be affected."

Applying this rule to the grants made under the Virginia Oyster Law, we find that the lease is made only "for the purpose of planting and propagating oysters thereon," and it is for this purpose alone that the planter is authorized to use and occupy such ground, that is to say that, while any citizen might have taken oysters therefrom before the grant, afterwards he only may do so, and all others are excluded from either planting or taking oysters from such ground during his term. This marks the limit of his right, for there is nothing to indicate that any other public or private right is withdrawn, limited, or curtailed. He does not take a fee-simple title, nor can he use the property for any other purpose except for that stated in the statute, and hence every other right theretofore in the public is preserved. Nor is there any language in the statute indicating any intent to destroy or impair any of the ancient rights of the riparian owners.

In Prior v. Swartz, 62 Conn. 132, 18 L.R.A. 668, 36 Am. St. Rep. 333, 25 Atl. 398, it is expressly decided that the right of the riparian owner to build wharves and dig channels to connect his highland with navigable waters is superior to the right of the oyster planter. This right of the riparian owner to build wharves is everywhere recognized. Miller v. Mendenhall, 19 Am. St. Rep. 231, note; Norfolk City v. Cooke, 27 Gratt. 435.

It is a matter of common knowledge, and therefore must have been within the contemplation of the general assembly when the law was enacted, that there are vast areas of land in the tidal waters of Virginia, remote from the centers of population and suitable for oyster culture.

Hampton Roads, in which the appellant occupies 1,800 acres of oyster-planting ground, of which 100 acres is alleged to be polluted, is a large, tidal, navigable body of salt water, formed by the confluence of the waters of the Atlantic ocean, Chesapeake bay, the James, Elizabeth, and Nansemond rivers, Hampton creek, and other smaller streams. That some of its waters have been long polluted and unfit for the planting of oysters for human food is also apparent from Hampton v. Watson, supra. Upon its shores, or closely adjacent thereto, are the cities of Norfolk, Portsmouth, Newport News, and Hampton, the towns of Phoebus and Kecoughtan, and great railway terminals and coaling stations. There is also the large population at Fortress Monroe, the National Soldiers' Home, and in fact along the entire adjacent coast. There the Federal government has recently located large military and naval stations, and is building an immense freight terminal for military purposes. Upon its waters innumerable ships of war and commerce, domestic and foreign, constantly float. From all of these sources the waters of Hampton Roads are constantly subject to pollution and contamination, such as is necessarily incident to all such roadsteads. This large population is destined still further to increase, and hence the probable sources of contamination will be increased.

If it be true that the private right of the appellant to continue to use and occupy this territory for the planting of oysters has been so guaranteed by the state as to make his rights superior to the interest of the large public otherwise entitled, within proper limits, to use the waters of Hampton Roads for its sewage, then the burden is clearly upon him to show that this is true. Until this is shown, it is unnecessary to discuss the proposition so urgently and well presented in the dissenting opinion; that is, that the general assembly possesses unlimited power to grant absolute property rights in the lands of the state lying under the tidal waters.

That the right claimed by the city clearly existed before the enactment of the Oyster Law cannot be doubted, and the legislature cannot be presumed to have intended to destroy this ancient and undoubted public right in the absence of a clear and explicit statute indicating such purpose. We think the more reasonable view of the statute is that it was not conceived that it would be thought desirable to continue to plant oysters in an area so certain ultimately to be polluted, and so likely, upon inspection by the Federal and state authorities, to be condemned as unsuitable for that purpose.

This construction is not, as the dissenting opinion suggests, the substitution of the will and judgment of this court for the will and judgment of the legislature, but, on the contrary, ascertains and declares the true meaning of the statute in accordance with the will and judgment of the general assembly, which not only seeks to encourage oyster culture, but has also expressly authorized cities and towns to construct sewers within or without their limits. Acts 1908, p. 624. This conclusion effectuates both of these purposes. The bill seeks to deny to the city of Newport News a privilege which is freely exercised by every ship which sails on these waters, and, except as restrained by local law, by every individual on these shores.

Under the Virginia statute, then, as construed by this court, the oyster planter takes his right to plant and propagate oysters on the public domain of the commonwealth in the tidal waters, subject to the ancient right of the riparian owners to drain the harmful refuse of the land into the sea, which is the sewer provided therefor by nature; while another statute (Acts 1916, p. 51) provides for the examination of such oyster-planting grounds so as to discover polluted areas, and prohibits the taking of oysters therefrom except for the purpose of removing them to unpolluted waters, there to remain until cleansed, purified, and made suitable for human food.

Sims, J., dissenting:

The decision of this case, so far as the right of recovery of damages is concerned, turns upon the question whether the appellant had a private right of property in the oysters upon or in the oyster-planting ground in the bill mentioned.

If such property right existed, the city of Newport News, a municipal corporation, had no right to damage or destroy such property by what would have been a private nuisance at common law if created by a private person. 1 Farnham, Waters, §§ 138b, 138c, 138d; Gould, Waters, §§ 545, 546; Joyce, Nuisances, § 284.

Under the Constitution of Virginia of 1902, § 58, the legislative authority of the city does not shield it from liability to make "just compensation" for "damage" it may cause to private property by acts since that Constitution went into effect, which would have created a private nuisance at common law, although such property be not "taken." 1 Farnham, Waters, § 138d; note in 48 L.R.A. 691, 698, et seq.; Swift & Co. v. Newport News, 105 Va. 108, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 404, 52 S. E. 821; Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64; 1 Lewis, Em. Dom. 3d ed. §§ 16 to 61, 108, 346, 356, 360, 361.

As said in the syllabus to Hampton v. Watson, 119 Va. 95, L.R.A. 1916F, 189, 89 S. E. 81: "There is a marked and well-defined distinction between the pollution of a small non-navigable stream and the pollution of large tidal navigable bodies of salt water;" but this distinction, as also stated by such syllabus, exists only "for the reason that in the first case the bed of the stream and the waters are owned by the riparian owners, while in the latter case the bed of the navigable, tidal salt water and the waters themselves are owned and controlled by the state."

With respect to private exclusive rights of ownership which may be and have in fact been acquired from the commonwealth, there is no distinction between the liability in damages for a pollution injuriously affecting such private property rights in tidal, navigable salt waters and the beds thereof, and for a pollution so affecting private property rights in small non-navigable streams.

Now it is undoubtedly true that the private rights of ownership which may be acquired and held in tidal, navigable waters and the beds thereof must be acquired from the commonwealth, and must be held subject to such regulations as it may prescribe for the protection of the public interest. It is also true, as said in Hampton v. Watson, 119 Va. at pp. 98, 99: "The tidal, navigable salt waters and the beds thereof belong to the commonwealth, in a sovereign capacity, for the benefit of all the public, and cannot be disposed of to the detriment of the public interest" (citing a number of authorities).

But who is to decide whether a disposition of such subject in any particular instance is in detriment of the public interest, and what interest has the public in the subject? These are different questions, which will be hereinafter considered.

And it is unquestionably true that in the absence of such exclusive private property rights, acquired from the commonwealth, the pollution of such waters and the beds thereof by sewage discharged therein or thereon by private persons, corporations, or municipalities, whether under legislative authority or without, cannot create a common-law nuisance, so long as only such waters and bed thereof are affected, since the rights of riparian owners in such case would not be affected. But, as is also said in the opinion of the court in the case last cited, referring to the holding in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 387, 36 L. ed. 1018, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110, such sovereign ownership in the commonwealth is held, "with the consequent right to use or dispose of any portion thereof when that can be done without substantial impairment of the interest of the public in the waters." (Italics supplied.)

Now it is settled beyond all controversy that exclusive private rights of ownership in such waters and in the beds thereof, consisting of exclusive rights of fishery, namely, of shellfishery, being the precise rights which were acquired by appellant in the instant case from the commonwealth, may be acquired from the commonwealth, and that such disposition of a portion of the sovereign ownership by the latter is not such an impairment of the interest of the public in the waters and beds thereof as aforesaid as to prevent such disposition being valid and effectual to vest in private persons such property rights. 2 Farnham, Waters, §§ 370, 402.

As said by the latter learned author in said § 370 above cited: "Rights of Legislature to Grant Exclusive Rights in Tidewater.—When the American colonies separated from the mother country and acquired their freedom, they acquired all the powers, not only of the Crown, but of Parliament also, and, unless restricted by the Constitution, this power resides in the legislatures. Parliament, in England, always had the right to grant exclusive fishery rights in tide-waters. Reg. v. Robertson, 6 Can. S. C. 52. And that power rests in the legislatures, except where it is withdrawn from them by the constitutions. Com. v. Weatherhead, 110 Mass. 175; Rowe v. Smith, 48 Conn. 444; Chalker v. Dickinson, 1 Conn. 382, 6 Am. Dec. 250; Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. 367, 369, 10 L. ed. 997, 998; Den ex dem. Russell v. Jersey Co. 15 How. 432, 14 L. ed. 760; Wooley v. Campbell, 37 N. J. L. 163; Carter v. Tinicum Fishing Co. 77 Pa. 310; Shreves v. Liveson, 2 N. J. L. 247; Munson v. Baldwin, 7 Conn. 168; Walker v. Stone, 17 Wash. 578, 50 Pac. 488; Halleck v. Davis, 22 Wash. 393, 60 Pac. 1116; Com. v. Hilton, 174 Mass. 29, 45 L.R.A. 475, 54 N. E. 362. And when grants to private individuals have been made, they are valid and will be upheld; so that there may be a several fishery in a tidal water. Fitzgerald v. Faunce, 46 N. J. L. 536; Den ex dem. Bispham v. Rice, cited in Gough v. Bell, 22 N. J. L. 463."

As stated in note 2 to such section: "Public fisheries may be leased and disposed of by the legislature in any manner so that it does not interfere with or impair the public right of navigation or the power of the general government to regulate commerce and navigation in bays and harbors. Gough v. Bell, 21 N. J. L. 156."

In § 402 above cited, the same learned author last quoted says: "Public Right in Shellfisheries.— . . . This right is subject to . . . grants from the public which have placed the title to the beds in private ownership. Peck v. Lockwood, 5 Day, 22; Martin v. Waddell, 16 Pet. 367, 10 L. ed. 997; Parker v. Cutler Milldam Co. 20 Me. 353, 37 Am. Dec. 56; Bagott v. Orr, 2 Bos.

& P. 472, 126 Eng. Reprint, 1391, 5 Revised Rep. 668; Paul v. Hazleton, 37 N. J. L. 106; Moulton v. Libbey, 37 Me. 472, 59 Am. Dec. 57; Weston v. Sampson, 8 Cush. 347, 54 Am. Dec. 764; Proctor v. Wells, 103 Mass. 216. . . . The shellfisheries may, however, be granted to private individuals so as to exclude the public right of fishing there. Com. v. Manimon, 136 Mass. 456."

And, on principle, this must necessarily be so with us. For the sovereign power of the legislature is unlimited save only as it may be limited by the state Constitution or by the grant of powers to the Federal government resulting from the Federal Constitution; and, when neither state nor Federal Constitution contains any provision limiting the legislative power to grant a private right of fishery, such as held by the appellant in the case before us under grant, lease, from the legislature, in tidal, navigable salt waters and the beds thereof, for the courts to say that such legislative power is limited by a rule that the private right so granted shall not interfere with the public use of such waters and beds thereof for the discharge of sewage is for the judicial branch of the government to usurp the function of the Constitution, state and Federal, and to attempt to impose a limitation upon the sovereign power of the legislature. The bare statement of the proposition is sufficient to refute the contention that such a limitation upon the legislative power exists with us, or can be imposed by the courts.

In England, the Crown had not the same plenitude of power to grant exclusive private rights of fishery in tidal, navigable salt waters and beds thereof, at least not after Magna Charta, so as to interfere with the public use of such waters and beds thereof; but it would serve no useful purpose to attempt here the difficult task of delving into ancient rules of the common law, which hedged about the power of the Crown when attempted to be exercised without the consent of Parliament in matters affecting the jus publicum, since the power of our legislature is not measured by the power of the Crown of England. It should be noted, however, that in the consideration of this subject it must be constantly borne in mind that much which is found in the books, of text-writers and of decisions, with respect to the inalienable nature of the jus publicum, has its origin in the common-law doctrine touching the limitations above alluded to upon the power of the Crown, and has no correct application to the legislative power in the premises.

In truth, aside from the public right of navigation, which falls within the control of the Federal government as a result of the grant of powers to the latter by our Federal Constitution, there is no jus publicum, or public right, or public interest in tidal, navigable salt waters or the beds thereof, except such right or interest as the public is permitted to enjoy by legislative sufferance or legislative grant. And this is true of municipalities, other corporations, public or private, and of private persons composing the public. They have no vested rights in the premises which the legislature cannot take away. Such rights are subject at all times to the control of the legislature, since we have no constitutional limitation on the subject, as aforesaid. 2 Farnham, Waters, § 370, p. 1375.

All rights claimed by municipalities, and by all other persons, corporate or individual, to use such waters or beds thereof for any purpose, must be derived from the commonwealth, by sufferance or by legislative grant. They can have no other source of origin. As to origin, they differ not at all from all titles and rights of ownership and of use of lands above tidewater. The private right or title to all such things is derivative from one and the same source alone, the commonwealth. See McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S. 391, 24 L. ed. at page 248, supra, for reference to this principle, if reference be needed.

If, therefore, as in the case before us, the commonwealth, acting through the legislature, makes a grant, or lease, of an exclusive private right of fishery in tidal, navigable waters and beds thereof to an individual, the appellant, that is but an exercise of the sovereign power of the commonwealth to do what it may will with its own; no constitutional limitation existing forbidding it so to do, by that grant, or lease, the commonwealth takes away from other individuals and corporations, municipal and others, the privilege they may have theretofore enjoyed of using such waters and beds thereof by sufferance of the commonwealth. They had no vested right in such use. It was a privilege merely, just as soil above tidewater belonging to the commonwealth may be used in common by all or any of its citizens, until there is a private grant thereof from the commonwealth. Upon such private grant issuing in pursuance of legislative enactment, the public use in common must cease.

The foregoing assumes, of course, that the private grant, or lease, of exclusive right of fishery to the individual instanced, is a prior grant, or lease, as in the case before us. In such case, if another, a municipal corporation, such as the appellee, for instance, were, since the Constitution of Virginia of 1902 went into effect, to invade such private right of fishery under express legislative authority, such authority would be null and void under § 58 of Constitution of Virginia of 1902, forbidding the legislature to authorize the taking or damaging of private property for public use without just compensation.

Section 1338 of the Code of Virginia is declaratory of the common-law rights of sovereignty of the commonwealth of Virginia aforesaid, pertaining to this subject, and specifically refers to its rights "by special grant" to withdraw from the use "in common by all the people of the state," portions of "the beds of the bays, . . . and shores of the sea within the jurisdiction of this commonwealth," and to vest exclusive rights of property in such portions thereof in private persons, except that any grant of such exclusive private property rights was forbidden to be issued after such statute went into effect, "in any natural oyster bed, rock, or shoal, whether the said bed, rock, or shoal shall ebb bare or not." Taylor v. Com. 102 Va. 759, 102 Am. St. Rep. 865, 47 S. E. 875. The exception contained in such statute is merely a declaration of legislative policy by way of a self-imposed limitation of the sovereign right of the commonwealth to "grant" and "pass any estate or interest of the commonwealth" in such natural oyster beds, rock, or shoal, in tidal, navigable waters. (The rights of fishery held by appellant do not include "any natural oyster bed, rock, or shoal.") Accordingly the power of the legislature of Virginia to authorize by statute the leasing to private persons of oyster grounds beneath the navigable, tidal waters within its jurisdiction has been uniformly recognized by the decisions of this court. And it has been uniformly held that such leases confer an "exclusive right [upon] the lessee to use and occupy the land" for the period of the lease. As said by this court in Power v. Tazewells, 25 Gratt. 786, speaking of such a lease: "It confers in fact an exclusive right to use, occupy, or take the profits of the land by planting or sowing oysters upon it."

Such a private right of property is vested by such a lease in the lessee in the bed of the ground beneath the waters that the lessee, occupying the precise position as that occupied by the appellant, may maintain an action of unlawful detainer to recover the possession thereof. See, to the same effect, Hurst v. Dulany, 84 Va. 701, 5 S. E. 802; Mears v. Dexter, 86 Va. 834, 11 S. E. 538. Such a grant of exclusive private property right is not in violation of the power of the Congress to regulate commerce under the Federal Constitution, and such a grant confers a property right. McCready v. Vir- ginia, supra. The existence of such property rights is also recognized by statute in Virginia. Section 2137a, Code of Virginia, provides that "the interest in said oyster planting ground shall be construed to be a chattel real, and shall at the death of the renter pass into the hands of the personal representatives for the benefit of creditors and the heirs of the decedent," etc.

Therefore, as against the private property rights of appellant, acquired in pursuance of statute of the commonwealth of Virginia, the acts of the appellee complained of created what would have been at common law a private nuisance if created by a private person, and for which the appellee is liable to appellant in damages to the extent of making the "just compensation" required by § 58 of the Constitution of 1902 of Virginia. Huffmire v. Brooklyn, 162 N. Y. 584, 48 L.R.A. 421, 57 N. E. 176. As said in the latter case: "The plaintiffs contend that the casting of noxious and destructive substances upon their oyster bed was not a consequential, but a direct, injury. The defendant insists that the discharge of the sewer in question into the waters of Mill creek is simply the consequential result of obedience to the legislative mandate, and that, in the absence of negligence on the part of the municipal authorities in the construction and operation of said sewer, the defendant is not liable. Applying the rule which the defendant invokes in all its force and breadth, we think this case falls directly within the constitutional inhibition against the taking of property without compensation. The plaintiffs were lawfully in possession of a piece of land under water upon which they had planted a bed of oysters. They held their title under legislative authority, which was as ample and unquestioned as that under which defendant's sewer was constructed. Although this land was under public waters, it was as much the private property of the plaintiffs as though it had been a tract of farm land held under a lease from the town of Flatlands under legislative authority. The act of the defendant in pouring its sewage upon this land was not consequential. It was as direct as though it had been discharged upon a piece of land owned or rented by the plaintiffs, and used for farming or gardening purposes. In the latter case a municipal corporation could not successfully defend its trespass because it was acting under legislative authority, or because its sewage had been carried to the lands of the person complaining over the lands of others. The fact that plaintiffs' land was under public water, and that defendant's sewage was discharged upon it, after passing through 300 feet of public water, the land under which was not in the possession or control of the plaintiffs, does not differentiate this case in principle from the illustrative case of a discharge of sewage upon surface lands. In either case the injury is so direct as to amount to an invasion of a private right, which no legislative sanction or direction can justify or excuse. These views are, we think, sustained by abundant authority."

The Constitution of the state of New York contains no provision requiring compensation to be paid for private property "damaged" for the public use, such as the Constitution of Virginia of 1902, § 58, but only such a provision as to the "taking" of private property. But under the view taken by the New York courts of the subject, also taken in Massachusetts, and in a few other jurisdictions, a physical invasion of private property as the result of public use is held to be a "taking" within that constitutional provision. It is true that in Virginia, prior to its Constitution of 1902, a stricter rule obtained, and nothing short of an actual "taking" of private property for public use was held to come within the former constitutional provision in this state on the subject, which, like the New York Constitution, required compensation to be made only for a "taking" of private property for public use. Hence, indeed, the amendment of our Constitution in 1902, adding in § 58 thereof the words, "or damaged." Debates, Const. Convention, 1901-02, pp. 697 et seq.

Therefore the case of Huffmire v. Brooklyn, supra, is directly in point as to what the holding in this case before us should be under our present Constitution.

The appellee relies upon the cases of Hampton v. Watson, 119 Va. 95, L.R.A.1916F, 189, 89 S. E. 81; Seaman v. New York, 176 App. Div. 608, 161 N. Y. Supp. 1002; Sayre v. Newark, 60 N. J. Eq. 361, 48 L.R.A. 722, 83 Am. St. Rep. 629, 45 Atl. 985; Doremus v. Paterson, 65 N. J. Eq. 711, 55 Atl. 304; Merrifield v. Worcester, 110 Mass. 216, 14 Am. Rep. 592; Haskell v. New Bedford, 108 Mass. 208-214; Grey ex rel. Simmons v. Paterson, 60 N. J. Eq. 385, 48 L.R.A. 717, 83 Am. St. Rep. 642, 45 Atl. 995. But in these cases either there did not exist in the plaintiff any property right acquired from the commonwealth, or, if it did, it was not "taken" or "damaged" by the acts complained of, within the meaning of the constitutional provision on the subject.

In the Hampton v. Watson Case, supra, it is true that the opinion of this court rested the decision upon the ground that "the beds and waters of Hampton creek [in question in that case], . . . being tidal, navigable salt waters, are held in trust by the state of Virginia for the public, and cannot be granted to an individual so as to impair the public interests therein, or the use thereof."

But the public use of such beds and waters which the court had in mind, and of which it was speaking in that case, was a use which, long prior to the institution of plaintiff's action in 1915, had taken actual possession of such beds and waters as a dumping ground for the discharge of sewage, to the extent of completely polluting the ground of plaintiff, so that it was unfit for his purposes before his action was instituted. The facts in that case were that, long prior to the institution of the plaintiff's action in 1915, to wit, in 1899-1900, the city of Hampton constructed its sewer system and put it in operation, discharging into Hampton creek, and in 1908 made additions thereto and put same in operation, having the same place of discharge. And this was not all. From a time prior to 1908 there were private sewer systems emptying into the same place established by the county poorhouse, the National Soldiers' Home, with over 3,000 inmates, the normal school, with 1,100 inmates, and other private sewers and closets, which were not connected with any sewer of the defendant city, and which continuously drained and emptied directly into Hampton creek. And, as said in said opinion: "The evidence shows that the sewerage from these private sources is many times more than sufficient to pollute the waters in question, so as to forbid the sale of oysters directly therefrom."

As also stated in such opinion: "It further appears that in the summer of 1909 the oyster planters in Hampton creek were notified by the health officer of the county that those waters were too polluted to permit the sale of oysters therefrom, and again in 1914 the United States health authorities made an examination, and found that the waters were too polluted for oysters to be sold directly therefrom, and thereupon the pure food and dairy department of the state of Virginia notified the defendant in error, among others, that they would not be permitted to sell their oysters without first transplanting them to unpolluted waters."

In that case the plaintiff's right to maintain his action necessarily depended upon his having had an exclusive private right of ownership, an exclusive private right of fishery, in the tidal waters and bed thereof in question, as of the time his alleged cause of action arose. Plainly, under the facts of that case, he did not have such exclusive private property right at the time his alleged cause of action arose, since the city of Hampton, by its sewer system established and begun in operation in 1899-1900 and enlarged in 1908, certainly by 1914 (five years having expired after the injury therefrom began) had acquired a statutory right to discharge its sewage in the locality in question. Virginia Hot Springs Co. v. McCray, 106 Va. 461, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 465, 56 S. E. 216, 10 Ann. Cas. 179; Southern R. Co. v. McMenamin, 113 Va. 121, 73 S. E. 980; Magruder v. Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. 120 Va. 352, 91 S. E. 121. The Hampton v. Watson Case, therefore, presented the question whether a plaintiff, claiming an exclusive private right of fishery under grant (lease) from the commonwealth, which he had lost, by reason of the bar of the Statute of Limitations, before he instituted his action, because of public use in conflict with such private right, could yet maintain his action. That was a very different question from the one presented in the instant case, where the appellant held and owned, at the time his alleged cause of action arose, an exclusive private right of fishery under grant (lease) from the commonwealth, which he had not lost before he instituted his action.

What is said, therefore, in the Hampton v. Watson Case, should be construed in the light of the facts of that case.

Moreover, as said in Williams Printing Co. v. Saunders, 113 Va. 156, at page 179, 73 S. E. 472, 478, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 693: "The value of a case as a precedent is affected by the consideration that the precise point for which it is relied upon as authority was presented in argument and considered by the court."

It seems that in the Hampton v. Watson Case the point was not presented in argument that, by the provision of § 58 of the Constitution of Virginia of 1902, the authority of the legislature to authorize a municipality to damage private property for public use without just compensation was taken away, so that the damnum absque injuria rule applied by the court in that case should not have been applied. Certainly, that point was not considered by the court, as appears from the opinion. Therefore, for this reason also, the Hampton v. Watson Case should not be considered as decisive of the instant case. But if that case can be construed to apply to the instant case, it can only be upon the ground that it holds that an exclusive private right of fishery cannot be granted by the commonwealth. Such a holding would be unsound because in conflict with the principle of law involved and the settled law on the subject, as above noted. Hence I am of opinion that the Hampton v. Watson Case cannot properly rule the instant case.

In Seaman v. New York, 176 App. Div. 608, 161 N. Y. Supp. 1002, the plaintiff had no property right which he had acquired of the commonwealth in the tidal water in question, nor in the bed thereof.

In Sayre v. Newark, 60 N. J. Eq. 361, 48 L.R.A. 722, 83 Am. St. Rep. 629, 45 Atl. 985, there was no private property right in the bed of the stream acquired from the commonwealth, nor was there any "taking" of the property right in question. It was merely a riparian property right which was "damaged." The Constitution of New Jersey contains no provision against private property being "damaged" for public use without just compensation, but only such provision as to a "taking" of private property for public use. In New Jersey, the construction of the latter provision by its courts is the same as the Virginia doctrine on that subject before our Constitution of 1902. Hence that case is not authority in point on the question under consideration, under the latter Constitution.

In Doremus v. Paterson, 65 N. J. Eq. 711, 55 Atl. 304, the stream affected by the pollution was above tidewater, and the plaintiff had acquired no property right in the water in question.

In Merrifield v. Worcester, 110 Mass. 216, 14 Am. Rep. 592, the property right affected was a riparian right only, not a right in the bed of the stream. The court remarked that it was not an "acquired property right in possession." However, that case is to some extent distinguished by a holding of the court somewhat peculiar to Massachusetts (1 Farnham, Waters, § 138c); and, further, it rests upon an application of the doctrine of damnum absque injuria, which has not been sanctioned in Virginia. Arminius Chem. Co. v. Landrum, 113 Va. 7, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 272, 73 S. E. 459, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1075.

In Haskell v. New Bedford, 108 Mass. 208, 214, among the plaintiff's property rights was one which he had acquired from the commonwealth, and that was a title to the channel of the river underneath tidewater, by virtue of a certain statute of the state of Massachusetts. As to that right the court in its opinion says: "But the right conferred upon the city of New Bedford to lay out common sewers 'through any streets or private lands' does not include the right to create a nuisance, public or private, upon the property of the commonwealth, or of an individual, within tidewater. Hale de Mortibus Maris, chap. 7, in Hargrave's Law Tracts, 85; Richardson v. Boston, 19 How. 263, 270, 15 L. ed. 639, 642, and 24 How. 188, 193, 16 L. ed. 625, 627; Proprietors of Locks & Canals v. Lowell, 7 Gray, 223; Sherman v. Tobey, 3 Allen, 7; Atty. Gen. v. Birmingham, 4 Kay & J. 528, 70 Eng. Reprint, 220, 6 Week. Rep. 811; Atty. Gen. v. Leeds, L. R. 5 Ch. 583, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 711, 19 Week. Rep. 19."

And the court held that the city, notwithstanding its legislative authority to establish its sewers as it did, discharging into the bed of the channel of the said river, was liable in damages to the plaintiff for the injury done him by the accumulation of sewage in such river bed below tidewater, and filling it up, that being a private nuisance; and reversed the court below on this point for holding to the contrary. See pages 214, 215, 216, of the report of that case in 108 Mass. Indeed the court in that case went farther and held that "against the continuance of such a nuisance, if clearly proved, equity will also grant relief by injunction" (citing a number of cases).

See 108 Mass. p. 216.

In Grey ex rel. Simmons v. Paterson, 60 N. J. Eq. 385, 48 L.R.A. 717, 83 Am. St. Rep. 642, 45 Atl. 995, the plaintiffs at whose relation the suit was brought were riparian owners, and those whose lands bordered on the river at tidewater had acquired no property right in the tidal waters or beds thereof; such right still remained in the commonwealth.

There is nothing in the cases of Taylor v. Com. 102 Va. 768, 102 Am. St. Rep. 865, 47 S. E. 875; Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. v. Jones, 105 Va. 503, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 247, 54 S. E. 314; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 387, 36 L. ed. 1018, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110, or Coxe v. State, 144 N. Y. 396, 39 N. E. 400, cited in the opinion of this court in Hampton v. Watson, 119 Va. 95, L.R.A. 1916F, 189, 89 S. E. 81, which is in any way in conflict with the holding in the case of Huffmire v. Brooklyn, 162 N. Y. 584, 48 L.R.A. 421, 57 N. E. 176.

It is true that, in the opinion in the case of Coxe v. State, just mentioned, there is a distinction sought to be made between the character of the title vested in the commonwealth with respect to tidal navigable waters and the beds thereof and the character of such title with respect to land above tidewater. But for the reasons indicated above, both on principle and upon authority, such a distinction cannot be sound. The opinion confuses the character of title vested in the Crown in England with that vested in our American commonwealths, and attributes to the latter limitations which in truth have and can have no existence unless imposed by Constitution, state or Federal. A detailed discussion of the authorities referred to in such case would make this even more manifest, but that would needlessly prolong this opinion, since what is said in Coxe v. State on the subject under consideration does not contravene the power of the legislature to grant an exclusive private right of fishery which does not interfere with the powers vested in the Federal government under the Federal Constitution to control navigation and regulate commerce. Such a grant, even under the position taken in that case, would be considered a reasonable exercise by the state of its legislative power, and valid to vest exclusive private right of fishery, and hence such case is not in conflict with the case of Huffmire v. Brooklyn, supra.

What the case of Coxe v. State, supra, decided was that a legislative grant to a private individual or corporation to dike off a part of the tidal, navigable salt waters, and fill in so as to reclaim the beds underneath such waters, was void because in conflict with the Federal Constitution, granting to the Federal government the exclusive power to regulate foreign and domestic commerce. There is nothing in that holding in conflict with either the Huffmire v. Brooklyn Case, or what has been said above on the fundamental principle involved.

That case also rests its decision on the ground that the act of the legislature in question was void under the New York state Constitution, because it embraced more than one subject; but that ground is, of course, foreign to the subject we have under consideration, and is merely referred to as further showing that the court did not rest its decision of the case upon the distinction sought to be made in its opinion, as aforesaid, with respect to the character of title vested in the commonwealth to tidal, navigable waters and the beds thereof.

There is nothing in the cases of Scranton v. Wheeler, Greenleaf Johnson Lumber Co. v. Garrison, Willink v. United States, or State v. Cleveland, cited in the majority opinion, in conflict with what has been said above. Those cases concern the power of the Federal government under the Federal Constitution. They hold, in effect, that no private property right in navigable waters and the beds thereof can be acquired or held as against the power of the Federal government to control navigation and regulate commerce, conferred upon the latter by the Federal Constitution.

I have no difference with the majority opinion on the subject that, as stated in such opinion, "grants in derogation of the common or public right are always strictly construed against the grantee. Nothing passes except what is granted specifically, or by necessary implication." Illinois C. R. Co. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 469, 36 L. ed. 1048, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 110, cited in the majority opinion, and numerous other authorities which might be cited, so holding in effect. But after giving full force and effect to this rule, as we have seen from a consideration of the Virginia statute law on the subject, such statute law is free from all ambiguity and all uncertainty, and plainly and unquestionably has made the grant to the appellant of the exclusive rights of fishery aforesaid, in the locality aforesaid, "for the purpose of planting and propagating oysters thereon." And such grant was accepted by the appellant, and he entered into the possession thereof before the appellee acquired any rights under the legislative grant of authority to it, as a municipality, to construct its new sewerage system and to discharge its sewage therefrom, complained of by appellant. The circumstance that the fee simple was not granted to the appellant seems to me to be wholly immaterial. Other property rights are just as sacred, may be of the same value, and are just as much entitled to protection as are fee-simple interests in property. The point is that exclusive private property rights were "specifically" granted to and derived by the appellant under legislative enactments of the commonwealth of Virginia; and such rights were so acquired by the appellant before any conflicting rights were acquired by the appellee under its legislative authority. The new sewer and the discharge of sewage therefrom, complained of by appellant, was not begun by appellee until 1907, after the Constitution of Virginia of 1902 went into effect. If prior to such Constitution the appellee had any legislative authority to discharge its sewage to the damage of said private rights of appellant without liability to him in damages, such authority was annulled by the provision of such Constitution (§ 58) above referred to. Swift & Co. v. Newport News, 105 Va. 108, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 404, 52 S. E. 821, supra, and other authorities cited above on this subject. Hence in 1907 and thereafter, when the appellee committed the acts complained of, creating what would be a private nuisance if created by an individual, the appellant's private property rights aforesaid were protected by such constitutional provision, and the legislative authority relied on by appellee could furnish no warrant to damage such property rights as aforesaid, and no shield to it from liability for damages therefor.

The majority opinion refers to certain authorities on the subject of the rights of riparian owners of real estate bordering upon navigable waters. I have no difference with those authorities. The rights of such riparian owners exist at common law and under statute. Such rights are well settled by the authorities, and it is firmly established that such rights, unless derived from legislative authority, never extend beyond the low-water mark into navigable, tidal salt waters, or upon the beds thereof. The right to build wharves extending beyond the low-water mark of navigable, tidal salt waters must be derived from legislative grant. Taylor v. Com. 102 Va. 759, 102 Am. St. Rep. 865, 47 S. E. 875; Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. v. Jones, 105 Va. 503, 509, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 247, 54 S. E. 314. Hence the alleged right of a municipality, relied on by appellee in the instant case, to discharge sewage into the waters aforesaid and upon the beds thereof is not the right of a riparian owner, and the authorities referred to in the majority opinion on this subject have no bearing in principle or controlling application to the instant case, as I must say, with all due deference.

My view is that the right of the appellee, on which it relies in this case, can be nowhere found unless under its legislative authority; and, as above stated, it cannot be found under that authority.

The remaining authorities cited in the majority opinion, not referred to above, of note to case of Winchell v. Waukesha, 84 Am. St. Rep. 921-923, and 9 R. C. L. 682, confirm the correctness of the conclusion of this dissenting opinion. There is nothing in the Act of Assembly of 1908, page 624, referred to in the majority opinion, to the contrary. Indeed, the latter act expressly provides that the municipality shall "acquire" the land necessary to operate its sewers "by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise," and does not contemplate the damaging of any private property rights without due compensation.

Hence, upon principle and upon authority, I think the appellee, upon the case made by the allegations of the bill, is liable in damages to the appellant to the extent of the just compensation required to be paid by § 58 of the Constitution of Virginia of 1902.

The learned judge of the court below would have so held, as appears from the decree appealed from, but for the supposed binding authority to the contrary of the case of Hampton v. Watson, 119 Va. 95, L.R.A. 1916F, 189, 89 S. E. 81. For the reasons stated above, I do not consider the latter case authority to the contrary. And if it were, I am convinced that upon principle and authority, as aforesaid, it should be overruled.

It is not intended by anything which is said above to intimate that I think an injunction should be granted in the instant case. The granting or refusal of an injunction would depend upon other considerations.

Where a municipal corporation has at great expense constructed and put in operation, and used for a long time, a system of sewerage, an injunction should be refused on the ground that it would be inequitable to give such relief, where relief can be otherwise afforded, as by making just compensation in damages. Grey ex rel. Simmons v. Paterson, 60 N. J. Eq. 385, 48 L.R.A. 717, 83 Am. St.

Rep. 642, 45 Atl. 995. Many other authorities might be cited to the same effect.

For the reasons stated above, I am constrained to dissent from the majority opinion.

ANNOTATION.

Pollution of oyster beds.

In Virginia, the rule as laid down in Hampton v. Watson (1916) 119 Va. 95, L.R.A.1916F, 189, 89 S. E. 81, and followed in the reported case (DARLING v. NEWPORT NEWS, ante, 748), which has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States (U. S. Adv. Ops. 1918-1919, p. 451), — U. S. —, 63 L. ed. —, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 371, is to the effect that a lease by a state to an individual of land under tidal water, granted pursuant to a statute authorizing the leasing of such lands, and "for the purpose of planting or propagating oysters thereon," and guaranteeing "the absolute right to continue to use and occupy such grounds, subject only to the right of fishing in the waters above the said bottom," confers no right in derogation of the right of a municipal corporation to drain its sewage into such waters with resulting damage to the leased oyster beds therein. In other words, since tidal, navigable salt waters of Virginia are held in trust by the state for the public, the public interest therein and use thereof for natural sewerage purposes cannot be impaired or interfered with by the leasing by the state of oyster grounds, even though such grounds cannot be used because of the pollution of the waters by the sewage. In Hampton v. Watson, the court, in reaching the above-stated conclusion said: "Since the state holds its tidal waters and the beds thereof for the benefit of all the public, we are of the opinion that the city of Hampton has the right to use the waters of Hampton creek for the purpose of carrying off its refuse and sewage to the sea, so long as such use does not constitute a public nuisance, and, as such, be discontinued by the legislature, which has control over the extent to which these waters may be so used. The sea is the natural outlet for all the impurities flowing from the land, and the public health demands that our large and rapidly growing seacoast cities should not be obstructed in their use of this outlet, except in the public interest. One great natural office of the sea and of all running waters, is to carry off and dissipate, by their perpetual motion and currents, the impurities and offscourings of the land. The owner of any lands bordering upon the sea may lawfully throw refuse matter into it, provided he does not create a nuisance to others. And there can be no doubt that public bodies and officers, charged by law with the power and duty of constructing and maintaining sewers and drains for the benefit of the public health, have an equal right. . . . Sewerage systems for all thickly populated communities have become an imperative necessity, a public right, which is superior to the leasing by the state of a few acres of oyster land. . . . Any injury occasioned the private oyster bed of the plaintiff thereby was damnum absque injuria." In the reported case (DARLING v. NEWPORT NEWS, ante, 748), the court said that the Hampton Case was controlling upon this general question, emphasizing particularly the distinction between tidal and nontidal waters. And the Supreme Court of the United States, in affirming the DARLING CASE, approved the reasoning adopted by the Virginia supreme court of appeals, and also approved the statement that a lessee of land for oyster beds under tidal waters surrounded by large towns and cities, must be held to take the risk of the pollution of the water by sewage.

Another point made in the reported case (DARLING v. NEWPORT NEWS), and followed by the Federal Supreme Court in affirming that case, was that the pollution of the waters over plaintiff's oyster beds by the discharge of the sewage by the defendant municipality was not a taking of plaintiff's property therein, within the meaning of a constitutional provision requiring compensation for property taken or damaged for public use.

But, as is stated in the DARLING CASE, a contrary conclusion was reached in the New York case of Huffmire v. Brooklyn (1900) 162 N. Y. 584, 48 L.R.A. 421, 57 N. E. 176, affirming (1897) 22 App. Div. 406, 48 N. Y. Supp. 132. This was an action to recover compensation for damages to a bed of oysters planted by a licensee, under a statute authorizing the licensing of certain tidelands, and providing that the licensee shall have "the exclusive property in the oysters so planted, and the exclusive use of said oyster beds," resulting from the discharge thereon by the defendant city of sewerage through a properly constructed sewer, and as authorized by statute. The city sought to avoid liability by invoking the rule that, in the construction or operation of a public work under legislative authority or direction, a municipal corporation is not answerable for such a consequential injury as may result to others, where there is no negligence in such construction or operation; but the court, after saying that the precise question thus presented was whether the injury complained of was purely consequential or was so direct as to amount to a taking of property which entitled the plaintiff to compensation, within the meaning of the constitutional inhibition against the taking of property without compensation, adopted the view that the destroying of plaintiff's oyster beds was not consequential and incidental to the maintenance of the sewer, but constituted a direct invasion and appropriation of the plaintiff's property for public use, entitling him to compensation in damages therefor, it being maintained that the injury was so direct as to amount to an invasion of a private right which no legislative sanction or direction could justify or excuse. This conclusion, as before stated, is directly contrary to that reached in the reported case (DARLING v. NEWPORT NEWS, ante, 748), and would seem to be irreconcilable therewith, unless perhaps it can be differentiated by the fact that the lessee in the DARLING CASE occupied the beds in question "for the purpose of planting or propagating oysters thereon," whereas the licensee in the Huffmire Case had "the exclusive property in the oysters so planted, and the exclusive use of said oyster beds." It is also of interest that Sims, J., in his dissenting opinion in the reported case, said that the decision in the Huffmire Case "is directly in point as to what the holding in this case before us should be."

And again, in Bailey v. New York (1902) 38 Misc. 641, 78 N. Y. Supp. 210, where sewage discharged through an authorized sewerage system injured plaintiff lessee's oyster bed, it was held that the defendant municipality was liable in damages for the loss caused, and also that an injunction would issue against the city, restraining it from so continuing the operation of the sewer as to prevent the use of plaintiff's bed for the purpose for which it was leased to him.

In Massachusetts, under a statute authorizing the construction of a canal and providing for payment of damages to owners of oyster fisheries, caused by the deposit of "excavated materials, or in any other way," it has been held (Taylor v. Boston, C. C. & N. Y. Canal Co. (1916) 224 Mass. 307, 112 N. E. 650) that a party holding oyster bed licenses, granted pursuant to statute, may maintain an action for damages to the oysters and oyster seeds therein, caused by the sand and decayed organic matter which was disturbed in excavating for the canal, and which roiled and polluted the waters flowing over such beds. The defendant's contention was that the damages suffered were too remote and indirect to be recoverable, and that the injury to particular oysters, as distinguished from impairment in the future of the value of the licenses, is not within the purview of the statute; but the court overruled such exceptions, saying that if this construction is adopted, the words, "oyster fisheries," and "licensee," become meaningless, that the legislature must be presumed to have intended statutory fisheries such as the plaintiff's, that "while it is true that the destruction of the shellfish was not caused by the 'deposit of excavated materials' dumped upon the flats, the context, 'or in other ways,' leaves no doubt that even if the portions occupied by the petitioner have not been taken, compensation is provided if the injury proved is found attributable to the authorized construction and completion of the canal as a navigable waterway," and that "the petitioner not having sought or been awarded damages for any diminution in the future of the value of the granted flats for cultivation as an oyster fishery, and the measure of recovery having been strictly limited to the oysters in the soil and the oyster seed attached thereto," the defendant may not complain of the award of damages.

facturing company, prohibited by general statute from discharging any waste products into Providence harbor or waters which would be injurious to shellfish therein, was held liable for injury to private oyster beds in Providence waters, held under lease from the state, resulting from the discharge into such waters of deleterious by-products, such as water-gas tar, etc. And see also Bell v. Providence Gas Co. (1914) — R. L. —, 90 Atl. 2.

In Florida, it has been held that since the navigable waters in the state and the lands thereunder are the property of the state, no one can acquire such a right by locating and constructing an oyster bed thereunder as will permit the maintaining of an action for injury thereto resulting from pollution of the stream, unless such right of location and construction was acquired by virtue of legislative authority. Thus in Symmes v. Prairie Pebble Phosphate Co. (1912) 64 Fla. 480, 60 So. 223, it was held that one who had constructed an oyster bed in a navigable stream of the state could not maintain an action for injuries thereto resulting from the casting into it of large quantities of mud and refuse, in the absence of a showing that he acquired such right of location from the state in the manner provided by statute (Florida Gen. Stat. 1906, §§ 646-651), authorizing county commissioners to grant within designated limits exclusive rights to plant oysters in the public waters of the state. And it has been held that where the statute does not allow the granting of private rights in public waters as to the "existing natural or maternal oyster beds," one who has acquired a right to construct an oyster bed in a navigable stream cannot maintain an action for injuries resulting from the pollution of an oyster bed, without showing that the asserted private rights did not cover any "natural or maternal oyster beds." Symmes v. Prairie Pebble Phosphate Co. (Fla.) supra. But that, where the statute expressly provides that no license shall be granted covering any portion of tidewater flats where a natural oyster bed exists, it is to be assumed, in an action for damages to licensed beds, that the authorities in granting the license complied with the statute, see Taylor v. Boston, C. C. & N. Y. Canal Co. (Mass.) supra.

chap. 45) it had been made unlawful for any person other than a grantee within the limits of a fishery knowingly to disturb or injure any fishery or oyster bed.

So, in Owen v. Faversham (1908) 73 J. P. (Eng.) 33, affirming (1908) 72 J. P. 404, it was again held that a municipal corporation has no common-law right to discharge untreated sewage into tidal waters so as to cause a nuisance by polluting private oyster beds therein, and that an injunction with an inquiry as to damages must be granted against such a practice. This holding was as against the contention that the defendant corporation was entitled, as of right, to discharge its sewage into the arm of the sea in question.

FRANK G. CURTIS.

(25 Wyo. 1, 163 Pac. 362.)

Corporation — sale of property — right of stockholder to compensation.

1. A stockholder in a corporation need not, in order to recover compensation for services rendered in selling corporate property, be employed by the corporation as a broker to negotiate such sale, and therefore, in order to justify such recovery, he need not show that he produced the buyer or was the sole procuring cause of the sale.

— undertaking as member of committee.

2. A stockholder of a corporation may, at its special instance and request under appointment as a member of a committee, undertake the sale of its property so as to be entitled to compensation for effecting a sale.

Appeal — finding on evidence — conclusiveness.

3. Whether or not a stockholder was to be paid a reasonable amount or a per diem for his time in selling property of the corporation is, upon conflicting evidence, settled by the finding of the trial court.

— motion for new trial — preserving question for review.

4. Error in the amount of recovery cannot be preserved for consideration on appeal by a motion for new trial on the ground that the findings are not sustained by sufficient evidence, that they are contrary to law, and that the evidence was and is insufficient in law to warrant any finding or judgment in favor of plaintiff against defendant.

Corporation — appointment of committee to sell property — recovery of compensation.

5. A stockholder of a corporation who is acting as assistant secretary, and who, in consequence of appointment upon a committee to negotiate a sale of corporate property, succeeds in effecting such sale, is entitled to recover from the corporation what his services are reasonably worth.

— implied contract to pay.

6. When a stockholder who is not an officer or director renders a service to the corporation on prior request or authority, a contract is implied to pay him the reasonable value of his services unless the circumstances negative such implication.

[See 7 R. C. L. 469.]

7. A contract on the part of a corporation to pay a director or other officer for services rendered outside the scope of his official duties may be implied.

ERROR to the District Court for Natrona County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover compensation for negotiating a sale of defendant's leasehold interest in certain lands. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. William J. Miles for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. B. D. Townsend, Fred C. Rabb, and R. H. Nichols for defendant in error.

Potter, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Frank G. Curtis brought this action against the Hjorth Oil Company, a corporation, to recover the alleged value of his services and expenses in negotiating and making a sale of that company's leasehold interest in a certain tract of land in Natrona county, this state, upon which the company had drilled a productive oil well, and in procuring from the purchasers an agreement to take the oil produced by the company upon land owned by it at the market price. Such services and expenses were alleged to be of the reasonable value of $35,000, and it was alleged that no part thereof had been paid except $60 advanced by said company for expenses. On the trial in the district court without a jury it was found that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for his services in negotiating and making the sale aforesaid, the sum of $10,000, as the reasonable value thereof, together with interest thereon at the legal rate of 8 per cent per annum from a specified date, and judgment was rendered in his favor for said sum and interest aggregating $11,497.80.

The petition alleges that the plaintiff is, and during the period mentioned therein was, an attorney and counselor at law, and engaged in the practice of his profession in the city of Jamestown, New York, and also in the business of a broker and in the sales of stocks, bonds, and other properties, and that he was a stockholder of the defendant. Stripped of all other matter of inducement, the petition alleges, in substance, that the plaintiff undertook the sale of the defendant's interest in the land aforesaid, and to provide for the sale of oil produced on lands owned by it, at the special instance and request of the defendant, and that the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiff a reasonable sum for his services in addition to his actual expenses in conducting the necessary negotiation for said sale; that pursuant to said agreement the plaintiff made the sale for the sum of $75,000 in cash and 750 shares of the capital stock of a company to be organized by the purchasers, said shares to include 250 shares of 7 per cent cumulative preferred stock and 500 shares of common stock; that the proposed company was organized, and the stock aforesaid, of the value of $35,000 or more, was about to be issued to defendant pursuant to said sale and the terms thereof; that an agreement was procured from the purchasers to take oil from the defendant at the market price for an indefinite period of time; that plaintiff's services and expenses in making said sale and contract were reasonably worth the sum of $35,000.

The answer admits that plaintiff was an attorney and counselor at law engaged in the practice as alleged, but denies, for want of information, his having been engaged in the business of broker as alleged. It further denies his alleged employment to make the sale, or that the sale was made by him, and alleges that the plaintiff was one of defendant's stockholders, and the only agreement with him by the company was to pay him, in addition to his actual expenses, the sum of $15 per day for such time as he should be actually absent from the city of Jamestown upon any business of the defendant; that the sale aforesaid was made by the defendant itself, acting through certain of its officers and stockholders; that plaintiff's only connection therewith was as one of a committee of three stockholders appointed by the board of directors for the sole purpose of acting for it in its corporate capacity, and not as brokers or promoters.

The findings of fact were stated in writing substantially as follows:

(1) That defendant is a corporation organized under the laws of New York. (2) That plaintiff is and was since prior to January 1, 1913, engaged in practice as an attorney and counselor at law and in the business of a broker in the sale of stocks and bonds and other properties. (3) That defendant, prior to January 1, 1913, became the owner of a certain leasehold estate in an oil placer mining location upon a certain tract of public land situated in Natrona county, in this state, and continued to be the owner thereof until its sale on April 16, 1913. (4) That subsequent to January 1, 1913, and prior to April 16, 1913, the defendant employed the plaintiff to sell said leasehold interest, and agreed to pay him, and he agreed to accept, a reasonable compensation for his services in negotiating and making such sale. (5) That pursuant to said contract of employment the plaintiff, on April 16, 1913, negotiated and made a sale of said leasehold interest for $75,000 in cash and $50,000 of the common stock and $25,000 of the preferred stock of a corporation to be organized to own said interest. (6) That thereafter and prior to May 10, 1913, the sale was accepted, ratified, and approved by the defendant, and its said interest duly conveyed to the purchaser, who then and there paid to the defendant the purchase price aforesaid, viz., $75,000 in cash, and $75,000 par value of the capital stock of the Keystone Oil Company, the corporation organized for the purpose aforesaid, and that the said capital stock so paid to defendant was of a cash value exceeding $25,000. (7) That the sum of $10,000 is a reasonable compensation for plaintiff's said services. As a conclusion of law the court found the defendant to be indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $10,000, with interest at 8 per cent per annum from June 16, 1913.

The findings concluded with an order for judgment and a recital that all were excepted to by the defendant. Thereafter the defendant filed a statement of its exceptions to the findings and decision, specifying that it excepted to the fourth and fifth findings of fact, that part of the second finding to the effect that plaintiff had been engaged in the business of a broker, the sixth finding so far as it may imply that defendant ratified or approved any sale or alleged sale by the plaintiff, acting in the capacity of a broker for defendant, the conclusion of law, and order for judgment. It is shown also by the bill of exceptions that a motion for new trial was filed by the defendant, stating the following grounds: (1) That the court erred (a) in denying defendant's motion for nonsuit or for judgment at the end of plaintiff's evidence in chief; and (b) in denying defendant's motion for judgment in its favor at the conclusion of all the evidence. (2) That the findings are not sustained by sufficient evidence, and are contrary to the evidence. (3) That the evidence is insufficient in law to warrant any finding or judgment in favor of the plaintiff. (4) That the findings are contrary to law.

The case is here on error, with the errors complained of set forth in the petition in error substantially as follows: (1) That the court erred in denying defendant's motion for nonsuit or judgment made at the end of plaintiff's evidence in chief. (2) That the court erred in denying defendant's motion for judgment made at the end of all the evidence. (3) That the court erred in its second, fourth, and fifth findings of fact, in that said findings are not supported by the evidence, and are contrary to the facts adduced at the trial. (4) That the decision and judgment are not sustained by and are contrary to the evidence. (5) That the decision and judgment are contrary to law. (6) That the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a new trial. (7) That upon the evidence and the law the judgment should have been in favor of the defendant.

Thus, the question presented is whether, upon the evidence and the law applicable thereto, the plaintiff was employed and made the sale as alleged and under such circumstances as to entitle him to a reasonable compensation for his services. The evidence is voluminous, comprising several hundred pages of testimony and a large number of exhibits, the latter including, among other papers, the record of the incorporation and the proceedings of many of the meetings of the stockholders and directors of the defendant company, and numerous letters and telegrams relating to the negotiation for the sale of the property in question and other incidental matters, so that our reference to it must necessarily be confined to stating generally the material facts seeming to be established without substantial conflict, or, where the evidence is conflicting, the character thereof and our conclusion as to its effect in this proceeding to reverse the judgment.

The organization of the defendant company was proposed by William Hjorth, a resident of Jamestown, New York, for the purpose of taking over and operating under an oil lease which he had secured, covering certain lands in Natrona county in this state, including the quarter section involved in this controversy. The company was incorporated and organized in June, 1912, under the laws of New York, after a stock subscription list had been circulated and signed. Thereupon the lease aforesaid was taken over by the company, and it proceeded to operate thereunder. At the organization meeting F. O. Strandberg was elected president of the company, and the said William Hjorth was elected secretary and treasurer. The officers and most of the stockholders, as we understand, resided in or near Jamestown, and the company had its home office at that place. The original capital stock was $15,000, all of which we understand to have been subscribed. The plaintiff subscribed $1,000 of the capital stock, and became the owner of that amount of stock in the company at the time of its organization. He prepared and filed the defendant's articles of incorporation, and thereafter, and during the period covered by the transaction involved in this controversy, acted as legal adviser of the company, and seems also to have solicited some of the original subscriptions to the capital stock. He was not at any time a director of the company, nor an officer, except that at a meeting of the directors held on November 13, 1912, he was named in a resolution adopted by them to act as assistant secretary, and held that position until February 3, 1913, when another person was selected to act in that capacity. Prior to said November meeting, however, he had written up the proceedings of several of the meetings of the stockholders and directors, signing the same as "acting secretary," and at that meeting his acts in so doing were ratified.

Some time in 1912, the exact time not being material, though we understand it to have been in October, the company's operations under the lease aforesaid resulted in a producing well upon the quarter section of land here involved, and there seeming to have been some delay or difficulty in arranging for a disposition of the oil from that well, the plaintiff interested himself in the matter, and corresponded and had an interview with a representative of another oil company concerning it prior to January, 1913, but without any definite result. He also corresponded about it with the defendant's representative in the field, in which correspondence the matter of selling the defendant's interest in the tract aforesaid was referred to. The matter of this correspondence is only incidental to the present controversy, and is mentioned here only as showing that the question of selling defendant's interest in the lease upon said tract had been under consideration prior to January, 1913, and the negotiation finally resulting in a sale. Mr. Hjorth, the secretary of the company, wrote from Casper on November 9, 1912, that he had seen a party, naming one of the leading oil companies of the district, about buying for $70,000, that he thought the company could not do any better, and advising a sale at that price. On November 12th, the plaintiff wrote Mr. Hjorth from Jamestown, referring to a telegram sent the latter, asking if the party would give them $70,000 for the lease inside of five days, and mentioning a different offer which had been made by another party, and stating as the writer's personal opinion that the stockholders would sell for $70,000 cash, or part cash and the remainder properly secured, to be paid within a reasonable time. In a letter of November 19, 1912, written to the plaintiff by Mr. Hjorth, he stated that the party he had referred to would not buy then, but would rather wait for another well, and would be willing to double the price if they did buy. In a letter dated November 22, 1912, by the plaintiff to Mr. Hjorth, the fact was mentioned that the latter's telegram had just arrived, asking if he should give an option on lease for two weeks for $90,000 net, and stating that the telegram would be reported to the meeting that night. And it appears that, at a special meeting of the stockholders held on November 23, 1912, they refused to give an option at $90,000 for two weeks, and Mr. Hjorth was so advised by the plaintiff in a letter of the same date, in which it was further stated, in substance, that the sentiment was against giving an option, but there might be an exception in favor of an option for two weeks upon the payment of $5,000, and suggesting that anyone wishing to buy make a flat offer. At the meeting on November 23, 1912, it was voted also to increase the capital stock to $100,000.

Nothing definite having been accomplished as to the sale of defendant's oil or the well aforesaid, or that part of its lease which included the well, the plaintiff was visited at his office in Jamestown early in January, 1913, by Mr. S. S. Cramer of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, who afterwards became one of the purchasers of the defendant's said interest, the other purchaser being Mr. Wadhams of Milwaukee. These parties were connected with a concern known as the Wadhams Oil Company, with headquarters, as we understand, at Milwaukee. The purpose of Mr. Cramer's visit to Jamestown, as explained in his testimony, was to purchase, if possible, a majority of the stock in the defendant company and to engage someone to do that for him. He called upon the plaintiff at his office in Jamestown to secure his services in acquiring such stock, having been referred to him as the best man to see in that connection. He did not at first advise the plaintiff that he was connected with an oil company, nor does it appear that he knew the latter to be connected in any way with the defendant company. Upon stating the object of his visit, the plaintiff informed him that he could not serve him in the matter, for the reason that he was assistant secretary and attorney for the company, and sought to discourage any attempt on his part to buy the stock; but in the course of the conversation he suggested to Cramer that he consider the matter of buying the defendant's lease, or that part of it covering the tract upon which its well aforesaid was located, and they discussed that matter several times during the few days that Cramer remained in Jamestown, the plaintiff stating, as his opinion, that the property was worth a quarter of a million dollars. Thereafter considerable correspondence passed between them with reference to the matter, and Cramer submitted some written suggestions to the effect that the defendant company be reorganized so as to provide for $100,000 of preferred stock and $200,000 of common stock, and selling one half of the common stock to his company for enough to pay back to the original stockholders of the defendant company the whole amount of their investment in the shape of dividends, and their present holdings to be exchanged for five times the amount in preferred stock, answering which, the plaintiff wrote that the stockholders would not accept what Cramer had suggested, but urged that he come to Jamestown forthwith, prepared to buy the lease. In response to that letter Cramer telegraphed the plaintiff that he could not come to Jamestown, and suggested that one or three of the directors of defendant company come to Milwaukee with full power to act, to which the plaintiff responded by writing that he doubted if the company would send one or more of the directors to Milwaukee, "in view of the policy they have been pursuing," but that he might suggest at the stockholders' meeting to be held soon, the advisability of conferring with him. The plaintiff made a report concerning his conference and correspondence with Mr. Cramer at a special meeting of the stockholders on January 24, 1913, and at that meeting the following resolution was adopted: "Resolved, that William Hjorth and Frank G. Curtis, be and they are hereby authorized to go to Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on behalf of this company, to confer with S. S. Cramer and others relative to the disposition of our oil products or lease, and report at the regular annual meeting of the company to be held February 3, 1913."

On the following day, January 25, 1913, the directors held a meeting at which a motion was made and carried to the effect that William Hjorth and Frank G. Curtis be given power to sell the company's lease on section 33 (the quarter section here involved), using their best judgment, but at a price not less than $75,000. Pursuant to the resolution and authority aforesaid, the plaintiff and Mr. Hjorth went to Milwaukee and there conferred with Mr. Cramer and Mr. Wadhams, and made a written report concerning the matter at the annual meeting of the defendant's stockholders held on February 3, 1913. It is unnecessary to refer to the report otherwise than to say that it was stated therein that they had quoted a price for the lease of $100,000 cash and $150,000 of 8 per cent preferred stock in a refining company, to be formed for the purpose of taking over the lease, and that the conference resulted in their submitting to Wadhams and Cramer the following written proposition upon which the latter asked an option of sixty days:

Milwaukee, Wis., Jan. 31, 1913.

Messrs. E. A. Wadhams and S. S. Cramer, Milwaukee, Wis.

Gentlemen:—

Our Hjorth Oil Company would sell you quarter section No. 33 which has our well No. 1 upon it for $100,000 cash and $150,000 preferred stock, in a corporation to be formed to refine the oil from our property. The proposed corporation to be incorporated at not to exceed $1,200,000. The preferred stock shall draw 8 per cent cumulative dividend and equally participate with common stock on all over 8 per cent paid to common stockholders. The Hjorth Oil Company shall sell all of its oil in the future to your proposed refinery company for the ruling price of oil, and you shall take our oil under these conditions. The Hjorth Oil will agree not to enter into the refining business.

Yours very truly,

Frank G. Curtis,

Approved: Wm. Hjorth.

We understand from the evidence that the record of the proceedings at that meeting does not show any action upon said report. But on the day following the meeting the plaintiff wrote to the prospective purchasers that it had been decided at the meeting to give them an option in accordance with "the inclosure," and he testified that an option agreement was prepared and sent to them with the letter. The agreement was returned with the statement that it could not be accepted, but that they had been willing to pay $100,000 in cash and $150,000 in common stock in the new company. An amended option was then sent them by plaintiff, providing, as we understand, for a division of the stock payment into part preferred and part common, which does not seem to have been accepted, though the time granted for acceptance was afterwards extended a few days, and in the meantime several letters concerning it passed between them and the plaintiff, the latter insisting that the property was fully worth more than the price specified in the option agreement in answer to proposals to pay a less amount, the last letter of the plaintiff in that connection dated April 10, 1913, and addressed to Mr. Wadhams closing with the following: "Whereas the option does not so provide, you assured me in your correspondence that if you could decide yes or no before the twenty-one days expired which we extended to you at $100 per day, that you would do so. We hope that you will let us know forthwith if you do not want the property at the agreed price, as we figure the $100 a day a considerable loss as compared with our other prospects."

Following the receipt of that letter and referring to it, Mr. Wadhams, on April 14, 1913, telegraphed the plaintiff that they assumed a former conversation with the plaintiff a relinquishment of options, and on the same date the plaintiff telegraphed to Wadhams and Cramer, asking if they would be at home Wednesday "to confer with us," and to wire reply, responding to which on the same date Wadhams telegraphed the plaintiff an affirmative answer. In the meantime, on April 10, 1913, at a meeting of defendant's directors, it had been decided "that a committee of three, consisting of F. O. Strandberg, William Hjorth, and Frank G. Curtis, as attorney, go to Milwaukee to confer and close a deal with Wadhams and his people." The trip to Milwaukee was delayed a few days, and plaintiff testified that such delay was at his suggestion, to await further developments, and on April 15, 1913, another meeting of the directors was held, at which a resolution was adopted that Frank O. Strandberg, William Hjorth, and Frank G. Curtis, as a committee of three, be authorized to sell, assign, and transfer any of the property, rights, or interests of the company in Wyoming for such an amount and on such terms and conditions as said committee, acting jointly, elects, and to sign, seal, and deliver the necessary papers.

The committee thus appointed and authorized by these resolutions went to Milwaukee immediately after the meeting of April 15th, and closed the sale with Wadhams and Cramer, which was finally accepted and ratified by the company, as found by the trial court, and on the general terms stated in the findings. It also appears that at a previous special meeting of the directors held on February 10, 1913, it was resolved that S. S. Cramer be telegraphed to learn if he is authorized to sign an option contract with the company, and, if he has such right, then that Frank G. Curtis be authorized to leave for Milwaukee on February 11 to close an option contract with him, the company to get $100,000 in cash for the quarter section in question, and as much stock, common and preferred, or common or preferred, as possible, but not less than $150,000 par value; the option agreement to be kept as short as possible, not to exceed forty days from date of option, an additional thirty days to be allowed if refiners agree to purchase.

The contract for the sale having been agreed upon on April 16, 1913, the stockholders of the defendant company held a meeting at Jamestown on April 18, 1913, at which gratification was expressed over the consummation of the sale, and the thanks of the company were extended to Messrs. Strandberg, Hjorth, and Curtis, and from the proceeds to be received from the sale it was decided that a dividend of 200 per cent be declared. All of the correspondence with the purchasers preceding the sale seems to have been carried on for the Hjorth Oil Company by the plaintiff; he also acted generally as spokesman for the committee in their conference with the purchasers; and the money for the cash payment was delivered to the company through his hands.

Before closing this recital of the facts the further fact should be mentioned that Wadhams and Cramer had first learned of the defendant's property through an agent sent by them to investigate the field in which the property is located, who had reported about this property, and that one of the defendant's representatives in the field had named $100,000 as a price for which the company's interest might be purchased, and, further, said agent's opinion that the property would be cheap at that price, though those facts do not seem to have been communicated to the plaintiff. And that report of his agent was the cause of Cramer's going to Jamestown in January, 1913.

There seems to be some conflict in the evidence as to whether the plaintiff, prior to the meeting of January 24, had mentioned to any officer of the company the fact that he had met Cramer and was corresponding with him about his buying the property, but, in our view of the case, that matter is not very material.

The only material point upon which there is a substantial conflict is whether there was an understanding that plaintiff was or was not to receive compensation for his services or what was said concerning it. The plaintiff testified that after the adoption of the resolution at the January meeting, authorizing him and Mr. Hjorth to go to Milwaukee to confer with Cramer and others, someone present asked what he was going to charge, and that he replied by saying: "I will go for $15 a day and expenses, if I do not close a deal, but if I close a deal, I will expect to be paid what is right." That Mr. Hjorth then rose and said that he would go for nothing, except his expenses, and that he, the plaintiff, then said: "I will go for nothing, except my expenses, unless I close a deal. If I close a deal I will expect what is right, for I anticipate the laborer is still worthy of his hire."

And he is corroborated in this by two of the stockholders who were present at the meeting, one of whom had offered the resolution aforesaid. In passing it might be said that Mr. Hjorth had been representing the company in the field, and was receiving a salary of $150 a month when away from home. Most of the witnesses for defendant, who were examined on the subject, admitted that something was said at the meeting aforesaid about plaintiff's compensation, but testified that what was said or what they understood was that plaintiff was to receive $15 a day, his usual fee when away from home, as added by some of the witnesses, in addition to expenses, if a deal was closed or a sale made, and such witnesses generally denied that plaintiff, at such meeting, made the statement aforesaid about a laborer being worthy of his hire; some of them testifying that the statement was made at a meeting held after the sale.

The matter of plaintiff's compensation does not appear to have been mentioned at any subsequent meeting until after the sale, but the plaintiff relies upon the resolution adopted at the January meeting aforesaid, and what was then said with reference to what he would charge, as showing his employment to negotiate the sale and his right to reasonable compensation for his services, and defendant's evidence to the effect that plaintiff was to be paid only $15 a day is based upon what occurred and was said at such meeting, and the general effect of its evidence is that, from what was then said, it was understood that plaintiff was to receive compensation for his services under the appointments aforesaid, if a sale was made, but that it was to be $15 a day. And it appears that in an action brought in New York by the plaintiff to recover for his services, which we understand to have been dismissed upon or before the bringing of the suit here, the defendant filed an answer, alleging, in substance, that Strandberg, Hjorth, and Curtis were appointed a committee to consummate a sale of the property, which had been under negotiations for some time, upon the understanding and agreement that said committee were acting in their own behalf and for the other stockholders, and that no compensation was to be paid them except their traveling expenses, unless the sale was consummated, in which event there was to be paid to Curtis $15 per day for the time actually spent in addition to such expenses; a copy of that answer having been introduced in evidence by the plaintiff without objection.

The only evidence as to the reasonable value of plaintiff's services is his testimony, fixing it at "$35,000 and more," and stating the basis or percentage upon which it was computed at that amount, and explaining the reasons therefor, including the time occupied, the advantage to the company from the sale, and the provision in the contract for disposing of its oil, and other matters considered in estimating such value. The defendant offered no evidence on the subject.

The contention of the plaintiff is that he was employed by the defendant as a broker to negotiate and make the sale, and that he acted in that capacity, entitling him to a reasonable compensation for his services. Defendant's contention is: First, that the plaintiff was not so employed, but that the only authorized service rendered by him in connection with the sale was as a member of a committee of stockholders; and, second, that he was not the procuring cause of the sale, and did not discover or produce the buyers, and, therefore, performed no service as a broker, entitling him to compensation as such.

There is sufficient evidence to sustain the finding that the plaintiff, in addition to his law practice, was engaged in the business of a broker in the sale of stocks, bonds, and other properties, but that fact does not seem to us to be very material, except as showing a reason for the plaintiff's employment or appointment to negotiate and make the sale. The fact of his experience in such matters, together with the fact that he had been in correspondence with the parties, had met one of them, and proposed their purchase of the property, may have been considered in appointing him as one of a committee to confer with the prospective purchasers, and with authority to negotiate and consummate the sale. In our view of the case, under the issues and upon the evidence, the right of the plaintiff to compensation for his services in connection with the sale does not depend upon his having been employed strictly or distinctively as a

erty—right of stockholder to

broker, and for that reason it is not essential to his recovery of a reasonable compensation that he should have produced the buyers or been the sole procuring cause of the sale, although we are inclined to the opinion that if his employment should be considered as calling for his services strictly as a broker the evidence would be sufficient to sustain a finding to the effect that he had produced the buyers and was the procuring cause of the sale, within the rule under which those conditions are to be considered in determining a broker's right to compensation.

While the petition alleges that the plaintiff was engaged in the business of a broker, it is not alleged, at least not directly, that he was employed or made the sale in that capacity, nor do the findings state that he was so employed, or that the sale was made by him as a broker. On the contrary, the petition alleges, in substance, as to the employment and sale merely that, at the special instance and request of the defendant, the plaintiff undertook the sale of the property, and to provide for selling defendant's oil, for which the defendant agreed to pay him a reasonable sum, and that pursuant to said agreement he made the sale, thus omitting to allege that he undertook or made the sale as a broker or in any particular or stated capacity. And clearly, he might have undertaken the sale at the special instance and request of the defendant, under his

as a member of

member of a committee appointed for that purpose, and we think the evidence shows that he did so undertake the sale; that is to say, he continued the negotiations as a member of such committee under the authority vested in him by such appointment, and finally entered into the contract of sale pursuant to such appointment, although acting jointly with the other committee member or members in his conferences with the purchasers and in concluding the contract of sale, and may have consulted with them, and from time to time with the directors, respecting the intervening correspondence carried on between him and the purchasers. And the findings, although stating in one paragraph that the plaintiff had been engaged in the business of a broker, state as to his employment merely that he was employed to sell the property, without stating the capacity in which he was employed.

As we understand and construe the petition and findings, therefore, the right of the plaintiff to recover the reasonable value of his services is not thereby limited to services rendered under an employment distinctively or strictly as a broker, but will sustain the judgment if upon the law and the evidence the plaintiff is entitled to recover at all for his services rendered under his appointment aforesaid. And we deem it unnecessary to determine whether the evidence shows, or is sufficient to show, that he was employed, or that the property was placed in his hands, as a broker.

That it was understood that the plaintiff was to receive compensation for his services is, we think, made clear by the evidence, the only substantial controversy in that respect having reference to the amount of such compensation; the plaintiff claiming that he was to be paid a reasonable compensation, or "what is right," and the defendant claiming that it was limited to $15 per day. The trial court determined the conflict in the evidence as to that matter in plaintiff's favor, and as there is sufficient evidence to sustain such finding, the case must be considered by this court upon that view of the evidence, viz., that the agreement or understanding was that the plaintiff should receive a reasonable compensation for his services. No objection is here raised as to the amount of the recovery, nor was it challenged as excessive by the motion for new trial. It is, at least, doubtful whether the finding as to the amount should be considered as having been excepted to, for, although it is stated at the conclusion of the findings that all were excepted to, such finding is not mentioned in the written statement of the defendant's exceptions, a paper not required by our practice, but evidently filed to clearly state in the record the particular findings to which the defendant excepted.

However, the finding as to the amount was not complained of in the motion for new trial, at least not in the proper way to present the question of error in amount of recovery to the trial court. The only grounds of the motion referring to the findings or judgment are that the findings are not sustained by sufficient evidence that they are contrary to law, and that the evidence was and is insufficient in law to warrant any finding or judgment in favor of the plaintiff or against the defendant. And, as held in Syndicate Improv. Co. v. Bradley, 7 Wyo. 228, 51 Pac. 242, 52 Pac. 532, that is insufficient to present the question of error in the amount of recovery to the district court or as ground for reversal in this court.

—motion for new trial—preserving question for review.

His services, however, were such as are usually performed by a broker or agent in the sale of property belonging to another, and that he should render that kind of service was clearly contemplated by his appointment. And it appears to have been largely the result of his efforts that the sale was finally made for the price and on the terms stated. Hence, under the finding of the court upon the conflicting evidence aforesaid, he is entitled to receive and recover what his services were reasonably worth, unless prevented therefrom by the fact that the services were performed under an appointment as member of a committee, or that he was a stockholder in the company, and, when the negotiations were commenced and the original appointment made, the assistant secretary. But his right to such compensation, under the circumstances of the case, is not invalidated by either of those facts or all combined, nor would the law deny such right if he had remained assistant secretary through the entire period of the negotiations and until the sale was made.

It is well settled that when a stockholder, who is not an officer or director, renders a service to the corporation by proper request or authority, a contract is implied to pay the reasonable value of his services, unless the circumstances negative such implication, as by showing that the services were to be gratuitous. 2 Thomp. And by the great weight of authority such a contract may be implied in favor of a director or other officer as to services outside the scope of his official duty. 2 Cook, Corp. § 657; 3 Clark & M. Priv. Corp. § 671; Montana Tonopah Min. Co. v. Dunlap, 116 C. C. A. 286, 196 Fed. 612; Dunlap v. Montana Tonopah Min. Co. (C. We find the rule as to services rendered by one who is only a stockholder well stated in Goodin v. Dixie-Portland Cement Co. 79 W. Va. 83, L.R.A.1917F, 308, 90 S. E. 544, as follows: "The principle underlying the rule respecting directors is that they are trustees for the stockholders, and that in the absence of express contract they should not be permitted to recover for services rendered in the performance of the ordinary duties pertaining to their offices upon any implied contract therefor; but the reason for this rule is not generally applicable to stockholders. They stand in no fiduciary relation to the corporation, and we hold, with the great weight of authority, that when the circumstances of the employment do not negative such implication, and a stockholder is called upon by corporate authority to perform some special service, whether of an official character or otherwise, a contract is raised by implication to pay him what his services are reasonably worth."

In Clark & Marshall on Private Corporations, it is said, in substance, that while the directors of a corporation are not entitled to salary or other compensation when performing nothing more than the usual and ordinary duties pertaining to their office, in the absence of an express provision or agreement for compensation when the services are performed, such rule applying also to directors serving in an official capacity, the rule, by the weight of authority, does not apply to services rendered by a director, president, vice president or other managing officer, as a mere attorney, broker, or agent, or in a purely ministerial capacity, or otherwise outside of the usual and ordinary duties of his office; and that by the overwhelming weight of authority the doctrine denying compensation to directors and other managing officers, in the absence of express provision or agreement therefor, has no application to services not properly pertaining to their office, but rendered by them outside of their regular duties, and that if such services are rendered at the request of the corporation or the board of directors, with the understanding that they are to be paid for, the law will imply a promise, in the absence of any special agreement, to pay what they are reasonably worth. And, further, that the rule denying such compensation, in the absence of express provision or agreement therefor, does not apply to ministerial officers and employees who are not directors, and have no control over the property and funds of the corporation, even though they may be stockholders; "and if such an officer or employee is elected or appointed to perform valuable services for the corporation under circumstances indicating intention and expectation of payment, but without any express contract, the law will imply a promise on the part of the corporation to pay a reasonable compensation." § 671, pp. 2050, 2053, 2055.

In National Loan & Invest. Co. v. Rockland Co. 36 C. C. A. 370, 94 Fed. 335, Circuit Judge Sanborn, speaking for the United States court of appeals for the eighth circuit, discusses the rule as to directors and officers, and concludes as follows: "Some authorities have gone so far as to hold that officers of a corporation, who are also its directors, cannot recover for the discharge of their duties unless their compensation is fixed by a by-law, or by a resolution of the board before their services are rendered. . . . We are unwilling to hold that such officers should be deprived of all compensation because the amounts of their salaries were not definitely fixed before they entered upon the discharge of their duties. A thoughtful and deliberate consideration of this entire question, and an extended consideration of the authorities upon it, have led to the conclusion that this is the true rule: Officers of a corporation, who are also directors, and who, without any agreement, express or implied, with the corporation or its owners, or their representatives, have voluntarily rendered their services, can recover no back pay or compensation therefor; and it is beyond the powers of the board of directors, after such services are rendered, to pay for them out of the funds of the corporation, or to create a debt of the corporation on account of them (citing cases). But such officers, who have rendered their services under an agreement, either express or implied, with the corporation, its owners or representatives, that they shall receive reasonable, but indefinite, compensation therefor, may recover as much as their services are worth; and it is not beyond the powers of the board of directors to fix and pay reasonable salaries to them after they have discharged the duties of their offices."

In the Maryland case above cited, Santa Clara Min. Asso. v. Meredith, 49 Md. 389, 33 Am. Rep. 264, 4 Mor. Min. Rep. 44, after stating the general rule as to the necessity for an express contract to entitle a director or president of a corporation to recover compensation for services within the line and scope of his duty as such, the court says: "But if a president or director of a corporation renders services to his corporation which are not within the scope of, and are not required of him by, his duties as president or director, but are such as are properly to be performed by an agent, broker, or attorney, he may recover compensation for such services upon an implied promise."

In Huffaker v. Krieger (Huffaker v. Germania Safety Vault & T. Co.) 107 Ky. 200, 46 L.R.A. 384, 53 S. W. 288, directors were held entitled to compensation for their services in disposing of the property of the corporation, through which the corporation was relieved of its embarrassed financial condition, and enabled to pay its debts and a considerable dividend to the stockholders; it being held that such services did not pertain to the ordinary duties of the office of director, and a contract was implied to pay for them; it appearing that to effect the sale the directors had been required to expend large amounts from their personal means to travel to distant cities, and remain there for months. And in Paine v. Kentucky Ref. Co. 159 Ky. 270, 167 S. W. 375, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 389, it appeared that a director had been appointed a member of a committee to audit and investigate a great mass of books and accounts of the corporation, and eighteen subsidiary companies, in an effort to settle a dispute between the corporation and its general manager, the other members of the committee, being salaried officers, leaving practically all the work to the unsalaried director aforesaid, who was an experienced accountant, and he was entitled to recover a reasonable compensation for such service as upon an implied promise to pay.

If a director or managing officer is permitted to recover upon an implied contract a reasonable compensation for services rendered outside of his official duties, it must certainly be true that one who does not hold such official position, but is merely a stockholder, or if he be also an assistant secretary, may likewise recover a reasonable compensation for his services when called upon by corporate authority to perform them, and especially when it has been agreed or understood that he was to be paid for such services. The plaintiff was not in fact assistant secretary at the time of the sale, nor during the latter and greater part of the period of the negotiations, but there is nothing in the evidence to show that the duties of that position were other than merely ministerial, and clearly they did not include the carrying on of negotiations for and selling valuable property of the corporation. Something is said in the brief about the plaintiff, as assistant secretary, being a salaried officer; but as we recall the evidence he was paid for his service in that capacity only the sum of $15 per month.

We have thus considered the case upon its merits under the evidence and the findings and the exceptions to the findings, notwithstanding that we have failed to find in the bill of exceptions anything to show an exception to the overruling of the motion for new trial, although the journal entry of the overruling of the motion in the record outside the bill shows an exception. But the question was not raised or suggested by counsel. For the reasons aforesaid we are of the opinion that the judgment must be affirmed; and it will be so ordered.

ANNOTATION.

Right of stockholder not a director, officer, or employee of the corporation to compensation for services in selling stock or corporate property in absence of express contract.

There is no reason why an ordinary stockholder should not contract with his corporation with the same freedom as an individual, provided only that the weight of his holding of stock does not compel the making of contracts with him unfavorable to the interests of his fellow stockholders. The fact of his interest in the corporation may, however, lend force to the contention that he intended services rendered by him to it to be gratuitous.

With the exception below referred to, no case has been found involving the right of a stockholder, who was not a director, officer, or employee of the corporation, to compensation for services in selling stock or corporate property in absence of express contract.

In Sidway v. Missouri Land & Live Stock Co. (1901) 163 Mo. 342, 63 S. W. 705, the largest stockholder of a Scotch corporation owning large properties in Missouri claimed to have rendered services to it over a long series of years, including services in relation to sales of its lands, although he had made frequent statements in writing that the services were gratuitous. In reversing a judgment in his favor, the court said: "If there was no substantial evidence, as it seems there was not, to overcome the frequently written admissions of plaintiff that his services were gratuitous, then there was no basis laid for an instruction given at the instance of plaintiff to the effect that the burden was on defendant to show 'that said services were gratuitously performed.' It is everywhere conceded that no one can make another his debtor without the latter's consent. 'But, ordinarily, if one stands by in silence and sees labor performed on premises belonging to him, of which he accepts and enjoys the benefits, a promise to pay therefor may be inferred.' 8 Wait, Act. & Def. 719, citing cases; Sprague v. Sea (1899) 152 Mo. l. c. 332, 53 S. W. 1074. In this case, however, no such assumption can be raised or implied in the very teeth of continued written assertions of plaintiff that his services were free, and that he was getting no pay." In reversing a second judgment for the plaintiff (1904) 187 Mo. 649, 86 S. W. 150, the court said: "The law of this state is, there can be no recovery for services rendered voluntarily and with no expectation at the time of rendition that they will be compensated, and this is true whether the services were or were not beneficial. A subsequent change of intention by the party performing the service does not alter the rule." B. B. B.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Williams, Puckitt, & Harty and Martin & McDonald for appellant.

Mr. E. A. Berry, Assistant Attorney General, for the State.

Morrow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This conviction is for murder, the punishment being fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for twenty years.

The state's theory is that the deceased was assassinated. The evidence relied upon by the state is wholly circumstantial. The deceased resided in the country, and early in the morning a neighbor went to his house and found his body in his yard, near the door of his garage. The body was cold and stiff, and apparently the deceased had been dead six or eight hours. There were a number of buckshot wounds in his face and head. As a motive for the homicide the state advanced the theory, supported by the testimony of the wife of deceased, that she and appellant were criminally intimate; that she on the day preceding the homicide had told the appellant that their intimacy must cease, and he had declared his determination to have her.

There are a number of bills of exception complaining of the admission of evidence. These bills complain of the introduction of specific parts of the evidence, but are not so drawn as to disclose the relation of the facts to which they refer to other facts in the case, nor to negative their relevancy as links in a chain of circumstantial evidence when considered in connection with other circumstances. In a case depending upon circumstantial evidence it is necessary only to render it admissible that it tends to prove the issue, or constitutes a link in the chain of proof, and it is not to be rejected, though standing alone it might not justify a verdict. In such cases incidents may be legitimate evidence which would be deemed irrelevant in a case depending upon direct and positive testimony. Preston v. State, 8 Tex. App. 30; Washington v. State, 8 Tex. App. 377; Simms v. State, 10 Tex. App. 132; Langford v. State, 17 Tex. App. 445; 2 Vernon's Crim. Stat. p. 595, note 18. Under these rules the bills show no error wherein complaint is made of the fact that a shotgun was found at appellant's place of business, and that subsequent to the homicide, it bore evidence of recent discharge. Whart. Homicide, p. 943; Baines v. State, 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 490, 66 S. W. 847; 1 Michie, Homicide, p. 821, § 170.

the evening preceding the homicide the deceased was in the village of Forney, at which the appellant lived, and near which the deceased lived; that about 9 o'clock the same night an automobile passed along the road near the scene of the homicide. There was evidence that appellant owned an automobile; that the tire on one side was smooth and on the other a Diamond tread. There were found on the ground a short distance from the scene of the homicide tracks made by an automobile with a smooth tire on one side and a Diamond tread tire on the other. There was evidence that on the same night that the homicide took place appellant was recognized driving his car. The imprint made by the Diamond tread tire on the mud near the scene of the homicide was preserved and introduced in evidence, and a plaster cast of the tire on appellant's car was also made and proof introduced that the tread on his car and the impression on the mud were identical in size and shape. The fact that it was possible that the track may have been made prior to the homicide, or that it might have been made by an automobile other than that of appellant, would, under the circumstances, relate to the weight of the testimony, but would not be legal ground for its rejection. Baines v. State, 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 495, 66 S. W. 847; Doss v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 49, 95 S. W. 1040; Rucker v. State, 51 Tex. Crim. Rep. 222, 101 S. W. 804; Liles v. State, 58 Tex. Crim. The bills of exception complaining of the identification of the car belonging to appellant present no error.

The complaint of the evidence that footprints were found in the vicinity of the homicide, and that appellant's shoe was identified and compared with the tracks, is — tracks. not well founded.

The trial court should have granted a new trial because of the remarks of the county attorney. Among other things, it appears from the bill he said, referring to counsel for appellant: "You said the facts of this case point just as much to the guilt of these men, Terry McKeller and John McKeller, as Irvin Haley. The state has seen fit to put the two McKellers upon the witness stand to deny their guilt; but you did not put Mr. Haley upon the witness stand to deny his guilt."

There were other similar remarks not necessary to quote. Our statute (Code Crim. Proc. art. 790) provides: "The failure of any defendant to testify" in his own behalf "shall not be taken as a circumstance against him, nor shall the same be alluded to or commented on by counsel in the cause."

A disregard of this command of the statute has been, from the date of its passage, uniformly held an impermissible cause for reversal. Alvilla v. State, 32 Tex. Crim. Rep. 136, 22 S. W. 406; Vernon's Crim. Stat. (Tex.) vol. 2, p. 716, note 29, and cases cited.

The conversations between appellant and Mrs. Williams, detailed by her, disclosing his illicit relations with her, his desire that she abandon her husband, her unwillingness to do so, his references to his freedom since the death of his wife, and other matters detailed in her testimony, were relevant and admissible in evidence. Weaver v. State, supra; Rice v. State, 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 149, 112 S. W. 299.

The state introduced evidence for the purpose of showing that, some ten months prior to the homicide in question, the appellant had killed his wife by administering poison to her. The admissibility of this testimony is challenged upon various grounds. The manner in which this is presented in the bill of exceptions renders it difficult to grasp entirely appellant's viewpoint, but in view of another trial we express such views as we have formed touching its relation to the case. The evidence showed that appellant's wife died at night. He called a physician and her stepmother, who arrived after her death. According to their statement appellant and his wife came in from a drive; that his wife had been taking some aspirin for neuralgia which she had; that they went to bed, and later she told him to bring her that dose of quinine she got that evening in capsules; that he gave it to her, and after taking it she went to sleep and dozed off, and later she woke him up saying she was feeling bad; that she said she did not need a doctor, she would be all right, but that she had a convulsion, and he phoned for a doctor, and that she died in his arms. The doctor said he did not remember that the appellant told him how long his wife lived after she complained; that she woke up suddenly and grabbed him; that he had given her some quinine about an hour before the doctor was called. The doctor testified: "In an examination of the body I found the lower lip bitten. After that I looked over her arms and portions that were exposed, I think. I think there was some remark made about some splotches on her body. I think, as a rule, pied splotches follow strychnine poisoning. I made no analytical examination of the contents of the stomach; there was no post mortem examination had."

As we understand the record there was no prosecution founded upon this matter. Evidence was introduced, however, on the trial of this case that some time subsequent to the death of Mrs. Haley her stepmother visited the house of appellant, and found a bottle marked "strychnine," and talked to appellant about it, and he said he knew it was there; that he had bought it several years ago to kill a dog and had never used it; that she asked him if he did not know that it was half gone, and he replied, "no," that it had never been unwrapped; that the bottle was turned over to her husband, and it was introduced upon the trial.

The general rule of evidence is that evidence of extraneous crimes is not received. The reason for its rejection, as stated by Mr. Underhill, is "that persons selected as jurors will very naturally believe that a person is guilty of the crime with which he is charged if it is proved to their satisfaction that he has committed a similar offense, or any offense of an equally heinous character; and it cannot be said with truth that this tendency is wholly without reason or justification, as every person can bear testimony from his or her experience, that a man who will commit one crime is very likely subsequently to commit another of the same description. To guard against this evil, and at the same time to avoid the delay which would be incident to an indefinite multiplication of issues, the general rule (to which, however, some very important exceptions may be noted) forbids the introduction of evidence which will show, or tend to show, that the accused has committed any crime wholly independent of that offense for which he is on trial." Underhill, Crim. Ev. § 87.

If it be assumed that the facts of this case bring it within one of the exceptions to which we will hereafter refer, it is clear that the due administration of justice demands that evidence tending to show appellant's guilt of another crime should not be admitted, unless the proof of the other offense is clear. In this case, if it is proper for the state to use the alleged fact that appellant poisoned his wife as a circumstance connecting him with the assassination of Williams, it should be shown beyond a reasonable doubt that his wife died from poison knowingly administered by him with intent to destroy her. Applying this principle to the case in hand, we find no satisfactory evidence that the appellant's wife died from poisoning.

offense—
admissibility.

"In a case of . . . poisoning, where the symptoms and appearances during the last illness become controlling facts in determining whether the death was from poison or from disease, the charge is not made out unless the prosecution negative everything but poison as the cause of death. And this they can only do by showing affirmatively that the combined symptoms, and the absolutely certain facts with which they are associated, are inconsistent with any other disease or ailment." People v. Millard, 53 Mich. 63, 18 N. W. 562; 1 Whart. Crim. Ev. p. 162.

The circumstances, especially when taken in connection with the subsequent developments growing out of the present prosecution, surrounded appellant with suspicion connecting him with the death of his wife; but to justify the admission of evidence of another crime, its commission must be proved, and if the state can do no more than supply evidence casting suspicion upon the accused, the evidence should be rejected. We think on the application of this rule the evidence admitted on the subject should have been excluded from the jury. If, upon another trial, evidence is proffered sufficiently cogent to establish the fact that appellant's wife died from poison, we believe the evidence should be received as coming within that exception to the rule excluding independent crimes which recognizes their admissibility when they are evidence of a systematic plan formed and executed by the accused. This arises from the theory advanced by the state that the appellant, desiring to continue unobstructed his illicit relations with the wife of deceased, formed a plan to remove the obstacles, viz., his own wife and the deceased Williams, and proof that he killed his wife in pursuance of his purpose to attain the same object which would furnish the motive for the killing of the deceased tended to identify appellant as the slayer of Williams. Concerning the admissibility of similar acts, although they constitute other offenses, on the theory that they are a part of a design or system, Mr. Wigmore, in his work on Evidence, § 104, says: "There is no situation in which a design to do an act would be irrelevant to show the doing of the act."

Again, at § 304: "When the very doing of the act charged is still to be proved, one of the evidential facts receivable is the person's design or plan to do it." "To render them admissible, there must be not merely a similarity in the results, but such a concurrence of common features that the various acts are naturally to be explained as caused by a general plan, of which they are the individual manifestations."

Thus he says: "To show a plan to rob a safe, the stealing of the key would be relevant; or to show a plan to murder a whole family and obtain their insurance money, the killings of other insured members of the family would be admissible."

Precedents from which these general statements of the author are taken will be found at § 363 of the same volume. Among these are cases in which, the plan being to get rid of obstacles to the marriage or association with a particular woman, crimes committed in furtherance of this design have been received as relevant to the issue of identity of the slayer of the deceased in the particular case. See Stephens v. People, 19 N. Y. 571. Such evidence has often been received in cases of poisoning where the evidence of identity was circumstantial.

If this evidence is received upon another trial, it should be limited in the charge of the court, and it should be made clear to the jury that it is not to be considered at all against the appellant, unless the state had shown beyond a reasonable doubt that appellant's wife died from poison, knowingly administered by the appellant with intent to kill her.

Because of the errors pointed out, the judgment of the lower court is reversed, and the cause remanded.

ANNOTATION.

Admissibility in criminal prosecution of evidence to prove other crime as affected by degree or sufficiency of the evidence.

As a general rule, in a prosecution for one offense evidence that another independent crime has been committed by the defendant is inadmissible. There are, however, certain well-defined exceptions to this rule. This note is not concerned with the competency or relevancy of such evidence, but merely with the question of the degree of proof of the other crime necessary to render it admissible in cases in which it is otherwise proper.

It will be observed that in the reported case (HALEY v. STATE, ante, 779) it was held that the due administration of justice demands that evidence of the accused's guilt of another crime should not be admitted unless the proof of the other crime is clear, and that, in order to use the alleged fact that he has committed another crime, its commission must be shown beyond a reasonable doubt. This conclusion finds support in other cases.

Thus, in Baxter v. State (1914) 91 Ohio St. 167, 110 N. E. 456, in a trial for embezzlement, it was held that evidence that the accused was guilty of other similar offenses must be such that a jury would be authorized to find him guilty of the offenses. The court said: "Evidence of a vague and uncertain character offered for the purpose of proving that the defendant had been guilty of similar offenses should never be admitted under any pretense whatever. True, it is not always possible to show an entire transaction by one witness, and, therefore, if the state offers evidence which may become important in connection with other evidence proposed to be offered later in the case, it should be admitted; but if the state fails to introduce such further evidence, which, if uncontradicted, would authorize the jury to find the defendant guilty of the other offenses sought to be proved, then there is an absolute failure on the part of the state to make a prima facie case of guilt of the defendant of these other offenses, and it becomes the peremptory duty of the trial court to strike such evidence from the record, and to instruct the jury that they are not to consider it for any purpose whatever. In this particular case the state sought to prove that this defendant had been guilty of a similar offense in Cincinnati, Ohio, and a similar offense in Kenton, Ohio. The evidence offered on behalf of the state in respect to these two other offenses was absolutely and wholly insufficient to make anything like a prima facie case against the defendant as to these transactions. If the accused had then been upon trial for either of these offenses, it would have been the duty of the trial court to instruct the jury to return a verdict of 'Not guilty.' The whole scope and extent of the evidence offered tended to prove no more than a suspicion of guilt. If either of these offenses had in fact been committed, the evidence did not connect this defendant with them, further than to show that he had the opportunity to be guilty; but it also appeared that at least a half dozen other persons in each of these transactions had equal opportunity with the defendant to appropriate the funds claimed to have been embezzled. The court of appeals of Franklin county, which is the court of last resort on disputed questions of fact, found that the testimony admitted in regard to these other offenses was of such a circumstantial character that it did not afford even probable cause that the defendant was guilty, but refused to reverse for this reason, upon the theory that this evidence before an intelligent jury would not have any weight. Evidence that an accused was guilty of other similar offenses must be such that a jury would be authorized to find him guilty of these offenses. The trial court erred in receiving this evidence, erred in failing to instruct the jury at the time it was received as to the purpose for which it was competent, and erred in not striking all of this evidence relating to these other transactions from the record and instructing the jury to disregard the same. The trial court did charge the jury in its general charge that it must find from the evidence offered that the defendant was guilty of these other offenses, beyond a reasonable doubt, before it would be authorized to consider that evidence for any purpose. But this charge, while perfectly proper in a proper case, could not be otherwise than prejudicial to the accused in this particular case, because the jury would necessarily infer therefrom that there was substantial evidence of the guilt of the accused of these other offenses that it was authorized to consider, when in truth and in fact there was no such evidence."

And in Pelton v. State (1910) 60 Tex. Crim. Rep. 412, 132 S. W. 480, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 86, in a prosecution for forgery, it was held that, in order for evidence of other forgeries by the defendant to be used by the jury as evidence of his intent in committing the alleged forgery for which he was being tried, they must believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the other transactions were forgeries, the court stating that if the evidence merely tended to show them to be forgeries they were not admissible against the defendant. This case follows Taylor v. State (1906) 50 Tex. Crim. Rep. 381, 97 S. W. 474, also a prosecution for forgery, in which the same result was reached.

And in Com. v. McGarvey (1914) 158 Ky. 570, 165 S. W. 973, a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen, it was held that evidence offered as to goods found in the possession of the defendant other than those charged in the indictment, unless such evidence was a part of the res gestæ, must be such as would prove the other goods to have been stolen; and the evidence in this case was held insufficient to show this.

In State v. Hyde (1911) 234 Mo. 200, 136 S. W. 316, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 191, it was held that in order that evidence of the commission of other crimes be admitted there must be substantial evidence that the accused had committed such crimes. There was held to be no substantial evidence in this case that the defendant, who was a physician and charged with the murder of a relative of his wife to obtain his property, also intentionally killed another relative by bleeding him, ostensibly to relieve him from an apoplectic attack, where the testimony showed that another physician was present and participated in the operation, although it also showed that there was a difference of opinion between them as to the quantity of blood that should be drawn, and that the drawing continued after the other physician stated that he thought enough had been drawn. It was further held in this case that there was no substantial evidence that the defendant had poisoned another relative of his wife, the testimony showing that such relative had a fatal case of typhoid fever, and failing to show poison in his organs, and being inconsistent with the poison theory. And there was also held to be no substantial evidence that the defendant killed still other members of his wife's family by planting typhoid germs in a water cooler, there being no proof that he had planted such germs, or that any germs came from the cooler, although there was evidence that the defendant, a physician, had previously obtained typhoid germs for use, as he stated, in laboratory work. And other claims that the defendant inoculated some of his wife's relatives with typhoid germs by giving them candy and capsules were held not supported by any evidence worthy of consideration. The court in this case said: "We are of opinion that none of the testimony of other alleged crimes should have been given to the jury. Having been admitted, it should have been withdrawn from their consideration. We also think that the better practice would be that the court should, as a preliminary matter, when the state proposes to offer evidence of other crimes, either hear the evidence or satisfy itself as to its character and scope by inquiry of the prosecuting attorney, and determine whether there is sufficient evidence of the other alleged crime to justify its submission to a jury. We do not mean to say that the evidence upon such preliminary hearing must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the other crime has been committed, but that there should appear substantial evidence sufficient to take a case to a jury."

And in Com. v. Robinson (1886) 146 Mass. 571, 16 N. E. 452, where the question involved was as to the sufficiency of preliminary evidence before the trial court, as to a scheme and intention by the accused to kill her sister and then the latter's husband, in order to obtain his insurance, to warrant the admission, in a prosecution for killing the husband, of evidence that she had poisoned her sister, the court, in holding the preliminary evidence in the case sufficient, said: "But where, in a case like the present, the admissibility of testimony depends upon the determination of some prior fact by the court, there is no rule of law that, in order to render the testimony admissible, such prior fact must be established by a weight of evidence which will amount to a demonstration, and shut out all doubt or question of its existence. It is only necessary that there should be so much evidence as to make it proper to submit the whole evidence to the jury. The fact of the admission of the evidence by the judge does not in a legal sense give it any greater weight with the jury; it does not affect the burden of proof, or change the duty of the jury in weighing the whole evidence. They must still be satisfied, in a criminal case, upon the whole evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt. Ordinarily, questions of fact are exclusively for the jury, and questions of law for the court. But when, in order to pass upon the admissibility of evidence, the determination of a preliminary question of fact is necessary, the court, in the due and orderly course of the trial, must necessarily determine it, as far as is necessary for that purpose, and usually without the assistance, at that stage, of the jury. If, under such circumstances, testimony is admitted against a party's objection, it may often happen that he may still ask the jury to disregard it."

It has been held, in a prosecution for arson, that evidence that the defendant had another fire some years before was not admissible, without positive proof that the former fire had been set by the defendant. Kahn v. State (1914) 182 Ind. 1, 105 N. E. 385.

And in State v. Carter (1900) 112 Iowa, 15, 83 N. W. 715, in a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, evidence of other similar pretenses was held not admissible to show intent, where there was no evidence to show that the other pretenses were false.

In State v. Foxton (1914) 166 Iowa, 181, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 919, 147 N. W. 347, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 727, evidence that other checks, drawn by one on trial for obtaining money on a bad check, were not paid, was held inadmissible, in the absence of anything to show that they were presented to the drawee, or that they would not have been paid if presented. And in this case, evidence that another check drawn by the defendant was not paid, without showing that there were no funds to meet it, was held prejudicial, where the accused testified that he thought he had made arrangements for the payment of the check, for the making of which he is on trial.

In People v. Jones (1909) 12 Cal. App. 129, 106 Pac. 724, it was held that a book containing an entry of a subscription solicited by the defendant in a prosecution for forgery was not rendered inadmissible because of entries therein of other subscriptions, the court stating that such irrelevant entries, unless supplemented by other evidence, would have no tendency to prove other offenses. JOHN J. O'CONNOR
v.
MARYLAND MOTOR CAR INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

Illinois Supreme Court — February 20, 1919.

(287 Ill. 204, 122 N. E. 489.)

Insurance — theft — recovery of property — effect.

1. Under a policy insuring against automobile theft, providing for payment sixty days after notice and proof of loss, the recovery of a stolen automobile after the expiration of the sixty days will not defeat liability on the policy.

Definition — abandonment.

2. Abandonment in its technical sense means the relinquishment of a right, the giving up of something to which one is entitled, absolutely, without reference to any particular person or purpose.

[See 1 R. C. L. 1-3.]

Abandonment — when complete.

3. The moment an intention to abandon and relinquishment of possession unite an abandonment is complete.

[See 1 R. C. L. 1-3.]

Insurance — abandonment — when permissible.

4. Abandonment in insurance is not necessary when the loss is actually complete, and cannot be made unless the loss is constructively complete.

5. A provision in a policy insuring against loss of automobile by theft and making the policy payable sixty days after notice and proof of loss, that there can be no abandonment to the company of the property described, means no abandonment before the expiration of the sixty days.

— sufficiency of proof of loss — assurance of agent.

6. One whose automobile is insured against loss by theft is entitled to rely on the assurance of the insurer's agent that his proof of loss is sufficient, although sworn proof is not furnished.

[See 14 R. C. L. 1346.]

Appeal — question raised for first time — proper party.

7. The objection that an action upon a policy of insurance against theft was not brought by the right party, because the policy had been assigned by plaintiff as collateral security, cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

— improper evidence — ground for reversal.

8. A verdict directed for the proper party in an action on a policy insuring against automobile theft cannot be interfered with on appeal because evidence was admitted that insured had purchased another machine shortly after the theft.

— letter advising settlement.

9. A reversal for improperly admitting in evidence a letter from the agent to the home office, advising settlement of the claim, is not required in an action on a policy of insurance against theft, if the verdict was directed for the right party.

[See 2 R. C. L. 198, 250-253.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Second Branch of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Municipal Court of Chicago in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy insuring against automobile theft.
Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Bates, Hicks, & Folonie, for appellant:

Plaintiff did not suffer an "actual" total loss of his automobile.

Globe Ins. Co. v. Sherlock, 25 Ohio St. 50.

The object of the policy is to make good loss or damage from theft of the property, not, in the event of damage, to purchase it. The insurers have no right to compel the insured to hand the property over to them.

Claypool, being the authorized agent representing defendant in its transactions with the plaintiff, was properly called for cross-examination under § 33 of the Municipal Court Act.

Kaestner v. Pope, 152 Ill. App. 22.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee, John J. O'Connor, having had his automobile stolen, upon which he had a theft insurance policy in the appellant company, brought suit in the municipal court of Chicago to recover the value of the automobile as fixed by the policy. The trial court directed a verdict in his favor for $1,375 and costs, and from the judgment entered thereon an appeal was taken to the appellate court, where the judgment was affirmed. The appellate court issued a certificate stating that the questions involved were of such importance that they should be passed upon by the supreme court, and the case is here by appeal.

Appellee was the owner of a Hudson car and insured it in the appellant company for one year from March 31, 1916, through Roy E. Claypool, an agent of the company. Sunday evening, September 10, 1916, O'Connor left his car at the corner of La Salle and Randolph streets, in Chicago, while he went to a near-by restaurant, asking a street railway employee to watch it. A few minutes thereafter a young man jumped into the car, unlocked it, and drove rapidly away. The next day appellee went to Claypool's office and reported his loss, and also sent a letter detailing the circumstances. About five days thereafter appellee bought a new car, giving his note therefor, and assigning the policy here in question to the company from which he bought the automobile, as collateral security for the note. On November 15, 1916, the Chicago police department notified appellee that they had recovered the stolen car, and he accompanied a police officer to a downtown garage, where he identified it as the car which had been stolen from him. He refused, however, to take it, on the ground that he was entitled to the insurance money under the policy from the appellant company and that the car belonged to the company, and he wrote to the company to that effect, stating that he intended to use the money from said policy to pay off the note given for the new car. The company refused to pay the policy, on the ground that the car had been recovered and that appellee could take it if he desired.

Appellee brought this suit for a recovery under the policy on February 21, 1917. The automobile was insured for an amount not exceeding

$1,375 against loss by fire, and also "against loss or damage by theft or robbery by any person or persons other than those in the employment, service, or household of the insured."

The policy provides, among other things: "In the event of loss or damage under this policy this company shall be liable only for the actual cost of repairing, or, if necessary, replacing the parts damaged or destroyed. It shall be optional with this company to repair, rebuild, or replace the property lost or damaged with other of like kind and quality within a reasonable time, on giving notice, within thirty days after the receipt of the sworn statement of loss herein required, of its intention so to do; but there can be no abandonment to this company of the property described."

It further provides: "In the event of loss or damage the insured shall forthwith give notice thereof in writing to this company or the authorized agent who issued the policy, and protect the property from further loss or damage, and within sixty days thereafter, unless such time is extended in writing by this company, shall render a statement to this company, signed and sworn to by said insured, stating the knowledge and belief of the insured as to the time and cause of the loss or damage."

The last provision of the policy, which it is particularly necessary to consider in order to reach a correct conclusion on the questions here involved, reads as follows: "The sum for which this company is liable pursuant to this policy shall be payable sixty days after the notice, ascertainment, estimate and satisfactory proof of the loss herein required have been received by this company."

Counsel for appellant state correctly, in our judgment, that the policy here in question is, in part at least, a combination of fire and marine insurance form of contract. Many decisions are cited by counsel for each side with reference to loss under maritime insurance policies, and there can be no question that, on principle, the theft of an automobile insured against theft, and subsequently recovered, presents a case somewhat analogous to the capture of an insured ship in time of war, which is subsequently recovered from the enemy and restored to the owner. A policy similar to the one here in question does not seem to have been construed heretofore by the courts of this state. The decisions from other jurisdictions on policies similarly worded may be persuasive as to the conclusion to be reached, but are certainly not decisive. The correct conclusion on the questions here raised depends largely upon the proper construction to be given to the particular policy here in question.

Counsel for appellant contend, as we understand their argument: (1) That the policy denies the right of abandonment and recovery under the policy (because of such abandonment) for the total loss of the automobile; (2) that the alleged abandonment became wrongful or invalid upon the subsequent recovery of the automobile. These two claims, it seems to us, are in a sense inconsistent, for if there is no right of abandonment then there would be no rights growing out of the alleged abandonment that could be divested by subsequent occurrences. Abandonment, in its technical sense, means the relinquishment of a right; the giving up of something to which one is entitled; the giving up of a thing absolutely, without reference to any particular person or purpose. In maritime law it means relinquishment to the underwriters of all claim. 1 C. J. 5; 1 R. C. L. 2, 3. Time is not an essential element of abandonment. The moment the intention when complete.

to abandon and the relinquishment of possession unite the abandonment is complete. 1 C. J. 8. Abandonment is not necessary when the loss is actually total, nor can the abandonment be made unless the loss is constructively total. It is never obligatory upon the insured, but operates only as a voluntary transfer of title. The St. Johns (D. C.) 101 Fed. 469. It is manifest from the provisions of the policy quoted above that it is intended there should not be any voluntary abandonment by the insured to the company, using that word in its technical sense; but it is also apparent from reading and construing the provisions of the policy together that it was intended that there could be no recovery for a total loss of the automobile, if the insurance company desired to replace the property on giving, in accordance with the terms fixed in the policy, the required notice. The policy also provides that the sum for which the company is liable shall be payable in sixty days after notice and satisfactory proof of the loss.

abandonment—when

There can be no question that the liability of the company might be affected by the return of the automobile and the giving of the required notice before the expiration of the sixty days; but we are disposed to hold that if, after the notice and satisfactory proof of loss were given, sixty days had expired before the finding and return of the automobile, the policy intended that there might be full recovery from the company for the value of the automobile, and this without reference to the question of abandonment. As we construe this policy as to loss by theft, the term "abandonment," as used in the quoted provision, was intended to mean that there could be no voluntary abandonment (using the word in the technical sense) by the owner before the expiration of the sixty days.

Counsel for appellant cite and rely on a number of English cases which seem to hold that the subsequent recovery of a captured ship prevents the owner from being entitled to the insurance as for a total loss, even if such recovery is after the insured has abandoned his interest to the underwriters. Counsel for appellee, on the other hand, argue that the English doctrine on this question has not been followed in this country, and that many of our courts have expressly stated they do not agree with the English doctrine. Counsel cite and rely, in this regard, on Norton v. Lexington F. & M. Ins. Co. 16 Ill. 235, and also Bradlie v. Maryland Ins. Co. 12 Pet. 378, 9 L. ed. 1123. All of the English and American cases cited have reference to maritime insurance—a branch of the law having well-understood customs and rules, distinct, in some respects, from those relating to other classes of property—and can only be applicable, by analogy, to the case at bar. In view of the construction that we have given to the provisions of this policy, we do not deem it necessary to refer to these decisions, except to say that we agree with counsel for appellee that the decisions in this country, and especially Norton v. Lexington F. & M. Ins. Co. supra, decided by this court, are not in accord with the reasoning of the English cases.

This suit was instituted after the lapse of sixty days from the notice and proof of loss, but after the automobile had been found. Counsel for appellant seem to concede that, if the suit had been instituted before the automobile had been found, under the reasoning of the English cases appellee could have recovered for the full amount of the machine; that is, that the date of the starting of the suit fixed the time of recovery for a total loss, if the machine had not been found before that date. Obviously, in order to make an insurance policy of this kind of value to the owner of the property, there must be some time fixed after which the return of the automobile will not release the company from liability. Automobiles are so generally used in business affairs and other activities of life that public policy requires that a person having a theft policy should not be compelled to wait indefinitely on the chance of having the stolen automobile recovered, or be compelled to incur the expense of buying a new one and thereafter taking the old one back, if recovered. Fairly construed, we think this insurance policy intended to fix the date at sixty days after the notice and satisfactory proof of loss had been received by the company,—in other words, to fix the date at which the insured would not be compelled to take the stolen car back, even if recovered, at the date when the insurance money was agreed to be paid.

Counsel for appellant further argue that there was no proper proof made by appellee of the loss of the automobile. Appellee gave notice in writing on the day following the theft, which, it is shown, was received by the agent of the company the day after it was mailed. On the same day that the written notice was received, appellee called on the agent of the company and offered to make an affidavit or sworn statement, but was told by the agent that the letter had been received and was sufficient, and that no further notice or proof need be given. While some of the letters were addressed to the appellant company, and others were addressed to a guaranty company, which apparently had close connection with appellant, there can be no question, from a consideration of the whole transaction, that the appellant company, through its proper agent, recognized the sufficiency of the notice given and waived the furnishing of sworn proof. Appellee had a right to rely upon the agent's assurance that his proof was sufficient. It was held by this court in Atlantic Ins. Co. v. Wright, 22 Ill. 462, that when a representative of an insurance company had no fault to find with the proofs, but was satisfied with them, if there existed any informality in the preliminary proofs of the loss such informality was expressly waived by the company. The reasoning, also, of this court in Lumberman's Ins. Co. v. McDowell, 50 Ill. 120, 99 Am. Dec. 497, would lead to the same conclusion. On this record the appellant cannot raise any question that the notice and proof of loss did not comply with the provisions of the policy.

proof of loss—

Counsel for appellant further argue that the court erred in permitting a judgment to be entered against appellant when the proof showed that the policy had been assigned to the Louis Geyler Company by appellee as collateral security for the note given for the new automobile. The point now made on this question is that the wrong party is bringing the suit. No such objection was made in the trial court. It is insisted by counsel for the appellee that the policy had been re-assigned by the Louis Geyler Company, before the trial, to the original beneficiary, appellee herein. We agree with counsel for appellant that there is nothing in the record to indicate such reassignment back to appellee. The special point, however, as to the wrong party suing, not having been raised in the trial court, it is too late to raise it for the first time in a court of review.

Counsel for appellant also argue that the trial court erred in its rulings on the admission of evidence. Over the objection of appellant the trial court admitted evidence on behalf of appellee to the effect that he had purchased a new automobile shortly after the theft. They argue that such proof was calculated to mislead the jury into seeking to relieve plaintiff of an undesirable vehicle and require the appellant company to replace it with a new one. We do not see any ground upon which the evidence was properly admissible, but under a proper construction of the policy, as held above, the verdict as directed by the trial court was justified, and we cannot see how the improper admission of this evidence in any way affected the result.

It is also argued by counsel that the court improperly admitted a letter sent from the local office in Chicago to the home office in Maryland, in which the Chicago agent stated that the claim of the loss had been reported to the office immediately and had been referred to the adjuster, and that the agent considered that proper proof of loss had been made by appellee and that the writer thought that the loss should be paid; that it would be good business policy for the company to pay the loss rather than contest the claim. The evidence tends to show that the local agent of appellant was a personal friend of appellee, and seemed to desire that appellee should recover under the policy, but the main office of the company did not agree with the view of its local agent. Conceding this letter was inadmissible, we do not see, construing the policy as it has been construed, and a directed verdict being justified, that appellant was in any way injured by the introduction of this evidence.

Counsel also object to the examination of the local agent during the trial under the provisions of § 33 of the Municipal Court Act. Hurd's Stat. 1917, p. 906. No material error was committed by the trial court as to this examination.

We find no reversible error in the record, and the judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Recovery of car as affecting insurance covering theft of automobile.

An interesting and important point was involved in the reported case, (O'CONNOR v. MARYLAND MOTOR CAR INS. Co. ante, 787), as to whether the insured could abandon the stolen car to the insurer and recover its insured value under the policy. It will be observed that in that case the policy, which insured against loss or damage by theft, provided that it should be optional with the insurer to repair, rebuild, or replace the property lost or damaged within a reasonable time, on giving notice within thirty days of proof of loss of its intention to do so, but that there could be no "abandonment" to the company of the property; and also provided that in the event of loss the insured should give notice to the company, and within sixty days thereafter, unless the time was extended, should render a sworn statement of his knowledge and belief as to the time and cause of loss or damage; and further provided that the sum for which the company was liable should be payable sixty days after the notice, ascertainment, estimate, and satisfactory proof of the loss required had been received. In construing the policy the court held that the term "abandonment," as used therein, meant that there could be no voluntary abandonment before the expiration of sixty days after notice and proof of loss by theft, but that the expiration of that time fixed the date after which the insured would not be required to take the stolen car back, even if it was recovered, but might then recover the amount of the insurance.

Under policies of this kind, in common with other policies, a definite time for the payment of loss is fixed. When this time has elapsed before the recovery of the car, it would seem that the insurer is clearly bound to pay its insured value, and cannot, although the machine may be subsequently recovered, compel the insured to receive it back, unless, of course, an express provision for such return is contained in the policy. No other case has been disclosed dealing with the construction of express provisions relating to an abandonment to the insurer.

In Kansas City Regal Auto Co. v. Old Colony Ins. Co. (1917) 196 Mo. App. 255, 195 S. W. 579, a policy of automobile theft insurance was held to be one of indemnity, under which the insurer was required to make the insured whole in case of loss, rather than to pay the face of the policy; and it was held that the insurer having recovered the car, the insured would have been bound to receive it back, upon proper tender of the car and payment by the insurer of all damages caused by reason of the theft. It does not appear from the report of the case whether or not the car was recovered before the expiration of the period allowed by the policy for the payment of the loss. The insurer was held bound to return the machine to the insured at Kansas City, where it was stolen, and its obligation was held not discharged by notifying the insured that the automobile was at a certain place in another state, and offering to turn it over to him there, and in addition to pay all damages by reason of the theft. The court stated that the insured in Kansas City had no way of knowing what damage had been done to the car stored in the other state; that he should not be required to settle the damages without knowing what liens had been created against it since the theft, and without any exact knowledge of what would be the cost of returning it to his place of residence, to say nothing of the value of the time it would be necessary for him to devote to the matter in having the car returned. The evidence in this case was held not to show a waiver by the insured of the right to have the machine returned to Kansas City, although there was testimony that, when the insurer's attorney at Kansas City offered to return the car, the attorney said that he did not want the car, but wanted the money; but the testimony did not show that he refused to accept the car in case the insurer refused to pay the money.

In Callahan v. London & L. F. Ins. Co. (1917) 98 Misc. 589, 163 N. Y. Supp. 322, affirmed in (1917) 179 App. Div. 890, 165 N. Y. Supp. 1079, it was held that a policy insuring against damage by theft, robbery, or pilferage covered all damage resulting, or which in the contemplation of the parties might result, from theft, including damage caused by reckless driving, or any use which destroyed its value in whole or in part, and the court said: "If, following the theft, the car should be recovered intact, in the same condition it was before the theft, plaintiff's only damage would be expenses incurred in recovering the car, and perhaps, in addition, the value of its use during the period between the theft and the recovery of the car. If the car were damaged or destroyed while in the custody of the thief, plaintiff's damage would include also the diminution or loss of value of the car thus stolen."

And in Federal Ins. Co. v. Hiter (1915) 164 Ky. 743, L.R.A.1915E, 575, 176 S. W. 210, where the car, which was practically new when stolen, was in a badly damaged condition when recovered by the insured, it was held that the diminution in its value resulting from the theft was within the operation of a policy insuring against any loss or damage, if amounting to $25 or more on any single occasion, by theft, robbery, or pilferage, although the policy also provided that in the event of loss or damage the insurer should be liable only for the actual cost of repairing, or, if necessary, replacing the parts damaged or destroyed. ## CHARLES L. MORGAN

v.

GERMANIA FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY et al., Appts.

Insurance — gasoline in automobile.

1. The policies provided that they should be void if the insured "kept, used or allowed on the premises gasoline . . . or petroleum or any of its products of greater inflammability than kerosene oil." Held, that the plaintiff's keeping in the building for two or three months his Ford car with its gasoline tank from one-third full to full of gasoline (although not in the building the night of the fire) violated this provision and avoided the policies.

Appeal — effect of general verdict.

2. The general verdict in favor of the plaintiff is held to be in effect a sufficient finding that the fire occurred without the plaintiff's fault.

Insurance — submission to examination.

3. The provision that when required the plaintiff should submit to an examination under oath was not made a condition precedent to recovery, and his refusal to comply when called upon did not, under the circumstances shown, constitute a valid defense.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Sumner County in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying a motion for new trial in actions brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on two fire insurance policies. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Edward T. Hackney and C. C. Crow, for appellants:

The storing of gasoline in the barn in the Ford car for the length of time testified to by plaintiff was a substantial violation of the contract prohibiting gasoline being kept upon the premises insured.

State ex rel. American F. Ins. Co. v. Ellison, 269 Mo. 410, 190 S. W. 879; Shader v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 66 N. Y. 441, 23 Am. Rep. 65.

Messrs. W. M. Ready and W. W. Schwinn, for appellee:

The temporary incidental presence of some prohibited article on insured premises does not avoid a policy.

Harper v. Albany Mut. Ins. Co. 17 N. Y. 194; Harper v. New York City Ins. Co. 22 N. Y. 441; Hall v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 58 N. Y. 292, 17 Am. Rep. 255; Buchanan v. Exchange F. Ins. Co. 61 N. Y. 26; Thompson v. Equity F. Ins. Co. 17 Ont. L. Rep. 214, 13 Ann. Cas. 540; 14 R. C. L. §§ 288-290.

West, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants issued to the plaintiff two insurance policies on a frame feed barn. They each contained a clause that the insured, as often as required, should exhibit to any person designated by the company all that remained of any property therein described, and submit to an examination under oath by any person named by the company and subscribe the same. They also provided that they should be void if the insured then had, or there should be kept or allowed, upon the premises gasoline or petroleum or any other products of greater inflammability than kerosene oil. Each policy provided that it should be payable in sixty days after receiving proof of loss. The barn was burned June 2, 1917. On July 23d proofs of loss were served, and on September 27th the action was brought. November 5th the defendants moved to require the petition to be made more definite and certain by setting out the proof of loss. This was overruled.

January 24th answers consisting of general denials were filed, and in February following amended answers were filed consisting of a general denial and the allegation that on the 4th of that month notice had been served on the plaintiff to appear for examination, which he refused to do, thereby avoiding the policies. On the 28th of February the plaintiff notified the defendants' attorney that he would, on the 7th of March, appear for examination. No examination was made. On March 12th this fact was set up by supplemental reply. It was shown on the trial that proofs of loss were made and delivered to the defendants more than sixty days before the action was brought, and that no objection had been raised thereto and no objection made to the payment of the policies until the suit had been brought. The plaintiff recovered, and the defendants appeal and assign as error the refusal of the court to find for them at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence and the refusal to grant a new trial.

They argue that the plaintiff failed to prove his allegation that the building was destroyed without his fault, and that the policies were made void by his having kept his Ford car in the barn with some gasoline in it, and also that the failure to submit to the examination when called upon was fatal to his case.

Assuming, without deciding, that the burden was on the plaintiff to prove his allegation that the building was burned without his fault, it suffices to say that the general verdict in his favor must be construed as likewise settling this question.

Appeal—effect
verdict.

The provision that the insured should submit to an examination, when required, was not made a condition precedent to recovery, and hence his refusal did not, under the circumstances shown, avoid the policies. Counsel cite four cases to sustain their contention that this provision, together with the refusal, avoided the policies. Pearlstine v. Westchester F. Ins. Co. 70 S. C. 75, 49 S. E. 4; Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. v. Sims, 115 Ga. 939, 42 S. E. 269; Sims v. Union Assur. Soc. (C. C.) 129 Fed. 804; Harris v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 35 Conn. 310.

Insurance—
submission to examination.

In the Pearlstine Case a nonsuit was asked because a similar provision with others had been violated, and it was held properly refused because waiver might have been shown. As to the examination clause it was merely held that the insured could not avail himself of the excuse for noncompliance that he had fled to avoid arrest for homicide. In the Firemen's Fund Case the policy provided that no suit could be maintained until after a compliance with this provision. The same thing was true of the Sims Case and the Harris Case. In cases involving the iron-safe clause we have held that its violation avoided the policy when so stated therein. Crandon v. Home Ins. Co. 99 Kan. 785, 163 Pac. 458.

The plaintiff testified that he had kept his Ford car in the barn most of the time for two or three months, and that it held 10 gallons of gasoline, and was from one-third full to full while in the barn. While he testified that it was not in the barn the night of the fire, the defendants contend that the provision was so violated as to preclude recovery. Oakland Home Ins. Co. v. Shawnee County, 54 Kan. 732, 45 Am. St. Rep. 306, 39 Pac. 697, is cited. There, however, the policy forbade the keeping or use of gasoline upon the insured premises, and it was expressly agreed that the violation of this condition should avoid the policy. It was said in the opinion that gasoline stoves and lamps were used without hindrance or restraint, and that the facts showed clearly that the fire which destroyed the property was occasioned by such use, a situation quite unlike that now presented for consideration.

In Republic County Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 69 Kan. 146, 105 Am. St. Rep. 157, 76 Pac. 419, 2 Ann. Cas. 20, the vacancy clause in the policy was to the effect that the latter became void if the premises became vacant for thirty days. More than thirty days after the house became vacant the other building was destroyed by a wind-storm. It was decided that this building was also vacant, and the vacancy avoided the policy. In German Ins. Co. v. Russell, 65 Kan. 373, 58 L.R.A. 234, 69 Pac. 345, the policy provided that it should be void if the buildings became vacant without consent. They became vacant, and so remained for twelve days, but were reoccupied before any loss was sustained. It was held that the vacancy forfeited the insurance, and that the reoccupancy did not revive it. It was held in London & L. F. Ins. Co. v. Fischer, 34 C. C. A. 503, 92 Fed. 500, that a clause similar to the one before us was not violated by merely permitting gasoline to be carried through the building. In Norwaysz v. Thuringia Ins. Co. 204 Ill. 334, 68 N. E. 551, it was held that a violation of such a clause avoided the policy, and that it was not incumbent on the insurer to show that such violation contributed to the loss. The opinion in Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Coös County, 151 U. S. 452, 465, 38 L. ed. 231, 236, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 382, contains this language. "The condition which was violated did not, in any way, depend upon the fact that it increased the risk, but by the express terms of the contract was made to avoid the policy if the condition was not observed."

The policy considered in Harper v. Albany Mut. Ins. Co. 17 N. Y. 194, provided that if the building should be used for purposes extra-hazardous, the policy should be of no force so long as such use continued.

Camphene, spirit gas, or burning fluid were forbidden to be used unless by permission indorsed on the policy. The plaintiffs conducted a bookbinding business, and used camphene for cleaning rollers, woodcuts, and electrotype plates, as was usual among printers, and necessary and indispensable. The policy gave the privilege of carrying on the printing business, and the insurer was held liable. The fire was caused by the act of a plumber throwing a lighted match into a pan containing a small quantity of camphene. The same ruling was made in Harper v. New York City Ins. Co. 22 N. Y. 441; three of the judges vigorously dissenting. These decisions were followed in Hall v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 58 N. Y. 292, 17 Am. Rep. 255. The storage and use of enough kerosene to light a paper mill was held not to violate a clause prohibiting the storage or use of petroleum, rock, and earth oil in Buchanan v. Exchange F. Ins. Co. 61 N. Y. 26. In Shader v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 66 N. Y. 441, 23 Am. Rep. 65, it was held that the death of the insured occurred while he was drunk, and that this avoided the policy; although he was killed by a pistol shot; the policy providing that no claim should be made if the death happened while or as a result of intoxication. The Missouri court of appeals in La Force v. Williams City F. Ins. Co. 43 Mo. App. 518 (syl. 3), held that a provision that the policy should become void if gasoline was kept, used, or stored on the premises was not breached by the "occasional introduction of small quantities of gasoline into the house, for the purpose of destroying vermin and cleaning clothes." The rule was announced to be that to forfeit a policy requires the use of the prohibited article for the ordinary purposes to which it is usually put, and that an occasional use for a temporary and extraordinary purpose connected with the occupation of the premises is not fatal.

The supreme court of Missouri held in State ex rel. American F. Ins. Co. v. Ellison, 269 Mo. 410, 190 S. W. 879, that a clause against encumbering the insured property was no less binding because its violation did not increase the hazard, the doctrine being plainly and forcibly declared that the courts cannot make contracts for parties qualified to make their own.

Courts and text-writers differ as to what constitutes a breach of such a provision as we are considering. But we believe and hold that the amount of gasoline kept in the car in the barn for two or three months was <sup>—gasoline in automobile.</sup> a breach thereof, and not a permissible and negligible deviation therefrom.

The parties, fully competent, fairly contracted that "this entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if the insured now has, or . . . if (any usage or custom of the trade or manufacture to the contrary notwithstanding) there be kept, used, or allowed upon the described premises . . . gasoline . . . or petroleum or any of its products of greater inflammability than kerosene oil."

Thus the contract was not to insure a feed barn in which a car with a tank of gasoline should be kept or stored, but one free from such inflammable stuff. The plaintiff should have kept his contract or had indorsed thereon consent to keep his car in the building.

The judgment is reversed, and cause is remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the defendant.

All the Justices concur.

Petition for rehearing denied.

ANNOTATION.

Gasolene in automobile as violation of provision in fire insurance policy on building.

It will be observed that in the reported case (MORGAN v. GERMANIA F. INS. Co. ante, 794) the conclusion was reached that the fact that the insured had kept his automobile, the tank of which contained from 3 to 10 gallons of gasolene, for two or three months in the insured barn, although it was not there on the night of the fire, violated a provision of the policy that the entire policy, unless otherwise indorsed on it, should be void if gasolene was kept, used, or allowed upon the premises, the reasoning of the court being that the parties had fairly contracted, and that the contract was not to insure a feed barn in which a tank of gasolene was kept or stored, but one free from such inflammable fluid, and that the insured should have kept his contract, or have obtained a permit from the insured.

There is, as yet, little direct authority upon the question under consideration.

In O'Neill v. Caledonian Ins. Co. (1913) 166 Cal. 310, 135 Pac. 1121, the policies involved, covering personal property and a building, provided that, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed thereon, the insurer should not be liable for loss occurring while gasolene exceeding 1 quart was kept, used, or allowed on the premises, and a rider was attached, the printed part of which contained a warranty by the insured that no gasolene "other than contained in the reservoirs of machines shall be admitted into the building where the machine is permanently or temporarily stabled," which was preceded by a written description of the premises, including the statement that they were occupied in part as an "auto repair shop." It was held that it must be presumed that the company undertook to insure against all ordinary risks attending an automobile repair shop, and that the policy was not avoided by reason of the repair man bringing an automobile with a leaking gasolene tank, which contained 20 gallons, into the repair shop, emptying the tank into four 5-gallon cans; and, after having repaired the tank, pouring the gasolene back into the tank, during the course of which the fluid ignited and started a fire. The court said that the "rider" prevailed over the "suspension" clause and the written part of the rider over the printed part, and the insurer must be presumed to have intended that the usual and necessary operations of an auto repair shop should be allowed.

It was further held in this case that the claim that the policy was avoided under the "suspension" clause, because at the time of the fire there were five other automobiles in the building, each of which contained more than 1 quart of gasolene in its reservoir, could not be sustained. The court said: "We think that this claim cannot be maintained, in view of the provisions of the warranty clause inserted in the rider. It forbids the admission into the building of any gasolene other than that contained in the tanks of machines 'permanently or temporarily stabled' therein. It is no part of the business of an automobile repair shop to permanently stable automobiles in the building in which it is carried on, or to stable any automobile temporarily therein, except such as are brought there to be repaired. As the warranty was drawn by the company, it is to be construed most favorably for the assured. Civ. Code, § 1654. Provisions in an insurance policy are always construed so as to prevent a forfeiture, if the language will reasonably permit such a construction. Arnold v. American Ins. Co. (1906) 148 Cal. 666, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 6, 84 Pac. 182. Therefore, as the language of the warranty plainly implies that automobiles with gasolene in their tanks were to be stabled in the building, although not brought in for repair, it must be construed to permit such storage.

The word 'machines' is in the plural, and the number of machines allowed to be kept therein is, therefore, not limited. The presence of these automobiles in the building did not suspend the policy."

The decision in this case was followed in O'Neill v. Union Assur. Soc. (1913) 166 Cal. 318, 135 Pac. 1124, involving the same loss, and policies in the same form. It was further held in these cases that the insurer could not have been prejudiced by an instruction that the plaintiff's right to recover was not affected by the presence at the time of any gasoline which came into the premises in the reservoirs of automobiles. In criticism of this instruction it was suggested that it would allow the jury to find for the plaintiff although thousands of gallons of gasoline might have been brought into the building in the reservoirs of machines and thereafter emptied into gasoline tanks and kept stored in the building. The court, however, said that the criticism was not based on any facts in the case, and that it was obvious that the instruction referred to the gasoline brought into the building in the reservoir of the car left for repairs, and which was drained from the reservoir of that car while it was being repaired.

In Bone v. Detroit Nat. F. Ins. Co. (1918) 261 Pa. 554, 104 Atl. 742, where the policy which insured a hotel building had a rider attached, marked "dwelling and barn form," which provided that "not more than one automobile shall be stored or kept on the premises," it was held not avoided by reason of the fact that two automobiles were kept in a barn 400 feet from the insured hotel, the view being taken that, as the only risk assumed was the hotel, the word "premises" referred merely to that building.

While not within the scope of this note, attention may be called to Home Ins. Co. v. Bridges (1916) 172 Ky. 161, L.R.A.1917C, 276, 189 S. W. 6, where it was held that the temporary possession on premises of a few quarts of gasoline to clean an automobile and vulcanize tires was not a violation of a clause of a policy insuring a building occupied as a residence and grocery, making it void if gasoline was kept, used, or allowed on the premises, such clause not extending to a temporary or occasional use. ### Divorce — cruel and inhuman treatment — compelling abandonment of children.

1. Compelling a woman to get rid of her infant children by a former marriage as a condition to living in her second husband's home, when he knew of their existence at the time of marriage and agreed that she might bring them with her, is cruel and inhuman treatment, amounting to abandonment of her.

CROSS APPEALS from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pike County in favor of plaintiff in a suit for divorce, alimony, and custody of a child; defendant appealing from the judgment in plaintiff's favor; and plaintiff appealing from the amount allowed her for alimony. Affirmed on both appeals.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. J. C. Cantrell for defendant.

Messrs. Cline & Steele for plaintiff.

Clarke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment granting to his wife a divorce, the custody of their infant child, and "the sum of $1,500 alimony, $1,000 for herself, and $500 for the use of their infant child."

The petition did not state a cause of action for a divorce (nor was one asked), because it failed to state, as required by § 423 of the Civil Code of Practice and § 2120 of the Statutes, that the cause of action occurred or existed in this state within five years next before the commencement of the action; but complaint is not made of the judgment for divorce, of which we have no revisory jurisdiction. It is, however, insisted that, because the petition does not state a cause for divorce, the court erred in awarding alimony, it being the contention of counsel for appellant that alimony cannot be granted, except in a suit and as a part of a judgment for divorce, and we are referred to a statement to that effect in Freeman v. Freeman, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 822, 13 S. W. 246; but such is no longer, if ever, the rule in this state, as a suit for alimony may be maintained independent of and without regard to a divorce, where

divorce—
stating cause of action.

Appeal—jurisdiction—

the husband treats the wife with cruelty and compels her to leave him (Hulett v. Hulett, 80 Ky. 364), and although the abandonment may not have continued long enough to entitle her to a divorce (Steele v. Steele, 96 Ky. 382, 29 S. W. 17; Belcher v. Belcher, 145 Ky. 309, 140 S. W. 309).

Since an independent suit may be maintained for alimony in the absence of grounds for divorce, it is manifest that the Code and statutory provisions referred to above have no application to an action for alimony, and in such an action it is not necessary to give the court jurisdiction, or for any purpose, that there should be an allegation

action for alimony—necessary allegations.

that a cause for divorce had occurred or existed within this state and within five years next before the action was commenced; and it is necessary only to allege the marriage and facts showing an abandonment by the husband, without fault upon the part of the wife, to state a cause for alimony.

It is purely an action in personam for the recovery of money, and therefore transitory, except as localized by § 76 of the Code of Practice "to subserve the convenience and possibly the interest of the wife," but over which any court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter may acquire jurisdiction of the defendant, when he is summoned to answer, or voluntarily appears, and makes defense. Johnson v. Johnson, 12 Bush, 485; Tudor v. Tudor, 101 Ky. 530, 41 S. W. 768; Gillen v. Illinois C. R. Co. 137 Ky. 375, 125 S. W. 1047. Hence there is no merit in the contention that, because of the failure to make the allegations required in an action for divorce, the court was without jurisdiction of the subject-matter or the parties, and without power to award such alimony as the proof warranted.

2. The proof shows that the parties were married in West Virginia in 1912, and that in 1913 the plaintiff left the home of the defendant in West Virginia and returned to her former home in Pike county, Kentucky, where she has since continuously resided; that she has no property of any kind, except one cow, and the defendant has property of the value of $8,000 at least; that their marriage was the second for each, and purely a marriage of convenience, devoid of any sentiment whatever. At the time, plaintiff was a widow with two infant children of tender years, whom the defendant agreed should have a home with their mother in his home, and that he would provide for them.

To sustain her charge that she was compelled to and did leave the defendant because of his cruel and inhuman treatment of her (which is an abandonment by him; Davis v. Davis, 86 Ky. 32, 4 S. W. 822), she testified that shortly after their marriage he began to manifest an aversion toward her children and treated them unkindly; that just before she left him he informed her that he would not continue to live with her unless she got rid of her children, which evidence appellant insists should have been excluded; but even if it were excluded, practically the same facts are proved by two witnesses for the plaintiff, Anse Blackburn and Acy Hensley, who testified that the defendant told them, about the time plaintiff left him, that he had a home for her but none for her children. Mrs. Harriet Blackburn stated that she never saw him mistreat his wife or his children, but that he pouted around and would not speak to her. The defendant does not contradict any of this testimony, nor testify at all on his own behalf, and this is about all the testimony in the case, except as to the value of defendant's property, and the evidence of neighbors that they never saw the defendant mistreat the plaintiff, and that, so far as they knew or wife—abandonment—what is.

could see, he provided for her and her children a good home.

It would be hard to conceive of treatment that would be more cruel and inhuman by a husband toward a wife than the offer to live with her and give her a home only upon condition that she would get rid of her infant children by a former marriage, whom he knew were entirely dependent upon her when he married her, and agreed she might bring with her to his home; and that the defendant did this, and forced the plaintiff to leave his home, he does not even deny. The testimony therefore amply justified the chancellor in requiring the defendant to pay to plaintiff a reasonable alimony for herself, and to provide a reasonable sum for the support of their infant child. The evidence shows that the defendant has a large farm and considerable personal property, worth at least $8,000, and probably more, and the alimony awarded was not only not excessive in amount, but under ordinary circumstances would have been entirely too little.

But the facts in this case are peculiar, and, as the alimony to be allowed must always depend upon the circumstances of any particular case (Burns v. Burns, 173 Ky. 105, 190 S. W. 683), we have concluded that the amount allowed by the chancellor here should not be disturbed upon the ground of its insufficiency, as we are urged to do by appellee on the cross appeal. The peculiar circumstances to which we refer, and which we regard as sufficient to sustain the judgment, are that this marriage was one purely of convenience, arranged by a go-between, without profession of love upon either side. The defendant has six or seven children by his first marriage, and plaintiff lived with him as his wife for only a few months, and, under these circumstances, we do not feel justified in disturbing the chancellor's finding.

Quite an argument in justification of the defendant's action, assuming he did refuse a home to his wife's children by her former marriage, is based upon the proposition that the defendant was under no legal obligation to support his stepchildren, and quite a number of authorities from other jurisdictions are cited in support of the legal proposition; but we do not deem it necessary, for the purposes of this case, to consider the question, because it is not involved here. Assuming that he was not liable for their support, we are nevertheless convinced their mother was justified in leaving her husband upon the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment, when he made it a condition to a continuation of their marital relations that she must put her children out of his home.

Another ground for reversal relied upon is the fact that this court, in Stepp v. Stepp, 178 Ky. 337, 198 S. W. 935, and many other cases, has stated that, although a judgment for divorce improperly granted to the wife cannot be disturbed, the evidence will be examined to see whether the judgment was authorized under the proof, and, if not, a judgment for alimony will be reversed. But this statement was made where the grounds for alimony and divorce were the same, and upon a trial of both questions upon their merits, and without reference to the requirements of the Code that a petition for divorce shall state that the cause had occurred or existed within the state and within five years before the commencement of the action, which, as we have seen, is not required to be stated in an action for alimony; hence such cases are without applicability here, where facts were pleaded and proved which authorized a judgment for alimony, although they were insufficient to constitute a cause for divorce.

Wherefore the judgment is affirmed upon both the original appeal and the cross appeal.

ANNOTATION.

Forcing spouse to get rid of child by former marriage as cruelty constituting ground for divorce.

Probably the nearest case to WILLIAMSON v. WILLIAMSON (reported herewith) ante, 799, is Friend v. Friend (1884) 53 Mich. 543, 51 Am. Rep. 161, 19 N. W. 176, where it was held that making the separation of the wife from her young daughter a condition of the wife's presence in the house is cruelty justifying a divorce. In that case the husband, having insisted that his wife "should put her daughter somewhere else, and actually sent her from the house, not only locked the doors on complainant and her child, but kept them out till a late hour in the night, and at last compelled them to sleep in an unusual room without letting them have their night apparel, and before admitting them at all used insulting and brutal language towards his wife. The next morning, when they were in the house, and complainant was engaged in household duties, he put both of them forcibly out of doors, and subsequently threatened the daughter if she should ever darken his doors again, and ordered his wife to come back into the house. She, upon this, left and never returned. He afterwards offered to take back his wife, but only on condition of separating from her daughter." The court said: "It is difficult to imagine any worse cruelty to a mother than such conduct, if not explained or excused. The only explanation that is given is that by law a husband is not bound to support step-children. Such a rule, if applicable, is no excuse for personal violence and indecent abuse, and it could not palliate any cruelty which was resorted to from vindictiveness. But we do not think it has any place in this controversy. And we are not required on this record to consider what the law is on that general subject."

Usually the matter is complicated by other acts of harshness. In Cooper v. Cooper (1889) 78 Mich. 316, 44 N. W. 381, a divorce was granted the wife for extreme cruelty, where the acts of cruelty charged were "neglect to support; excluding complainant's children by a former husband from complainant's house and home without cause; using vulgar language to complainant, imputing to her a want of chastity; keeping away from their home complainant's daughters; destroying the affection of their adopted daughter for complainant; threatening to leave complainant; and that he was grossly mean, insulting, and tyrannical to her, compelling her to consult him as to whom she could entertain as her company, and circulating slanderous and defamatory stories about complainant's daughters."

In Whitacre v. Whitacre (1887) 64 Mich. 232, 31 N. W. 327, a wife was held entitled to a divorce for cruel treatment and refusal to support where the testimony showed that, "during the year the parties lived together, the defendant, being of sufficient ability, neglected to furnish his wife with any means of support, except $2.50; and that for ten months of the year he was in the habit of cursing and swearing at her, and using vile and indecent names, in the presence of her children, to one of whom he gave a flogging, and frequently threatened to drive her children away from home; and finally told the complainant he would live with her no longer, and drove her from the house."

In Rigsby v. Rigsby (1907) 82 Ark. 278, 101 S. W. 727, it was held that as the departure of the wife was caused by the husband's unreasonable conduct, and as he had never expressed any regret or invited or tried in any way to induce her to return, the courts, after the expiration of a reasonable time, were justified in treating his conduct as in law an abandonment of her. The husband had refused to allow her sixteen-year-old daughter to live with her mother. He forbade her son, a boy of eighteen years of age, to visit his mother, and when this boy came at the request of his brother to see his mother on a business matter he peremptorily ordered him to leave the place, and seriously injured him. "In leaving with him," said the court, "she did no more than should have been expected of any mother under the circumstances. Her departure was the natural result of plaintiff's treatment of her son."

It was held in Dawson v. Dawson (1910) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 132 S. W. 379, that the living of the husband with his wife might be found to be insupportable, so as to entitle him to a divorce, where, after the husband's daughter had been deserted by her husband and left with two children without means of support, the wife, without provocation, hated and abused his daughter in her affliction so that he was unable to give his daughter shelter at his home, and where his wife also "defamed the memory of his dead wife, and wantonly assailed her character, and indulged in other conduct involving constant abuse and the use of opprobrious epithets, assault, avowed hate, the exclusion of him from his dwelling, and the cessation of the performance toward him of the duties of a wife." The charges here were of excesses, cruel treatment, or outrages by her towards him.

But in Everton v. Everton (1857) 50 N. C. (5 Jones, L.) 202, the court held that a wife did not allege that her husband did, "by cruel and barbarous treatment, endanger her life, or offer such indignities to her person as to render her condition intolerable, or her life burdensome," where she averred that he treated his stepchildren with cruelty, "that he whipped one of her said children very severely without any reasonable excuse or provocation, and threatened to kill or stamp to death another one of" them; that, although the children were paying their board, "the defendant became so unreasonably intensed against one of her said children that she was compelled to send him, her said child, to live with a relative at a distance from the defendant; that he often threatened to send away from his house the other children, one of whom was a child of very tender years, entirely too young to be in the keeping of any other person than a mother or some kind female relative."

It may be noted that, in an action for necessities furnished the wife while absent from her husband, it was held that the plaintiff was properly permitted, "for the purpose of showing that she was justified in leaving his house on account of his gross misconduct towards her . . . to give evidence of the manner in which, in her presence, the defendant ordered his wife's son out of the house, and of the harsh language then used towards him. As one of a series of acts of vexation and annoyance, perpetually occurring, by which her residence with him was made at first uncomfortable, and at last insupportable, the conduct of the defendant on this occasion was a fit matter to be laid before the jury, as having some tendency to establish the fact of gross ill treatment, which the plaintiff was attempting, and had a right, to prove in the case. Of itself, it may be thought to be of very little importance; but the jury would judge of the weight to be attached to it; while the court had only to determine whether it was proper to be considered at all." Mayhew v. Thayer (1857) 8 Gray (Mass.) 172.

Touching the effect on this subject of the rule so easily asserted in the authorities, that the husband is not bound to support his wife's children of a former marriage, it should be said that this rule (see Rex v. Benoier (1727) 2 Ld. Raym. 1454, 92 Eng. Reprint, 446; Tubb v. Harrison (1790) 4 T. R. 118, 100 Eng. Reprint, 926) seems to have been founded on Rex v. Munden (1719) 1 Strange, 190, 93 Eng. Reprint, 465, where it was held that a son-in-law was not bound to support his wife's mother, as it required a statute to make him liable for the support of his own parents, the court stating that "by the law of nature a man was bound to take care of his own father and mother; but there being no temporal obligation to enforce that law of nature, it was found necessary to establish it by act of Parliament, and that can be extended no farther than the law of nature went before, and the law of nature does not reach to this case." It would seem that if a man marries a poor widow having children without property, and too small to support themselves, it ought to be the American common law, if it is not, that he in marrying their mother incurs the obligation of supporting them as well as her. It is gratifying that there is in the books so little involving circumstances of this character. B. B. B.

APPEAL by respondent from a decree of the Superior Court for Providence and Bristol Counties in favor of petitioner in a suit to enforce a mechanic's lien. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Thomas F. Farrell for appellant.

Mr. Hugo A. Clason for appellee.

Baker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the respondent from a decree establishing a lien entered by the superior court on a petition in equity to enforce a mechanic's lien in accordance with the provisions of chapter 257 of the General Laws. The evidence shows a written agreement by and between the parties, in which the complainant agreed "to build a bungalow" for the respondent, and "to furnish all labor and materials" therefor, and the respondent agreed to pay the complainant "the sum of $3,315 in payments as follows: Fifteen hundred dollars when ready for lathing, and $500 when plastered; balance of contract when the house is completed." The account filed by the complainant gives credit for two payments on account and for certain materials furnished by the respondent, and claims a balance due of $1,124.28, with interest. While there is nothing in the papers of the case to show it, the transcript indicates a claim of damages by the respondent by way of recoupment for unsatisfactory workmanship and materials.

Upon hearing the parties the court allowed the respondent's claim to the amount of $307.50, and found that there was a balance due the petitioner on his account of $816.78, on which interest from the date of giving notice of the claim was allowed to the amount of $69.12, making a total of $885.90 for which the lien was established. The notice of a claim of lien and the demand of payment were given and made August 29, 1916, and legal proceedings were commenced the following day. The decree was entered March 13, 1918. The only reason of appeal now urged is that the allowance of the item of interest is against the law, in that the petitioner's claim was unliquidated. If the allowance of interest is held to be proper, the amount allowed is not questioned.

Broadly speaking, it is generally held that interest on unliquidated demands will not be allowed as damages. Undoubtedly there is a clear

interest—unliquidated

distinction between a claim for damages entirely unliquidated, as, for example, claims for damages arising from assault and battery, from seduction, or from slander and libel, which are wholly at large, and a liquidated claim, where there is an express contract to pay a sum certain at a fixed time. In the former cases, the amount of damages is unknown until determined, after the presentation of evidence, by a decision, award, or verdict. In the contract case, both parties know what the claim is, and when it is due and payable. It is in dealing with cases lying between these extremes, where the distinction is less clear and obvious, that courts have so differed in their interpretation and application of the rule as to interest that their decisions are far from harmonious as to when interest may be allowed. The question as applied to the precise state of facts presented in the case at bar does not appear to have been considered in any reported case of this court. The respondent cites in his brief three Rhode Island cases in support of his claim, namely, Spencer v. Pierce, 5 R. I. 63, Durfee v. O'Brien, 16 R. I. 213, 14 Atl. 857, and Dary v. Providence Police Asso. 27 R. I. 377, 62 Atl. 513.

In Spencer v. Pierce, supra, the question arose on the disallowance of interest by the master in the case on certain sums allowed by him to be due "for labor and service." The court said, on page 71: "The well-settled American rule . . . gives interest, though not stipulated for, as an invariable legal incident of the principal debt, from the day of default, whenever the debtor knows precisely what he is to pay, and when he is to pay it"—citing People v. New York County, 5 Cow. 331, 334, and recommitted the master's report, saying, on page 72: "We therefore instruct the master to allow interest at 6 per cent per annum, from the day of default in payment, on all sums allowed by him for labor or service, the amount of which is certain, or can be made certain by computation, under the contract of the parties, and in which the time of payment is fixed by the terms of the contract or by the course of dealing between the parties."

In Durfee v. O'Brien, supra, it is said (16 R. I. on page 217): "The time when the payments are due and the agreement to pay interest being definite, the charge for interest was properly allowed."

This is clearly a liquidated claim under the rule.

Dary v. Providence Police Asso. supra, was an action of assumpsit to recover moneys claimed to be due as sick benefits. There was a plea of the demand—allowance of rebate—

—liquidated
interest.

general issue, accompanied by an affidavit of valid defense that the claim for sick benefits had been waived. The case was heard on an agreed statement of facts. As to interest, while the court stated the rule enunciated in Spencer v. Pierce, supra, and cited in Durfee v. O'Brien, supra, it held that a beneficial association ought not to be treated as a delinquent debtor, before demand made upon it, in order to create the relation of debtor and creditor, but allowed interest from the date of the writ, that being the time of the earliest proof of demand. In this case the right to recover at all was denied by the defendant, and apparently in good faith.

Some other decisions of this court relative to the allowance of interest may properly be considered in this connection.

In Hodges v. Hodges, 9 R. I. 32, the master, in a matter of accounting, disallowed interest on advances made by a husband for the improvement of his wife's estate, in the absence of any evidence of an agreement to pay interest, and the court held that interest should have been allowed, and cited as a correct statement of law the following: "On the money lent, interest in this country is always recoverable, because the defendant has had a use from the plaintiff's money. For the same reason, on money paid on account, or to the use or benefit or at the request of another, interest is allowed from the time of payment, and not merely from the time of notice or demand? . . . 'Money lent, and money paid, carry interest when they form matter of account, as well as when they are detached transactions.'"

Weeden v. Berry, 10 R. I. 288, was an action of assumpsit for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered and for work and labor done. The declaration also contained certain common counts, but no count for interest. The case was sent to referees, who allowed plaintiff interest. It was objected to such allowance that there was no count in the declaration claiming interest. The award of interest was upheld. The decision implies that by the terms of the reference, under which power was committed to "determine all questions of law or of fact" in the case, it was within the discretion of the referees to allow interest as damages.

In Cross v. Brown, 19 R. I. 220, 240, 33 Atl. 147, the question as to whether a garnishee should be required to pay interest on its debt due the principal defendant during the time it was restrained by the attachment from paying the debt was considered, and answered in the affirmative, on the ground that the garnishee had had the use of the money in the meantime after it was due, and that a contrary decision would work an injustice, both to the principal defendant and the attaching plaintiff.

In Lonsdale Co. v. Woonsocket, 25 R. I. 428, 56 Atl. 448, damages were sought for a continuing trespass resulting from the diversion of water to which the complainant was entitled as a riparian proprietor. The amount of water so diverted and the amount of the resulting damages were both in controversy, and there was conflicting evidence on each point. On the damages, as determined by him, the master allowed simple interest from the date of the filing of the bill, and the court, on page 444, held this finding to be correct. If interest on unliquidated damages in a tort action is properly allowable from the time of commencing legal proceedings, no reason is apparent why a less liberal rule should apply in actions ex contractu.

In Sedgwick on Damages, 8th ed. § 315, the author says: "Where interest is refused in actions of contract on the ground that the claim is unliquidated, it is in fact usually allowed from the date of the writ."

See also Ford v. Tirrell, 9 Gray, 401, 69 Am. Dec. 297; Barstow v. Robinson, 2 Allen, 605; McFadden v. Crawford, 39 Cal. 662; Feeter v. Heath, 11 Wend. 477; Case v. Osborn, 60 How. Pr. 187; McCollum v. Seward, 62 N. Y. 316; Mercer v. Vose, 67 N. Y. 56; Tucker v. Grover, 60 Wis. 240, 19 N. W. 62; Lowe v. Ring, 123 Wis. 370, 101 N. W. 698, 3 Ann. Cas. 781.

Healy v. Fallon, 69 Conn. 228, 37 Atl. 495, was a proceeding to enforce a mechanic's lien under a written contract to build a house for a stated price. The defendants claimed that the house was not finished as called for in the contract, upon which claim some deduction was made by the trial court from the contract price. On pages 235 et seq. of 69 Conn., the court says:

"We are also of opinion that the court did not err in allowing interest to the date of judgment upon the sum found to be due after deducting the damages caused by the deviations from the contract. . . . It is difficult on principle to see why he should not recover, as compensation for that detention, damages measured by the legal rate of interest upon the sum so detained for that time. It is said, however, that the amount due was unliquidated up to the time of the judgment, and that interest is never allowed upon unliquidated amounts. It may be conceded that the amount due the plaintiff was in a certain sense unliquidated up to the time of the judgment, inasmuch as the amount due him under the contract, which was a liquidated amount, was to be lessened by the as yet unascertained damages caused by his deviations from the contract; but it is not true that damages measured by the rate of interest are never allowed for the nonpayment of money, where the claim is an unliquidated one. In an action for the value of personal property destroyed by the negligent act of the defendant, where the claim was in a sense an unliquidated one, damages were allowed in the shape of interest upon the value of the property as found upon the trial [citing cases]. . . . We think the damages allowed by way of interest in the case at bar come within the principles applied in the cases cited. The claim was wholly a pecuniary one, and was not at large, as are claims for damages for assault and battery, slander, or others of like nature. It represented a loss of a pecuniary value, ascertainable with reasonable certainty, as of a definite time; and we think damages in the shape of interest should be recoverable from that time, for such a loss, for only in this way can equity be done between the parties in the case at bar."

Laycock v. Parker, 103 Wis. 161, 79 N. W. 327, was a proceeding to enforce a mechanic's lien under a building contract, where there was a counterclaim for omissions, substitutions, and delay, a considerable portion of which was allowed. Interest was allowed on the balance found to be due from the commencement of the suit, to which objection was taken. The court, on pages 178 to 189 of 103 Wis., discusses very fully the question of interest, citing and considering many reported cases, and held that "no error prejudicial to defendant was committed in the allowance made by the judgment." See also West Republic Min. Co. v. Jones, 108 Pa. 55, 69; Harwood v. Tappan, 2 Speers, L. 536, 551; Watkins v. Junker, 90 Tex. 584, 586, et seq., 40 S. W. 11; Bennett v. Federal Coal & Coke Co. 70 W. Va. 456, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 588, 74 S. E. 418, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 578; Vaughan v. Howe, 20 Wis. 498; Sedgwick, Damages, 8th ed. § 308; Sutherland, Damages, 4th ed. § 348; 8 R. C. L. 553.

In Bernhard v. Rochester German Ins. Co. 79 Conn. 388, 65 Atl. 134, 8 Ann. Cas. 298, the damages were unliquidated. The judgment included interest from the date of defendant's repudiation of liability. In upholding the allowance of interest, the court, on page 398 of 79 Conn., says: "The purpose sought in awarding damages other than vindictive is to make a fair compensation to one who has suffered an injury. . . . Courts are more and more coming to recognize that a rule forbidding an allowance for interest upon unliquidated damages is one well calculated to defeat that purpose in many cases, and that no right reason exists for drawing an arbitrary distinction between liquidated and unliquidated damages. . . . There are actions to which the suggested rule is applicable. . . . Others, however, present conditions where, without an allowance for interest, although the demand may be unliquidated, fair compensation for the injury done would not be accorded, and justice would thus be denied. The determination of whether or not interest is to be recognized as a proper element of damage is one to be made in view of the demands of justice rather than through the application of any arbitrary rule."

See contra Excelsior Terra Cotta Co. v. Harde, 181 N. Y. 11, 106 Am. St. Rep. 493, 73 N. E. 494, where the facts are similar to those in the present case, and where the court treats the plaintiff's claim as upon quantum meruit, holding that, "as the defendant's set-off was unliquidated," the plaintiff's damages were "necessarily dependent upon the amount of the set-off," and were unliquidated, and that on them interest was not recoverable.

We do not think it can be successfully urged that the rule enunciated in Spencer v. Pierce, 5 R. I. 63, implies that a debtor may be charged interest only when he knows "what he is to pay, and when he is to pay." The entire sentence of the opinion in People v. New York County, 5 Cow. 331, 334, cited by this court, reads: "It will surely not be considered inequitable that, whenever the debtor knows precisely what he is to pay and when he is to pay, he shall be charged with interest if he neglects to pay."

There is here no implication that a debtor might not equitably be chargeable with interest as damages under a different set of circumstances. It is evident, also, by the decisions of this court above cited, and in particular by the one in Lonsdale Co. v. Woonsocket, supra, that, while the court has reaffirmed the rule in Spencer v. Pierce, in later cases, when applicable to the facts therein, it has not adopted it as an arbitrary rule, but has allowed interest in other instances when it seemed equitable to do so, even when the person so charged did not know the amount of the debt or damages, and when the time of its being due was fixed only by the demand for payment.

In the present case, by the contract, the final payment was due and payable on the completion of the bungalow. The defendant saw fit to contest the payment of the balance specified in the contract, and succeeded in materially reducing the amount claimed. He had, however, the use and benefit of the sum which the court determined that he ought to pay for more than a year and a half after the petitioner made demand of payment and commenced legal proceedings. In these circumstances we find no error in law in the item of interest as allowed by the decree.

The appeal of the respondent is accordingly dismissed, the decree of the Superior Court is affirmed, and the case is remanded to the Superior Court for further proceedings.

ANNOTATION.

Reduction of claim under contract as affecting right to interest.

Claim for sum fixed by contract.

As a general rule, interest is not allowed on unliquidated damages or demands, for the reason that the person liable does not know what sum he owes, and therefore can be in no default for not paying. 8 R. C. L. title Damages, p. 533. See the reported case (PEARSON v. RYAN, ante, 805), and the cases cited throughout this note.

In the case, however, of an express contract to pay a sum certain at a fixed time, both parties thereto know what the amount of the claim is, and when it is due and payable. See the reported case (PEARSON v. RYAN).

Hence, the rule is that, where the amount of a claim under a contract is certain and liquidated, or is ascertainable but is reduced by reason of the existence of an unliquidated set-off or counterclaim thereto, interest is properly allowed on the balance found to be due from the time it became due and was demanded, or suit commenced therefor.

In Healy v. Fallon (Conn.) supra, an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, the defendants claimed, and were allowed, a deduction from the amount due under an agreement for the construction of a dwelling house, for deviations from the requirements of the contract. The court allowed interest on the amount then found due to the plaintiff, to the date of the judgment. It was held that the court had not erred in allowing interest to the date of the judgment on the sum found to have been due after the deduction of the damages caused by the deviations from the contract, it not being allowed as interest, eo nomine, but as damages for the detention of the sum found due, and the damages being measured by the rate of interest. The court said: "The court, in effect, rightfully found under the pleadings that the defendant owed the plaintiff, after deducting the damages caused by the deviations from the contract, the sum of $1,475, and that this sum should have been paid to him by a certain time, from which time it in effect added interest to the date of the judgment; and no complaint is made about the time selected as the starting point for interest. By the finding of the court it thus appears that the plaintiff was deprived of the use of $1,475 from the time when it should have been paid to him, to the date of the judgment, and the defendants during that time had the use of that money. It is difficult, on principle, to see why he should not recover, as compensation for that detention, damages measured by the legal rate of interest upon the sum so detained for that time. It is said, however, that the amount due was unliquidated up to the time of the judgment, and that interest is never allowed upon unliquidated amounts. It may be conceded that the amount due the plaintiff was in a certain sense unliquidated up to the time of the judgment, inasmuch as the amount due him under the contract, which was a liquidated amount, was to be lessened by the as yet unascertained damages caused by his deviations from the contract; but it is not true that damages measured by the rate of interest are never allowed for the nonpayment of money, where the claim is an unliquidated one. . . . We think the damages allowed by way of interest in the case at bar come within the principles applied in the cases cited. The claim was wholly a pecuniary one, and was not at large, as are claims for damages for assault and battery, slander, or others of like nature. It represented a loss of a pecuniary value ascertainable with reasonable certainty, as of a definite time; and we think damages in the shape of interest should be recoverable from that time, for such a loss; for only in this way can equity be done between the parties in the case at bar."

A California statute (Civ. Code, § 3287) allows interest when the damages are certain, and also when they are "capable of being made certain by calculation." In McCowen v. Pew (Cal.) supra, it was held that the statute applied to a contract for the sale of land, which was valuable principally for its timber, at an agreed price per acre, where there was to be a deduction for the removal of timber from a number of acres, of which number the other party was fully informed, as it would seem to be but a mere matter of calculation to determine what allowance should be made for the timber removed. The amount of the set-off being but trifling in comparison with what was due under the contract, the court held that it was reasonable and just to hold that the balance should bear interest from the time it was due.

In Meriwether v. Bird (Ga.) supra, an action on a promissory note, the defendants pleaded and proved a set-off for professional services. The court held that since interest was given only by way of damages for the detention of a debt, justice required that, in the case of a claim of a creditor carrying interest and a claim of a debtor not carrying interest, the former claim should be held to be discharged, to the extent of the mutual credit, from the time of such credit taking place, and that interest would only be due for the balance, from that time.

In Howard v. Behn (Ga.) supra, an action for an account in which was an item paid by the plaintiff factors for the defendant on a draft, the court held that interest was due on the cash balance overpaid by the plaintiffs, the produce furnished by the defendant having been insufficient to refund the cash paid on the draft.

In Henrylyn Orchards Co. v. F. W. Meneray Crescent Nursery Co. (1913) 55 Colo. 438, 135 Pac. 980, the garnishee in attachment proceedings claimed a set-off for poor stock from a sale of nursery stock to him by the defendant for an amount certain and liquidated. In an action on the bond, on the dissolution of the attachment, interest was allowed as damages on the balance admitted to be due while it was held up by the garnishment. In holding that the allowance of this interest was not error, the court said: "Certainly a debtor cannot defeat the running of interest against him for the part of a debt which he admits that he owes, and which would otherwise draw interest, by simply making a claim of an unliquidated set-off against the whole debt."

In Dickinson Fire & Pressed Brick Co. v. Crowe (1911) 63 Wash. 550, 115 Pac. 1087, the action was to recover the balance due on a quantity of brick sold for cash, the purchase price having been agreed on prior to the date of the first shipment. The defendant was allowed a set-off for damages sustained by the rejection of some of the brick as not being in conformity with the samples furnished, and interest was allowed on the balance due prior to the date of the entry of the judgment. In holding that this was not error, the court said: "Interest is allowable on a liability to pay money from the time the demand accrues, where the amount can be ascertained by computation. . . . The existence of a set-off or counterclaim, which is unliquidated, will not prevent the recovery of interest on the balance of the demand found due from the date of its maturity."

In Harwood v. Tappan (1844) 2 Speers L. (S. C.) 536, an action on a building contract, wherein the defendant claimed a discount from the contract price for variations from the contract requirements, it was held that interest was allowable by way of damages. The court stated that, on the admitted completion and receipt of the buildings, interest would have unquestionably been allowable from the time of completion, and held that the discount claimed by the defendant might reduce the amount covenanted to be paid, but did not impair the claim for interest on the balance, when adjusted by the verdict of the jury.

In Vaughan v. Howe (1866) 20 Wis. 498, an action on a written contract for the delivery of a specified quantity of good, sound, merchantable logs, at a stipulated price, there was evidence tending to show that some of the logs were not merchantable, and that the value of the logs delivered was less than the contract price. The answer of the defendant also set up several counterclaims. The jury allowed the plaintiff interest from the time of delivery of the logs, on the balance found due to him. On appeal from that judgment, the court held that it was proper that the jury should have allowed interest, and stated that the testimony supported the verdict.

In Skinker v. Clute (1874) 9 Nev. 342, an action for goods sold and delivered, wherein it appeared that the answer admitted the receipt of the goods and did not deny their value, but set up as a counterclaim damages for a breach of contract arising out of the transaction sued on, it was held that this was an admission of the plaintiff's claim to the extent set forth in the complaint, subject to the defendant's counterclaim. Hence, the court held, the account was liquidated, and the balance ascertained by the admissions of the answer, and interest on the balance was, therefore, allowable.

In the reported case (PEARSON v. RYAN, ante 805), it appears that by the terms of a contract for the building of a bungalow the final payment was due and payable at the time of the completion of the building. The defendant contested the payment of the balance specified in the contract, and succeeded in materially reducing the amount claimed by way of recoupment for unsatisfactory workmanship and materials. It is held that as he had, however, the use and benefit of the sum which the trial court determined that he ought to pay for more than a year and a half after the petitioner made demand of payment and commenced legal proceedings, there was no error in having allowed interest on the balance found due the petitioner from the date of giving notice of the claim.

In Laycock v. Parker (1899) 103 Wis. 161, 79 N. W. 327, an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, it appeared that the conclusion of the court, as a result of the general findings, was that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the contract price of the building, together with the reasonable market value of the additions and extras ordered by the defendant, less the reasonable value of the work and materials omitted, and a deduction for the amount found by the court on the defendant's counterclaim for delay in completion, and the value of the use of the defendant's heating plant. Interest was then allowed the plaintiff on the balance found to be due, from the commencement of the suit.

Y. 615, it was held that the plaintiff in an action for a commission on a sale effected by him, if entitled to anything, was entitled to the full amount claimed, on which, being a sum liquidated and certain, he had a right to interest. Hence, the court held that the fact that the jury arbitrarily reduced his claim to the amount of the verdict did not, either at law or in equity, affect his right to interest on the amount actually recovered.

In Stamps v. Tennessee Producers' Marble Co. (1900) — Tenn. —, 59 S. W. 769, however, an action to recover a balance alleged to be due for a lot of marble shipped to the defendant, with proper interest thereon, it appeared that the defendant claimed that a very large proportion of the marble delivered was defective and not suitable for the purposes for which it was purchased, and tendered to the complainant the sum which it claimed was the true balance due. It was held that the chancellor did not err in refusing to allow the complainant interest on the sums sued for and found due.

Where a plaintiff's demand is of a character which bears interest, and the defendant's demand or discount is not of a character which carries interest, the plaintiff is entitled to interest on his demand up to the time of the verdict, the demand set up by the defendant being regarded as a discount, and not as a payment; an independent, unliquidated demand which does not carry interest. Russell v. Rogers (1817) 1 Nott & M'C. (S. C.) 24. See also, M'Donald v. Ramsey (1813) 3 Brev. (S. C.) 379, wherein the question was discussed, but not decided. Compare Tucker v. Jewett (1865) 32 Conn. 563. In Russell v. Rogers (S. C.) supra, it appeared that the defendant, who was a merchant, gave the plaintiff the promissory note on which the action was founded. It was credited with the amount of the plaintiff's store account with the defendant for two years, and the defendant offered as a discount the plaintiff's store account with him for the two succeeding years, though there was no evidence of an agreement that this account was to go in payment of the note. It was held that, as the plaintiff's demand was of a character in which interest was to be allowed, and as the defendant's discount on demand did not carry interest, the plaintiff was entitled to interest on his demand up to the time of the verdict, and not merely to the time of the filing of the discount. In Morse v. Ellerbe (1851) 4 Rich. L. (S. C.) 600, an action on a written contract for the construction of a house, the price being payable in instalments, and the defendant having verbally agreed to add a further sum to the price, to be paid after the last instalment, the defendant set up by way of discount to the plaintiff's claims under the contract, two promissory notes of the latter. It was held that the plaintiff's demand rested on a mere verbal undertaking, and could not bear interest, and hence that the jury had erred in stopping the interest on the plaintiff's notes, set up by way of discount by the defendant at the time when the plaintiff's work was done, and when he ought to have been paid. The court said: "The case of Russell v. Rogers (S. C.) supra, decides the very point. For there it was held that interest on a promissory note could not be stopped by accounts offered in discount, being credited successively as when due. The same rule must hold when a note is offered in discount of a demand not bearing interest; for a discount is in the nature of a cross action. Looked at in that way, there is no difficulty; the defendant is entitled to recover his notes and interest to the trial; this sum must be discounted from the amount of the plaintiff's demand." In Tucker v. Jewett (Conn.) supra, however, it was found that, at the commencement of the suit, the plaintiff was indebted to the defendant in a certain sum which was then a proper subject of set-off against any demand on which the plaintiff might be entitled to recover in the action. The court set this sum off without interest, while allowing interest on the sum in favor of the plaintiff down to the time of the judgment. It was held that the court should have made an application of the indebtedness, to take effect from the time when it was so found to have been applicable, in which case there would have been nothing due to the plaintiff, and but a small balance in favor of the defendant.

In several instances, it appears that interest has been allowed by the court on the whole amount of the plaintiff's claim, before its reduction by allowance of the defendant's counterclaim. Thus, in New Zealand Ins. Co. v. Earnmoor S. S. Co. (1897) 24 C. C. A. 644, 48 U. S. App. 245, 79 Fed. 368 (applying California statute) it appeared that a shipowner demanded of an insurer of the vessel the payment of its share, proportionate to the amount insured by it, of a claim for salvage services and subsequent repairs. The insurance company appeared on the libel brought, and contended that the sum properly due from it was a less sum, but made no tender thereof. Instead, it withheld from the owner for nearly seven years what it admitted was justly due from it; and at the end of a costly litigation extending through that period, the result of which showed that there was a difference of only $43.60 between the amount originally demanded by the owner and that actually due from the insurer, contended that the small difference found and adjudged by the court below to exist deprived the assured of the right to interest on the proper amount from the date when it should have been paid or tendered. It was held that the court below was clearly right in rejecting that contention, and in allowing the owner interest from the date of the demand on the amount found to have been due from the insurer under the policy.

In Greenly v. Hopkins (1833) 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 96, it appeared that suit was brought to recover the moiety of the costs of an action against the defendant as a deputy sheriff, for selling certain property by virtue of an execution in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant in that action obtained a verdict, and double costs were awarded, and an execution for the collection thereof was issued, on which one half of the sum was received by the de-defendant, and the other half by the attorney who defended the suit. The defendant, having, in compliance with a bond of indemnity, defended the suit, claimed that he was entitled to the whole costs, and commenced this suit on the defendant refusing to pay over the moiety received by him. On the trial of the cause, it appeared that the defendant had aided and had advanced moneys in defense of the suit, and that the plaintiff had made payments to him on account of the services rendered. The trial judge charged the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the moiety of the bill of costs which had been received by the defendant, but that they ought to allow the defendant such sum as, in their opinion, he was entitled to for his services and disbursements in defense of the suit, deducting the payments made to him by the plaintiff. The jury, by the consent of the parties, found a special verdict, subject to the opinion of the court on the question of interest. It was held that, money belonging to the plaintiff having been received by the defendant, who claimed it and illegally withheld it from the plaintiff, he ought, therefore, to pay interest.

In Smith v. Turner (1898) 33 Or. 379, 54 Pac. 166, the plaintiff sued on a promissory note bearing interest, to which the defendants counterclaimed their unliquidated damages arising by reason of the plaintiff's supposed breach of contract, as of the date when it was alleged the damages accrued, so as to cut off the running of interest on the note. The court held that this could not be done, however, because it required the verdict of the jury, or at least the confession or default of the plaintiff, to liquidate the defendant's demand for their alleged damages.

In Stephens v. Burgess (1878) 69 Mo. 168, it appeared that the plaintiff purchased a dwelling house, paying therefor partly in cash and partly by a note, subsequently paid. The deed, however, was made directly to the defendant, who agreed verbally with the plaintiff to repay him the price paid, with interest. In a suit by the plaintiff to enforce a vendor's lien, the defendant pleaded a counterclaim, consisting of items for legal services, money paid, and the price of land sold to the plaintiff. The court allowed the defendant's counterclaim, and also allowed the plaintiff interest on the purchase price of the house, at the rate of 6 per cent from the date of his purchase to the day of trial.

Claim for unliquidated sum.

While there has been some modification of the old common-law rule, which required that a demand should be liquidated or its amount ascertained before interest could be allowed, the extent of the modification is that if the amount due is capable of being ascertained by mere computation the allowance of interest is proper. Excelsior Terra Cotta Co. v. Harde (1905) 181 N. Y. 11, 106 Am. St. Rep. 493, 73 N. E. 494, affirming judgment in (1904) 90 App. Div. 4, 85 N. Y. Supp. 732.

Therefore, it has been held that where a claim arising on contract is based in whole or in part on a quantum meruit, and is further subject to a reduction in an unliquidated amount because of faulty performance of the contract, interest should not be allowed on the amount found to be due. Stephens v. Phoenix Bridge Co. (1905) 71 C. C. A. 374, 139 Fed. 248 (following New York decisions); Excelsior Terra Cotta Co. v. Harde, supra; Delafield v. Westfield (1899) 41 App. Div. 24, 58 N. Y. Supp. 277; judgment affirmed in (1901) 169 N. Y. 582, 62 N. E. 1095; O'Reilly v. Mahoney (1908) 123 App. Div. 275, 108 N. Y. Supp. 53.

In Delafield v. Westfield (1899) 41 App. Div. 24, 58 N. Y. Supp. 277, judgment affirmed in (1901) 169 N. Y. 582, 62 N. E. 1095, an action by a contractor to recover the value of labor performed and materials furnished, it appeared that neither the quantities of the work performed nor the quantities of the materials furnished, for which the prices were agreed on, had been ascertained, nor could they be readily ascertained by the defendant; and that the amount, when ascertained, was subject to a deduction for damages sustained by the defendant for improper performance by the plaintiff of some of the work; and the amounts due for extra work, for which prices were not agreed on, were clearly unascertainable without taking evidence. It was held that the claims recovered by the plaintiff were unliquidated, and that no error was committed in refusing to allow the plaintiff interest on the several items included in his recovery.

The case last cited was followed in Excelsior Terra Cotta Co. v. Harde (N. Y.) supra, an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, filed for work done and materials furnished under a contract. It appeared therein that the complaint set up the contract, alleged its full performance, and claimed a recovery, in addition to the contract price, for extra work done. The answer denied the allegations as to performance and as to extra work, and demanded, by way of counterclaim, a large sum of money for the damage occasioned by defective work and by delay in performance. The trial court made an allowance for the defective workmanship and delay in performance, disallowed the claim for extra work done, and allowed interest on the amount for which judgment was directed. It was held that the modification of this judgment, striking out the amount allowed for interest, was correct, as the plaintiff's claims were, under the circumstances, unliquidated. The court said: "They were, in fact, upon quantum meruit. The finding of the trial court established that the claim under the contract was subject to a reduction, because of defective and dilatory performance, to the extent of nearly one third of its amount; while the claim for extra work was wholly disallowed. The case comes within the authority of Delafield v. Westfield (1899) 41 App. Div. 24, 58 N. Y. Supp. 277, affirmed without opinion in (1901) 169 N. Y. 582, 62 N. E. 1095, where the plaintiff's claim, which was in part upon contract, and in part for extra work, was reduced by an award of damages for failure in performance. The appellate division there held that, as the amount, when ascertained, was subject to a reduction for damages sustained by the defendant for improper performance of the work, and the amounts due for extra work could only be ascertained by proofs, the plaintiff's claims were unliquidated, and that, therefore, interest was not recoverable."

In O'Reilly v. Mahoney (N. Y.) supra, an action to recover the value of extra work performed for and materials furnished by a subcontractor to the general contractor, it appeared that the claim made by the plaintiff was unliquidated, and subject to a reduction of more than 60 per cent. The court held that the plaintiff was not entitled to interest on the amount recovered.

In Stephens v. Phoenix Bridge Co. (Fed.) supra, it appeared that the action was brought to recover the reasonable value of the materials and labor furnished by the plaintiff for a viaduct which the defendants were erecting, under a contract between the parties by which the plaintiff undertook to complete the metal work of the structure at a specified date, and "to be subject to a penalty of $100 per day for any time beyond that day." Performance was not completed by the plaintiff within the time specified in the contract, and on the trial it was not disputed that the reasonable value of the labor and materials was the contract price; but the defendants were not allowed a deduction of $100 per day for the delay, but were held to be entitled, by way of counterclaim, only to the actual damages sustained by them by the delay in the completion of the contract, and the plaintiff was held to be entitled to interest on any amount which the jury might find to have been owing by the defendants to the plaintiff when the demand became payable. The court held, however, that the sum owing from the defendants to the plaintiff was uncertain and unascertainable by computation at the time of the commencement of the action; it depended not only on what should be found to be the reasonable value of the materials and services furnished by the plaintiff, but also on the amount which it should be found ought to be deducted from the plain-tiff's claim, and this amount was likewise uncertain and unascertainable by computation. Hence, the court held that, following the rules deducible from the New York decisions, in the absence of controlling decisions in the Federal courts, interest was not allowable in the case.

In H. G. Vogel Co. v. Lockport Glass Co. (1909) 118 N. Y. Supp. 351, it appeared that the plaintiff's claim of $1,700 was reduced by the jury to about $1,100, by deducting the amount claimed by the defendant as damages. It was held that it was error to direct the jury to add interest.

In Pengra v. Wheeler (1893) 24 Or. 532, 21 L.R.A. 726, 34 Pac. 354, it appeared that a water power lease provided that the rent should be a certain sum a year, payable quarterly, and that in default of a sufficient supply of water from any cause a pro rata portion of the accruing water rents should be forfeited. It was held that this provision rendered the amount of rent due under the contract dependent on the supply of water for each quarter, and hence that the amount of rent, in case of an insufficient supply, would be unliquidated; and, since the contract made no provision for interest, it could not be recovered until the amount of the rent which the defendant ought to have paid had been fixed and made certain. The contract having provided that the rent should be paid yearly-quarterly, under the section of the statute (Hill's Code, § 3587) allowing interest on the settlement of matured accounts, interest must, the court held, be allowed from the end of each quarter on deferred payments, except in case of an offset, in which case interest could be recovered only from the time that the balance due could be made certain. Hence, there was no account due the plaintiff, so as to draw interest under the statute, until the balance was ascertained, and the allowance of interest to either party was held to have been error.

In Greer v. Latimer (1896) 47 S. C. 176, 25 S. E. 136, the action was on a written promise to pay the plaintiff a certain sum of money, less the expense in defending a certain suit, provided the defendant was not called to pay a certain judgment previously obtained against him. The defendant not having been called on to pay the judgment, in discussing the question as to whether the plaintiff's claim on the promise was an interest-bearing demand, the court said: "It will be observed that, in this case, there was no promise to pay any definite sum of money at any specific time, for the sum to be paid was to be dependent upon the expense incurred by the defendant in defending himself against the attempt to charge him with the Greer judgment. Indeed, there was no promise to pay at all, except upon a contingency which had not happened at the date of the agreement, and which, so far as then could be seen, might never happen at all; and it seems to us clear that there was error in instructing the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to claim interest upon the whole amount named in the agreement from its date, for that would be making the defendant liable for interest on a greater sum than the defendant agreed to pay in any contingency; for, by the express terms of the agreement, defendant was only liable for so much of said sum as would remain after deducting therefrom the expense incurred in defending himself against the Greer judgment, the amount of which deduction had not and could not have been ascertained at the date of the agreement; and whether defendant should be liable for any part of the sum of money mentioned in the agreement depended upon the contingency whether defendant would be successful in resisting the attempt to charge him with the Greer judgment, which had not then and could not then have been determined. . . . Now, it is quite clear from the terms of the agreement that the plaintiff could not demand payment of any part of the sum mentioned, until it was ascertained that the defendant had been successful in defending himself against the attempt to charge him with the Greer judgment; even then she could not demand payment of the whole amount mentioned in the agreement, but only for so much thereof as might remain after deducting the expense incurred by defendant in defending himself against such attempt. So that in no event could the defendant be liable for interest, except upon the balance remaining after such expense was deducted, and then only from the time when the amount of such liability was ascertained."

In Davis v. Walker (1869) 18 Mich. 25, it appeared that there had been a running account between the parties, but that they had accounted together as to most of the items and found that a certain sum was due to the plaintiff. But certain items due the defendant were not considered at that time, and further accounts subsequently accrued in favor of both parties. Interest was claimed on the amount due the plaintiff at the time of the accounting. The court held, however, that the accounting was in no sense a final one, but was still an open and mutual account, and that, therefore, no balance could be considered as having been struck on which interest could run in the absence of any special agreement to that effect.

So, interest is not allowed when more is demanded than is due, or on uncertain demands which are to be settled by process of law. The Isaac Newton (1850) Abb. Adm. 588, Fed. Cas. No. 7,090; Brady v. Wilcoxson (1872) 44 Cal. 239; Doyle v. St. James's Church (1831) 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 179; Still v. Hall (1838) 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 51.

In the case of The Isaac Newton (Fed.) supra, an action on a contract for the construction of a steam engine in a vessel, which provided for the payment of the purchase price in instalments from time to time as the work progressed, and under which claims were made for extra work, it was said that if the defendants had accepted the work when the libellants claimed that their contract was fully performed, interest would have become, from that time, a portion of the unpaid debt due the libellants, continuing to run with the debt until that was satisfied by the defendants, or, at least, it would have run from the time the suit was commenced, two days later. This, the court declared, was on the idea that the agreement had been entirely fulfilled on the part of the libellants, and that they were justly entitled to the compensation stipulated. However, the court held that interest was not allowed when more was demanded than was due, or on uncertain demands which were to be settled by process of law. In this case, the court said, not only was the balance rightfully belonging to the libellants to be settled by process of law, but also a question vital to the right of recovery at all was contested in the suit, with at least reasonable color of grounds of defense on the part of the defendants. They could not, accordingly, the court held, be justly required to recognize the demand or make any tender for its satisfaction until after the decree of the court had fixed the right of recovery, and the report of the commissioners had liquidated the amount.

In Doyle v. St. James's Church (1831) 7 Wend. (N. Y.) 179, the plaintiff's demand was an unliquidated account for work, labor, and services. There was no evidence of its rendition to the defendants before suit was brought, nor was it acquiesced in by the latter; and the result showed that the plaintiffs claimed $300 more than the arbitrators found was due to them. It was held that they could not, under such circumstances, be entitled to interest.

In Brady v. Wilcoxson (1872) 44 Cal. 239, the action was brought on a contract for the keeping and feeding of cattle. It provided two separate compensations to the plaintiffs for their care and expense in that respect; first, 8 cents per pound on the net increase in the weight of the cattle at the time of sale, over the agreed net weight at the date of the contract; and, second, two thirds of the increase in the price the cattle should be sold for, over and above 8 cents per pound on the net weight at the date of the agreement. The defendants reserved the right to sell the cattle at any time and on their own terms, and, if sold away from the place where they were being kept, the plaintiffs were to pay two thirds of the whole amount of the expenses of driving and of sale. The court held that the only reasonable construction of the contract was that the weight and price of the cattle sold elsewhere were to be estimated at the time and place of sale, and that the provision in the contract that the cattle, when sold or delivered, were to be weighed out at the corral of the plaintiffs, applied only to the cattle then sold by the defendants, and not to those driven and sold elsewhere. By this construction of the contract, it appeared that the plaintiff's share of the proceeds of a sale was subject to a deduction for payments and offsets found by the court, which then held that they were not entitled to interest. Their claim, the court held, was an uncertain and unliquidated demand, the amount due not being ascertainable from the face of the contract, but could be settled only by process of law. On such demands, the court held, interest, eo nomine, could not be allowed.

In Still v. Hall (N. Y.) supra, the action was to recover a balance due for services, which balance the defendant conceded to be due, but offered to prove, by way of recoupment, his damages arising from a loss sustained by him by reason of the plaintiff's negligence in the employment. The court held that if the principal sum stood open for liquidation by the testimony offered in abatement, and damages had been proved and deducted, interest should not have been made a part of the balance found. The court stated that the principal would have stood in the light of an uncertain demand, to be settled by process of law, and that on such demands interest was not allowed. The court then held that the defense offered was admissible.

In Bull v. Rich (1904) 92 Minn. 481, 100 N. W. 213, 101 N. W. 490, it appeared, on the settlement of a deceased guardian's accounts, that he was in default, whereupon the plaintiffs, part of the sureties on the bonds, paid the wards the entire amount of their liability on the bonds, and filed their claim for the same against the guardian's estate. Thereafter, the plaintiffs entered into an agreement with the heir of the deceased guardian, whereby he assigned to them certain personal property and securities, and in consideration thereof they agreed to withdraw their claim of right to participation in the dividend, and to release the estate of the deceased guardian from all liability on account thereof. The full amount secured by the plaintiffs was then converted into cash and applied on their claim, after which they brought an action against the rest of the sureties to compel contribution of the amount of their liability as cosureties in the guardianship bond, claiming interest from the date of the payment to the wards. The answer of the cosureties admitted the payment and alleged that the property secured from the estate by means of the alleged settlement was of greater value than had been accounted for; that the release filed by the plaintiffs released them as cosureties, and charged laches in reference to the disposition of the property secured from the estate, and in prosecuting the action for contribution. The trial court, after receiving evidence on the questions, determined the value of the property, and charged against the plaintiffs a considerably larger amount than they had given the defendants credit for. Hence, it was held that it could not be claimed that the liability of the defendants was fixed and determined until the trial court filed its order for judgment, but it was unliquidated; and so it was not error to have disallowed interest.

It has been held that where the amount due the plaintiff is unliquidated and uncertain at the time of the demand, being dependent on an adjustment between himself and the defendant of an unliquidated claim of the latter, interest should be allowed on the balance found due, not from the time of the demand, but from the date of the writ only. Brewer v. Tyng (1832) 12 Pick. (Mass.) 547; Palmer v. Stockwell (1857) 9 Gray (Mass.) 237. In the case first cited, an action of quantum meruit for labor performed by the plaintiff in partial performance of a contract which the defendants finished, it was held that the plaintiff was to recover all the price agreed, deducting the reasonable charges which the defendants sustained or were liable to pay for completing the work. As, however, the sum due plaintiff was unliquidated at the time of his demand, the court held that interest thereon should have been calculated from the date of the writ. In Palmer v. Stockwell (Mass.) supra, an action on a contract to build a house which was subsequently altered and enlarged by verbal agreement between the parties, it appeared that, at the time the plaintiff offered the key of the house to the defendant and demanded a settlement of accounts between them, the amount due the plaintiff was unliquidated, and there were mutual contested accounts between the parties, growing out of the building of the house. It was held that, the sum due the plaintiff having been unliquidated and uncertain, dependent on an adjustment of debts and credits between himself and the defendant at the time of the demand, and which were allowed for by the auditor, interest should be allowed on the balance found due, not from the time of the demand, but from the date of the writ only. APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting from a fall on a defective sidewalk, for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

Statement by Bean, J.:

This is an action of negligence against the city of Portland, brought by Victoria I. Colby for personal injuries alleged to have been received on the 6th day of May, 1915, as the result of a fall on a crosswalk at the intersection of East Salmon and East Thirty-second streets in the city of Portland. The case was tried before the court and a jury, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,578.50. The facts involved were before this court in the case of Colby v. Portland, 85 Or. 359, 166 Pac. 537, decided July 3, 1917. In that case, the trial of the lower court resulted in an alleged order of nonsuit as against the city of Portland, and a judgment against the other defendants who were officers of the municipality. Upon the reversal by this court of the judgment then obtained by the plaintiff against the city officers, this action was brought against the city of Portland alone.

Bean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1, 2. The first question for consideration is raised by the demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, interposed by the defendant upon the ground that it appears upon the face thereof that the action was not commenced within the time limited by the Code, and is barred. The trial court sustained the complaint and overruled the demurrer.

The complaint shows that the alleged injury occurred on May 6, 1915; that on June 1, 1915, plaintiff filed a claim for damages against the city of Portland with the city auditor; that on July 6, 1915, the claim was presented to the council of the city; and that on July 7 of that year her claim was rejected and disallowed by the council. The record shows that the complaint was filed July 25, 1917. Section 8, L. O. L., provides that an action for any injury to the person or rights of another, not arising on contract and not herein especially enumerated, shall be commenced within two years after the cause of action shall have accrued.

Counsel for defendant submit that the alleged cause of action accrued on the date of the injury, and that it was not incumbent upon the plaintiff, prior to the commencement thereto, to present her claim to the city council and file the same with the city auditor, as provided for in § 282 of the charter of the city of Portland; and that the opinion in the case of Caviness v. Vale, 86 Or. 554, 169 Pac. 95, is decisive of the question. Counsel for plaintiff maintain, inter alia, that said section of the city charter was necessarily complied with by the plaintiff, and that her cause of action did not accrue until sixty days had elapsed after her claim was so presented; and that the action was begun within the time prescribed by law; that by virtue of § 282 of the charter there was a statutory prohibition staying the commencement of the action during such time. As the accident occurred on May 6, 1915, and the complaint was not filed until July 5, 1917, it is apparent from the complaint that the action was barred by the Statute of Limitations, unless the time of its commencement was prolonged by § 20, L. O. L., or otherwise especially enumerated and provided for by the Code. Section 20 reads thus: "When the commencement of an action is stayed by injunction or a statutory prohibition, the time of the continuance of the injunction or prohibition shall not be a part of the time limited for the commencement of the action."

Section 282 of the city charter reads as follows: "Every claim for damages against the city must be presented to the council and filed with the auditor within six months from the taking effect of this charter or within six months after the time when such claim for damages accrues; otherwise there shall be no recovery on any such claim. No ordinance shall be passed allowing any such claim, or any part thereof, or appropriating money or other property to pay or satisfy the same, or any part thereof, until such claim has been referred to the proper department, nor until such department has made its report to the council thereon pursuant to such reference, unless judgment has been rendered on such claim. No action shall be maintained against the city for any claim for damages until the same has been presented to the council and filed with the auditor as above set out and sixty days have elapsed after such presentation."

The question therefore is, Does the expression, "claim for damages," include claims arising ex delicto, and especially claims arising from injuries occasioned by defects in a street?

In the case of Caviness v. Vale, 86 Or. 554, 169 Pac. 95, decided December 11, 1917, this court construed a section of the charter of the city of Vale which is admittedly identical in its wording with this section of the Portland charter. The reasoning followed in the construction of the Vale charter applies in the construction of the Portland charter. The opinion in that case is a final determination of the question presented, adversely to the contention of plaintiff. At page 558 of the opinion, Chief Justice McBride said:

"It is contended that the complaint is insufficient as against the city for the reasons (1) that the claim was not presented within six months after the injury, as required by the charter, . . .

"The first contention is settled adversely to the claim of respondent in Sheridan v. Salem, 14 Or. 328, 12 Pac. 925, wherein it was held that a provision of the charter which provided that 'no claim against the city shall be paid until it is audited and allowed by the common council' did not apply to claims arising ex delicto. . . . The words, 'claim for damages,' used in the Vale charter, if standing alone and without reference to other provisions of the charter, would seem to be broad enough to include claims arising ex delicto. But a fair construction would seem to be that which would refer the language to such claims as the charter authorized the city to audit and pay. The object was to give the city the option of examining into the merits of the claim and paying it without an action, if deemed proper. In view of the fact that § 200 of the charter expressly declares that the city shall not be liable for claims of the character herein described, it cannot be held that it was in the legislative mind to require the presentation to the council of a claim which it was expressly prohibited from paying. To do so would be to require the performance of a vain and useless ceremony. The authorities upon this subject are conflicting, and will be found collated in an exhaustive note in Henry v. Lincoln, 93 Neb. 331, 140 N. W. 664, as reported in 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 174, and in Miller v. Mullan, 17 Idaho, 28, 104 Pac. 660, 19 Ann. Cas. 1107."

We adhere to the conclusion reached in that case by the Chief Justice. We do not believe that this section was ever intended by the framers of the charter to apply to actions ex delicto. In Municipal corporation—presentation of claim for damages—personal injuries.

Sheridan v. Salem, 14 Or. 328, at page 333, 12 Pac. 926, of the opinion, Mr. Justice Thayer, in discussing this question, said: "The breach of payment in the action of assumpsit is a necessary allegation, but it does not figure at all in an action of trespass on the case. The city only agrees to pay a contracted indebtedness in case the claim is presented as mentioned, and the action is for a refusal to audit and allow it; but if it commit a tort, the action matures at once."

Section 281 of the Portland charter attempts to exempt the city of Portland from liability for damages sustained by reason of a defective condition of a street in the same manner as the Vale charter attempts to exempt the city of Vale. Section 281 clearly shows that the legislature did not have in mind that claims for such injuries should ever be presented to the city. The plain language of the section quoted above, prohibiting the appropriation of money to pay "such claim" until the same has been referred to the proper department and reported to the council by such department, "unless judgment has been rendered on such claim," contemplates that a judgment will be rendered on certain claims against the city, without the presentation of such claims in the manner provided for in this section. This language indicates that the main object of this portion of the charter was to regulate the manner of conducting such affairs by the city government, and not to control the time for action by the courts. Therefore, it cannot be said that such a claim comes within the provisions of § 282 of the city charter. The same rule must be applied as when in a case where the position of the parties is reversed and the plaintiff did not file a claim for damages with the city officials, as in the Vale Case. There was no statutory prohibition against the plaintiff's action before filing her claim with the city authorities.

3, 4. Counsel for plaintiff invoke the provision of § 21, L. O. L., which reads thus: "If an action shall be commenced within the time prescribed therefor, and a judgment therein for the plaintiff be reversed on appeal, the plaintiff, or if he die, and the cause of action survives, his heirs or personal representatives, may commence a new action within one year after the reversal."

The facts to which plaintiff would apply the law contained in this section are stated in plaintiff's brief in effect as follows: That Victoria I. Colby, plaintiff, prior to the institution of the present action, filed a joint action against the city of Portland, city commissioners, and city engineer, on the 2d day of October, 1916. The case was then pending in the court, until the 12th day of December, 1916, when the trial court by verbal order, which was never entered of record, granted a nonsuit as against the city of Portland. The case went to the jury against the other joint defendants and it returned a verdict for plaintiff. Defendants appealed to the supreme court, and on the 3d day of July, 1917, this court reversed the judgment of the lower court, and remanded the cause for a new trial. Colby v. Portland, 85 Or. 359, 166 Pac. 537.

The conditions of the present case do not come within the provisions of § 21, L. O. L. In order to bring the case within the time prescribed in that section, plaintiff must have obtained a judgment against the defendant city of Portland in the former action, and the same have been reversed on appeal. The reason of the rule prescribed by such a statute is that if an action is commenced by a plaintiff against a defendant while another action is pending between the same parties, the pendency of such prior action would be a ground for abatement of the second. The statute contemplates that where a judgment is rendered in an action in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, which is reversed upon appeal, the plaintiff is allowed one year after such reversal in which to commence a new action against such defendant. In the present case, as the facts are stated by plaintiff, there was no action pending against the defendant city of Portland after the 12th day of December, 1916. No judgment in favor of plaintiff and against this defendant was rendered in the former action or reversed on appeal. After the nonsuit as to the city of Portland on December 12, 1916, there was nothing to prevent plaintiff from commencing a new action against such defendant. If the first action had been proceeded with against the present defendant after the nonsuit, and had been reversed and remanded for a new trial as to this defendant, then there would have been no necessity for the bringing of a new action. The running of the Statute of Limitations is not interrupted by the commencement of an action against the servant of the real party in interest. 25 Cyc. 1299 (b); Lattie-Morrison v. Holladay, 27 Or. 175, 39 Pac. 1100. The pendency of the action against the servants of the defendant city, after December 12, 1916, did not interfere with the right of the plaintiff to bring a new action, or toll the Statute of Limitations in the case at bar. The peculiar language of the statute must control in all cases, as the courts are without power to extend the provisions beyond the plain language of the enactment. 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 263, as stated in that volume at page 260: "(e) Must be against proper defendant.—A suit begun against a stranger or one who sustains no such relation to the proper defendant that a judgment against him would bind such defendant, can have no effect on the operation of the statute in favor of the party against whom the cause of action properly exists."

See also Wallace v. Swepston, 74 Ark. 520, 109 Am. St. Rep. 94, 86 S. W. 398; Laughlin v. Calumet & C. Canal & Dock Co. 13 C. C. A. 1, 24 U. S. App. 573, 65 Fed. 441; Robinson v. Thompson, — Tex. It would not be suggested that the city would be bound by a judgment against the city commissioners, or engineer. Under our statute, a nonsuit does not have the effect to bar another action for the same cause, but the time for bringing such other action is not extended on account of such nonsuit. § 184, L. O. L.

The present action was not commenced within the time prescribed by the Code, viz., within two years after the cause of action accrued, and is barred.

The judgment of the lower court is therefore reversed, and the case dismissed.

ANNOTATION.

Applicability, as affected by parties, of statute permitting new action to be brought within specified time after failure of prior action for a cause other than the merits.

I. Introductory.

Statutes of the class under discussion are said to have their origin in the common-law rule of "journeys' account." They are founded upon the statute of 21 James I. chap. 16, § 4, though they differ to some extent in terms.

This note does not include cases abated by death.

III. Defendants:

- a. In general, 826.
- b. Differences as to some of parties defendant, 827.

IV. Miscellaneous, 828.

It should be stated, in limine, that the statute is remedial, and should be liberally construed. Givens v. Robins (1847) 11 Ala. 156; Cox v. Strickland (1904) 120 Ga. 104, 47 S. E. 912, 1 Ann. Cas. 870; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Knapp (1912) 139 Ga. 422, 77 S. E. 568; Coffin v. Cottle (1835) 16 Pick. (Mass.) 383, per Shaw, Ch. J.; Bent v. Read (1918) — W. Va. —, 97 S. E. 286.

II. Plaintiffs.a. In general.

It is a general rule that the new suit must be brought by the same plaintiff as in the first suit. If it is brought by a different plaintiff the statute does not apply. H. B. Claffin Co. v. Middlesex Bkg. Co. (1902) 113 Fed. 958; Bynum v. Memphis & C. R. Co. (1893) 100 Ala. 311, 13 So. 910; Doyle v. Wade (1887) 23 Fla. 90, 11 Am. St. Rep. 334, 1 So. 516 (stating the rule); Moss v. Keesler (1878) 60 Ga. 44; Ross v. Sims (1854) 27 Miss. 359; Tiffin v. Leabo (1873) 52 Mo. 49; Meddis v. Wilson (1903) 175 Mo. 126, 74 S. W. 984.

Thus, it was held that the second suit was not within the benefit of the statute, when the first suit was by a trustee for creditors and the second by one of the creditors. H. B. Claffin Co. v. Middlesex Bkg. Co. (Fed.) supra.

So, where the first suit was by R. S. & H., constituting the firm of R. S. & Co., and the second was by R. S. & T., constituting the firm of R. S. & Co., suing for the use of J. Ross v. Sims (1854) 27 Miss. 359, supra.

So, where an administrator brought the first suit and the heirs the second. Doyle v. Wade (1887) 23 Fla. 90, 11 Am. St. Rep. 334, 1 So. 516 (not necessary to decision).

Where a judgment for a woman was reversed on the ground that the cause of action belonged to her husband in his own right, he could not bring a new action under the statute by styling himself trustee of his wife. Bynum v. Memphis & C. R. Co. (1893) 100 Ala. 311, 13 So. 910, supra.

Where the plaintiffs in both actions are substantially the same, the statute applies.

Thus, where the first action was brought by A, guardian of B, and the plaintiff in the second was B, by A, his guardian, the second action was protected by the statute. Spear v. Brain-tree (1875) 47 Vt. 729.

So, where on a note to the "administrator of" A, the administrator brought the first suit and his successor the second. Moody v. Threlkeld (1853) 13 Ga. 55.

So, where the second action was brought by a receiver of the plaintiff in the first action. McWhirt v. McKee (1870) 6 Kan. 412.

So, where the first suit against a county auditor was by the county board, and the second by taxpayers for the benefit of the county. Zuelly v. Casper (1910) 46 Ind. App. 430, 92 N. E. 785.

So, where husband and wife brought the first action for services, and the husband alone brought the second action, the wife not being a necessary party to the first action. Whetstone v. Wilson (1889) 104 N. C. 385, 10 S. E. 471.

(It may be noted that where a widow as administratrix of her husband brought her original writ and then remarried, and she as administratrix, and her husband, brought a new suit within two terms, it was held that the second suit was not barred by the Statute of Limitations. Middleton v. Forbes, Willes, 260, note, 125 Eng. Reprint, 1162, note.)

Where the first suit was brought by the trustees of a bank on a note which had been already assigned to part of them as residuary trustees, a second writ by such residuary trustees is within the benefit of the statute. James v. Biscoe (1849) 10 Ark. 184; Biscoe v. Madden (1856) 17 Ark. 533.

But it was held in Ingraham v. Regan (1851) 23 Miss. 213, that a bank's assignee for creditors cannot have the benefit of the statute when the former action was brought by the bank. The court said: "If the appellants stood in the same relation to the defunct bank which an administrator does to his intestate, or a husband and wife in a new suit, commenced under this construction of the law, do to the action originally instituted by the latter whilst a feme sole, there would be no question, according to such construction, that they are not barred."

A transferee of the plaintiff in the first action may bring the second action. Shively v. Beeson (1880) 24

Kan. 352; Anthony Invest. Co. v. Law (1900) 62 Kan. 193, 61 Pac. 745; Premo v. Lee (1884) 56 Vt. 60.

So, a grantee of the plaintiff in the first action may bring the second action. Dressler v. Carpenter (1913) 107 Ark. 353, 155 S. W. 108; Thornburgh v. Cole (1882) 27 Kan. 490; Wintermute v. Montgomery (1860) 11 Ohio St. 442.

Where W brought an action April 9, 1906, dismissed it May 4, 1907, brought a new action May 4, 1907, and dismissed it April 3, 1908, it was held that his grantee might begin an action March 16, 1908, that being within one year from May 4, 1907. Dressler v. Carpenter (Ark.) supra.

But it was held in Quelch v. Futch (1917) 174 N. C. 395, 93 S. E. 899, that a grantee of the plaintiff in the first action, claiming under deeds executed before the beginning of that action, was not enabled by the statute to bring a new action.

A second action brought by some of the parties plaintiff in the first action is not within the benefit of the statute. White v. Moss (1893) 92 Ga. 244, 18 S. E. 13; Thompson v. Beeler (1904) 69 Kan. 462, 77 Pac. 100.

Thus, where the first action was brought by partners, and one of them brought the second action, he was not protected by the statute. Thompson v. Beeler (Kan.) supra.

So, in White v. Moss (Ga.) supra, where the first suit in ejectment was by A and B, and the second by A alone, the court said: "No suit by two persons can be the same thing as a suit by one of them; and the law being that when an action of ejectment is brought by two persons claiming title jointly, a recovery cannot be had by either of them in severalty, it is absolutely clear that the suit in which the plaintiff is now seeking a recovery is not the same action as that in which she formerly sought to recover jointly with another person."

But in Long v. Orrell (1851) 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 123, it was held that in ejectment it is sufficient if the second action be on the single demise of one of several lessors in the former action.

In Bercy v. Lavretta (1879) 63 Ala. 374, where a bill brought by A and B was dismissed, and on appeal the decree was modified by dismissing the bill without prejudice to A to sue again, it was held that the statute did not enable (the heirs of) B to sue again, as it did not present a case of judgment rendered for the plaintiff and such judgment reversed on appeal.

The cases are not agreed as to whether the statute applies where there are additional parties plaintiff in the second suit.

In Norton v. Reed (1913) 253 Mo. 236, 161 S. W. 842, where the first suit in ejectment was by three heirs against R, the other heirs, and others, and the second suit was by four heirs against R, it was held that the case was within the benefit of the statute.

In Martin v. Young (1881) 85 N. C. 156, it was held on principle that where one partner alone brought the first action he might, under the statute, join his partners with him in the second action.

But in Mark v. Chicago, R. I. & W. R. Co. (1918) — Iowa, —, 169 N. W. 764, it was held that an action by a partnership was not within the benefit of the statute, where the former action was brought by a member of the firm.

In Crow v. State (1861) 23 Ark. 684, where judgment for the plaintiff in a suit in the name of the state for the use of A was arrested, it was held that a new suit in the name of the state for the use of A and B was not protected by the statute.

III. Defendants.

a. In general.

While it has been said that there must be an exact identity of parties defendant (Floyd v. Boyd (1914) 16 Ga. App. 43, 84 S. E. 494), the rule is not so absolute.

Thus, for example, the second suit may be brought against the administrator of the defendant in the first suit. See Biscoe v. Madden (1856) 17 Ark. 533.

Where, pending the first suit for a nuisance, the defendant corporation was merged with another and ceased to exist as a separate entity, the other company taking all of its property and assuming all of its debts and liabilities, a renewal of the suit against the company resulting from the merger, brought within six months after the grant of the nonsuit, was held to be a renewal against the original company within the meaning of the statute. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Knapp (1913) 189 Ga. 422, 77 S. E. 568.

In Coffin v. Cottle (1835) 16 Pick. (Mass.) 383, the plaintiff, having recovered a judgment against an administrator for a debt of the decedent, and an execution being returned unsatisfied, sued out a writ of scire facias suggesting waste, pending which the letters to the defendant were declared void, and new letters were granted to him, and on his plea the plaintiff's judgment was in effect decided to be void. It was held that the plaintiff might, within a year thereafter, bring a new suit against the defendant under the statute.

In ejectment the new action need not be against the same defendant. Cox v. Berry (1853) 18 Ga. 306; Long v. Orrell (1851) 35 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 123; Williams v. Council (1856) 49 N. C. (4 Jones, L.) 206 (stating the rule).

Thus, where the first suit in ejectment against A as landlord and B as tenant failed for want of proof that B was in possession, a second suit against A as landlord and C as tenant was held to be protected by the statute. Cox v. Berry (Ga.) supra.

So, where the first action was in equity for land and the second action was in ejectment against the grantee of the defendant in the first suit, it was held that the case was protected by the statute. Alexander v. Gordon (1900) 41 C. C. A. 228, 101 Fed. 91.

Sometimes the statute particularly provides that the plaintiff shall have a certain time in which to bring a new suit, where the first suit is decided against him on the ground that his action was against the wrong defendant. Norfolk & A. Terminal Co. v. Roto (1910) 103 C. C. A. 197, 179 Fed. 639.

Where the first suit was against all the makers of a note, and the second against part of them only, it was held that this was sufficient to give the plaintiff the benefit of the statute. State Bank v. Sherrill (1851) 12 Ark. 183; State Bank v. Gray (1852) 12 Ark. 760; State Bank v. Roddy (1852) 12 Ark. 766; State Bank v. Davis (1852) 12 Ark. 768; State Bank v. Henderson (1852) 12 Ark. 774; Biscoe v. Madden (1856) 17 Ark. 533; Parker v. Dobson (1908) 78 Kan. 62, 96 Pac. 472.

It was held that the statute applied where the first suit embraced the cause of action sued on in the second suit, even though it also "embraced other and distinct causes of action asserted against parties other than the defendant in the second suit." Hawkins v. Scottish Union & Nat. Ins. Co. (1915) 110 Miss. 23, 69 So. 710.

Where the first action was in tort against two defendants, and the second against one of them, the second action was held to be within the protection of the statute, but the point is not referred to by the court. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Bemis (1901) 64 Ohio St. 26, 59 N. E. 745.

Where the first suit was against various defendants occupying various parts of the land sued for, and it was severed as to A as to his part of the land, and later there was a nonsuit in regard to him, it was held that the statute applied to a new suit against A. East Tennessee Iron & Coal Co. v. Lawson (1895) — Tenn. —, 35 S. W. 456. But where, in a similar case, the new suit added other necessary defendants, it was held that the statute did not apply. East Tennessee Iron & Coal Co. v. Walton (1895) — Tenn. —, 35 S. W. 459.

— See also Norton v. Reed (1913) 253 Mo. 236, 161 S. W. 842, supra, II. d.

But on the other hand, it was held in Ford v. Clark (1885) 75 Ga. 612, that if one sues a partnership and is nonsuited, a new suit against one of the parties is not within the statute.

As a rule, where the second suit makes additional parties defendants, the statute does not apply. Gray v. Trapnall (1861) 23 Ark. 510; Larwill v. Burke (1900) 19 Ohio C. C. 449; Hughes v. Brown (1890) 88 Tenn. 578, 8 L.R.A. 480, 13 S. W. 286; East Tennessee Iron & Coal Co. v. Walton (1895) — Tenn. —, 35 S. W. 459.

And where the first suit was against A and B, and B was not served, it was held that a second suit against B was not protected by the statute. Wann v. Pattengale (1850) 14 Pa. 313; Talcott v. Rosenblum (1898) 21 Pa. Co. Ct. 494.

But where the first suit was against A, and the second against A and his partners, of whom A only was served, it was held that the statute applied. Downing v. Lindsay (1845) 2 Pa. St. 382.

The mere adding of an additional trustee as a party defendant would seem to be within the protection of the statute. Thus, where a suit instituted against an estate having more than one personal representative was abated for nonjoinder of one or more of the representatives of the estate, a new action against all of the representatives was held to be within the statute. Greenfield v. Farrell Heating & Plumbing Co. (1915) 17 Ga. App. 637, 87 S. E. 912.

IV. Miscellaneous.

It will be seen that in the reported case (COLBY v. PORTLAND, ante, 819) it is held that a new suit against the principal within one year after reversal is not within the benefit of the statute, where the first suit was against principal and agent, and there was a nonsuit against the principal, judgment against the agent, and a reversal of that judgment. It may be noted that the quotation in the opinion from the American and English Encyclopedia of Law relates to the Statute of Limitations generally, and not to the particular statute of "journeys' account."

Where the plaintiff sued three defendants, and the trial court continued the action against two and gave judgment against the third, and this judgment was reversed upon the ground that the action of the trial court amounted to a discontinuance as to all the parties, it was held that the plaintiff might bring a new action against the three defendants under the spirit (but not the letter) of the statute, providing that "if . . . judgment be given for the plaintiff, and the same be reversed," he may commence a new action within one year thereafter. Givens v. Robbins (1847) 11 Ala. 156.

Where one judgment creditor, with a judgment against one only of two or more judgment debtors, makes parties to his suit to sell the lands of his judgment debtor, such other judgment debtors and some or all of the creditors having judgments against debtors jointly, but for want of pleadings, or sufficient pleadings, against such other judgment debtors, the bill is finally dismissed as against them and their lands, but reserving to such creditors all rights, such other creditors, having acted in good faith, will, in a second suit brought by them within one year after the dismissal of the first suit, be protected by the statute, where it appears that the court and the parties to the suit, including intervening creditors, through years of litigation, and by several orders of reference and reports of commissioners, and exceptions thereto by the parties to the cause, and up until final report and decree thereon, have treated the cause as one prosecuted for and on behalf of all creditors against all such judgment debtors; but the statute will not protect "judgment or other creditors not made parties to such former suit, or who fail to appear and prove and have their judgment or other liens allowed by the commissioner against such other judgment or other lien debtors." Bent v. Read (1918) — W. Va. —, 97 S. E. 286.

Where the liability of the defendants is joint and several, with no right of contribution, as in libel, a second action against all of the defendants to the first suit, served upon some of those jointly suable, but severally liable, is within the protection of the statute. Cox v. Strickland (1904) 120 Ga. 104, 47 S. E. 912, 1 Ann. Cas. 870.

The statute does not apply in case of reversals of judgments for the defendant. Robinson v. Robinson (1848) 5 Harr. (Del.) 8.

Parties against whom a citation is asked in a special proceeding are in the position of defendants, and cannot bring a new proceeding under the statute. Re Schlesinger (1899) 36 App. Div. 77, 55 N. Y. Supp. 514.

In Cummins v. Colgin (1896) 3 Port. (Ala.) 398, where, in a chancery suit against him, the defendant, as an offset, set up a promissory note which was disallowed without prejudice, his new action on the note was held not to be within the benefit of the statute. So, in Liebke v. Thomas (1886) 24 Mo. App. 24, where, in an action which had been discontinued, the defendant had claimed a set-off, it was held that he could not bring a new action on the claim which he had tried to set off, and have the protection of the statute. But on the other hand, in Hunt v. Spalding (1836) 18 Pick. (Mass.) 521, it was held that the defendant, who in the first action had claimed a set-off, was within the protection of the statute in bringing an action on the claim which he had tried to set off, as the general Statute of Limitations provided in substance that the filing of a set-off should be in effect the same as the commencement of an action. And in Hevener v. Hannah (1906) 59 W. Va. 476, 53 S. E. 635, where an equity suit was brought by executors against A for an adjudication as to the validity of his demand against them, and he answered, setting up his demand, and the answer was treated as a cross bill and dismissed, it was held that A might bring a new suit on his demand within a year under the statute.

(It was held in Parsons v. Crabb (1873) 34 U. C. Q. B. 136, that the plaintiff by discontinuing where there had been a set-off, and by bringing a new action, could not escape a new plea of set-off, on the ground that it was barred by the statute when the second suit was brought.) B. B. B.

Will — revocation — writing upon face.

1. Merely writing upon the paper upon which a will is drawn of the words, "This is no good," which do not cross the words of the will, but merely touch the words, "Signed and sealed," in the attestation clause, does not effect a revocation where the statute provides that no will shall be revoked otherwise than by burning, canceling, tearing, or obliterating the same, or by a new will properly executed.

Definition — cancelation.

2. Cancelation of an instrument is a blotting out or striking out, and a will cannot be canceled by writing upon the blank spaces on the paper on which the will is written.

APPEAL by Henrietta H. Guinness from a decree of the Circuit Court for Cook County sustaining the will of Lavinus B. Willden, deceased, in a suit to contest said will. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Frederick Sass for appellant.
Mr. Jonas O. Hoover for appellee Gilliland.

Stone, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by Henrietta H. Guinness from the decree of the circuit court of Cook county, sustaining the will of Lavinus B. Willden after a hearing before a jury upon bill filed by contestants to contest said will on the ground that it had been revoked by the testator.

The testator, Lavinus B. Willden, executed the will in question August 24, 1894, by which he devised and bequeathed all of his property to his sister, Ella E. M. Gilliland, and his half-brother, Lewis C. E. Lateer, share and share alike, and provided that Lateer should be the executor thereof. Some time thereafter there was written on the back of the will, which consisted of a single sheet of paper: "All I have I want to go to my sister, Miss Ella Willden." This notation is not dated. There also appears on the back of the will the following notation: "This is no good; will try to make another.—December 10, 1906." No signature of the testator appears in connection with either of the foregoing notations. There also appears on the face of the instrument, between the date and the attestation clause, the following: "Not any good.—December 11, 1907;" and, between the date and the original signature, "Changed my mind." No signature of the testator appears in connection with these notations. Uncontradicted extraneous evidence, over objections of appellees, was introduced at the trial to the effect that all of said notations were in the handwriting of the deceased. The words and figures, "December 11, 1907," are so indorsed that the "1" in units order in the number "11" is tangent to the letter "S" in the word "Signed," and the "9" in hundreds order in the number "1907" is tangent to the letter "d" in the word "Signed," and the "7" in units order in the number "1907" intersects one line in the letter "s" in the word "sealed;" both words, "Signed" and "sealed," being a part of the attestation clause. None of the letters or words of the will or attestation clause were marked out, crossed out, obliterated, or written across by the said notation.

The evidence is conflicting as to the time and the place in which the will was found. Immediately after the death of the testator a search began for his will. At the time of his death he was constructing and had practically completed a small cottage or dwelling house. During the construction of this cottage he occupied a portion of a barn on the premises for sleeping purposes and a place in which to keep his linen and other personal effect. A brief search at this place was made, but no will was found. A search was then made in a safety deposit box at the bank, rented by the testator, but no will was contained therein. Erastus M. Willden, administrator with will annexed (one of the appellees herein), continued the search, and eventually found the will, inclosed in an envelop, in the trunk of the testator in this room in the barn. The testimony is conflicting as to when he found the will. At the time he found it the envelop which contained the will was open at one end. There were letters of little importance and some other papers in this trunk. There is some testimony to the effect that an abstract was among the papers found in the trunk with the will. Erastus M. Willden delivered the envelop and the will to the attorney for the appellee Ella E. M. Gilliland, upon whose petition it was admitted to probate on April 29, 1914. • The executor named in the will, Lewis C. E. Lateer, renounced, and Erastus M. Willden was appointed administrator with the will annexed.

The testimony tends to prove that the deceased and his sister, Ella E. M. Gilliland, thought a great deal of each other, and until her marriage they occupied the same home, and that he on several occasions expressed himself to the effect that he wanted all his property to go to this sister. He died June 17, 1911, leaving him surviving his brother, Erastus M. Willden, his sisters, Ella E. M. Gilliland, Henrietta H. Guinness, and Evaline V. Dowling, his niece, Ruth E. Willden, and his half-brother, Lewis C. E. Lateer, his only heirs at law. He died seised in fee simple of certain real estate in Cook county.

The principal question involved in this case is whether or not there was a cancellation of the will. The record shows that there appeared on the face of the will this notation: "Not any good; changed my mind. —December 11, 1907." There was evidence in the record to the effect that this was in the handwriting of the testator, and it is contended on the part of the appellant that this shows an intent to revoke and cancel the will, and that it also shows actual cancellation of the same; that it is a cancellation, irrespective of any crossing of lines of the words of the will; and that, if the crossing of lines is necessary to cancellation, the slightest crossing is sufficient. Appellees contend that even though the notations were in the handwriting of the testator and show an intention on his part to cancel and revoke the will, yet such acts were not sufficient to constitute a revocation by cancellation.

Section 17 of the statute in relation to wills in this state is as follows: "No will, testament or codicil shall be revoked, otherwise than by burning, canceling, tearing or obliterating the same, by the testator himself, or in his presence, by his direction and consent, or by some other will, testament or codicil in writing, declaring the same, signed by the testator or testatrix, in the presence of two or more witnesses, and by them attested in his or her presence; and no words spoken shall revoke or annul any will, testament or codicil in writing, executed as aforesaid, in due form of law."

The statute thus provides for the revocation of wills by burning, canceling, tearing, or obliterating, or by certain words which shall be written in the form of a new will, which, if written upon the instrument, must be signed by the testator in the presence of two or more witnesses, and by them attested in his presence. It further provides that no will shall be revoked in any other way, and that no words spoken shall constitute a revocation or annulment of any will, or testament, or codicil. Does the writing of said words on the face of the will in the manner referred to constitute a cancellation of the will? As we have seen, there was no striking out of any of the words of the will by the notation in question, and only in the instances cited does the notation touch any of the words of the will. The Standard Dictionary defines "cancel" as follows: "To mark out or cut off, as by the drawing of some letters across to signify that it is to be omitted; to blot or strike out, as to cancel figures or writing."

Cancellation has been also defined as the act of crossing out a writing. 6 Cyc. 281. Cancellation of an instrument, by most approved lexicographers, is defined to be a blotting out or striking out, and has to do, necessarily, with the writing on the instrument. It could not be said that a will is canceled in the slightest degree by reason of marks or scratches made upon blank places on the will. In order to effect a cancellation there must be an erasure, blotting, or striking out of some portion of the will itself. 1 Redf. Wills, 4th ed. 138. A writing upon the face of the will which does not appear to be written across the language of the will merely amounts to an unattested instrument or revocation, and is inoperative. Gardner, Wills, 259.

Re Akers, 74 App. Div. 461, 77 N. Y. Supp. 643, was a case similar in point of fact to the case at bar. In that case the testator appeared to have written on the blank marginal space on the first page of the will the words, "This will and codicil is revoked.—Jany. 14/96," and under this line was the signature of the testator, "Fredk. Akers." It appeared that none of the words or the signature was written across the writing of the will, nor did they come in contact with said writing, except that a small portion of some of the letters in the word "Fredk." crossed over the lower extremities of some of the letters on the third line. The words were not, however, obliterated. In that case the court found that the testator had evidently sought to revoke his will by writing, but as he had done no act except to express his intention upon the margin of the paper upon which the will was written, it was held that such act did not amount to a revocation of the will in writing, and that there could be no such thing as a cancelation of an instrument, either as a physical fact or in legal effect, unless the instrument itself is in some form defaced or obliterated.

But appellant relies upon the case of Warner v. Warner, 37 Vt. 356. In that case the will was written on a sheet of foolscap paper, covering the first page and about one third of the second page. On the last half of the second page was written: "This will is hereby canceled and annulled in full this 15th day of March, in the year 1859." Signed, "I. Warner." The court in that case held that such amounted to a cancelation. We do not adopt the view of the Vermont court in relation to the cancelation of wills, but hold it to be the rule that in order to constitute a revocation by cancelation such cancelation must be a blotting, or striking out, or writing over said will or an essential portion thereof, and must be made with intent to revoke the will.

The great weight of authority is to the effect that the mere writing upon a will which does not in any wise physically obliterate or cancel the same is insufficient to work a destruction of a will by cancelation, even though the writing may express an intention to revoke and cancel. This appears to be the better rule. To hold otherwise would be to give to words written in pencil, and not attested to by witnesses nor executed in the manner provided by the statute, the same effect as though they had been so attested. Where such notation does not in any way obliterate the writing of the will it cannot be said to cancel, and therefore such notation could only be held effective as a revocation of the will as a writing. As this notation is unsigned and unattested it does not comply with the statute in relation to the signing and attesting of a revocation of a will, as set out in said § 17 of the act relating to wills. We are of the view, therefore, that the testator did not effectually cancel his will, and that there was no revocation of it in writing, as required by the statute.

There are objections offered as to the admissibility of testimony, but we find no reversible error therein. Likewise the instructions given by the court and objected to by appellant, as well as those offered and refused by the court, appear to have been a fair presentation of the theories of appellant and appellees as to the law. The circuit court in its instructions to the jury adopted the theory of the appellees, which, as we have seen, was the correct one.

There being no reversible error in the record, the decree of the Circuit Court will be affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Revocation of will by writing not testamentary in character.

- I. Introductory, 833.
- II. Intent of testator, 833.
- III. Statutory requisites:
  - 1. In general, 834.
  - 2. Ordinary form of statute:
    - a. In general, 835.
    - b. Writing separate from will, 836.

I. Introductory.

The present note is confined, as indicated in the title, to a discussion of writings not testamentary in character as revocations of wills. For the purpose of the discussion, writings testamentary in character are treated as including all writings intended as testamentary dispositions of property, whether or not the same were effectual for that purpose. Accordingly, cases passing upon the question whether a testamentary disposition which fails for some reason can be treated as a writing, for the purpose of revoking the instrument, have been excluded. In other words, the discussion is confined to such writings as were intended solely as revoking instruments, or were urged to be such.

When it is alleged that a will duly executed has been revoked, two questions are raised: (a) Did the testator intend to revoke it? (b) did he comply with the statutory requisites prescribed for the revocation of wills? These questions will be discussed in the above order.

It is essential to the revocation of a will that the testator intended to revoke it. Not all writings that have been urged as a revocation have evidenced a clear intent to revoke the will. A letter written by the testator to his wife, who was the chief beneficiary of his will, advising and recommending certain dispositions of the property, was held not to be a revocation of any of the devises in the will, in Thruston v. Prather (1904) 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1137, 77 S. W. 354. A will is not revoked by an interlineation by the testator after its execution, stating that "this includes all insurance policies which are or may be upon my life," which is signed by the testator. Re Ballard (1916) — Okla. —, 155 Pac. 894. A letter sent to an attorney, directing the destruction or cancelation of a will, does not amount to a revocation unless the cancelation or destruction is carried into effect, where the testator did not intend by the letter an immediate exercise of his right to revoke his will by an instrument in writing executed in the same manner necessary for publishing a new will. Tynan v. Paschal (1863) 27 Tex. 287, 84 Am. Dec. 619. A power of attorney executed by the testator to his wife is a matter of no consequence, and can in no sense be given effect as a revocation of a prior duly executed will. Re Kilborn (1907) 5 Cal. App. 161, 89 Pac. 985.

An indorsement, without date, in the testator's handwriting, upon the blank leaf of a sheet upon which the will is written, in the following words: "This will is intended to be altered, and will be,—time is given. W.," is not a revocation of the will. Ray v. Walton (1819) 2 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 71. The court argues that the words, "this will," import, "not an extinction, but a recognition of it as a will; and the subsequent words, 'is intended to be altered,' that it is to remain in the character in which it is recognized by the words preceding, viz., as a will, until the alteration is made; and this import is strengthened by the words which follow, viz., 'and will be, time is given.' The fair import of the sentence is, we think, that the testator contemplated, not a revocation, but an alteration of some of the provisions of this will, but intended that it should be considered his will until he should alter it."

In Griffin v. Griffin (1790) 4 Ves. Jr. 197, note, 81 Eng. Reprint, 107, note, a paper begun by the testator several days before his death,—days in which he was capable of business,—was held not to be a revocation of his will. It does not appear in the report of this case what the contents of the paper were; the court states that the presumption of law is that he never meant to finish the paper, or that it was intended only as a draft for consideration.

It does not appear in Durance's Goods (1872) L. R. 2 Prob. & Div. (Eng.) 406, 41 L. J. Prob. N. S. 60, 26 L. T. N. S. 983, 20 Week. Rep. 759, infra, whether the person to whom the testator wrote actually destroyed the will. In that case, the letter, directing the brother to "get my will from Mr. Denman, which please burn as soon as you receive, without reading it," was held to be a revocation of the will.

See the writing involved in Brown v. Thorndike (1834) 15 Pick. (Mass.) 388, which is held to be an actual instrument of present revocation, by which the will was legally revoked, and not a mere declaration of an intent to revoke by some future act.

The intent to revoke may be dependent upon the belief that another will has been executed, in which event, in case the subsequent will fails, there has been held to be no revocation. Strong's Appeal (1906) 79 Conn. 123, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1107, 118 Am. St. Rep. 138, 63 Atl. 1089. In this case the revocation of a will was held not to be effected by tearing it and writing upon it, "Superseded by the written one," where the written one was ineffectual because not properly executed, and it was plain that the revocation proceeded upon the presumption that the written one was valid.

III. Statutory requisites.

I. In general.

If the writing does evidence an intent to revoke the will, the question then arises whether it is a compliance with the statutory requisites. At common law, any act or declaration of the testator which evidenced an intent to revoke a will was effectual for that purpose. Clark v. Eborn (1813) 6 N. C. (2 Murph.) 234; Billington v. Jones (1901) 108 Tenn. 234, 56 L.R.A. 654, 91 Am. St. Rep. 751, 66 S. W. 1127. Even a parol declaration was held sufficient. Card v. Grinman (1823) 5 Conn. 164; Burton v. Gowell (1592) Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 306, 78 Eng. Reprint, 557. But this note does not deal with methods other than writing, hence revocation by oral declarations have, in general, been excluded.

An unsigned writing was held sufficient in Clark v. Eborn (N. C.) supra. In Billington v. Jones (1901) 108 Tenn. 234, 56 L.R.A. 654, 91 Am. St. Rep. 751, 66 S. W. 1127, a will was held revoked by writing upon it in pencil, and signing a declaration to the effect that "this will is null and void," and stating to witnesses that it is killed, and filing it away where it remains for a number of years until the testator's death, without referring to it more than once, and then merely by stating that testator would never have any peace about it.

The statute governing the decision in Witter v. Mott (1816) 2 Conn. 67, is not set out. A will was there held revoked by a declaration written and subscribed by the testator on the back of his will, "This will is invalid." To the above statement the testator had added a reason for declaring the will invalid, but the court states that the reason which the testator had given could not change the nature of the act; that where the words are plain and unequivocal, there is no room for construction or conjecture as to the intent, on the question of statutory compliance. It is stated not to be necessary "that the revocation of a will should be attested by three witnesses. It is sufficient to be in writing; and then it may be proved like any other instrument." In Card v. Grinman (Conn.) supra, holding that a will may be revoked by an oral declaration of the testator that it is not his will, and an order that it be destroyed, although the devisees named therein took it out of his possession, and induced him to believe that they had destroyed it, but fraudulently preserved it, the court, referring to the statement in Witter v. Mott (Conn.) supra, to the effect that it is sufficient for a revocation to be in writing, states that the expression as to writing must have been the individual opinion of the judge, as between a writing unwitnessed and unsealed, and a declaration proved by parol, there is no essential difference, neither of them being specialties, but both evidences precisely of the same grade.

It seems that the statute governing the case of Brown v. Thorndike (1834) 15 Pick. (Mass.) 388, required no attestation for the revocation of a will of personal property. In this case words written on the will, immediately under the attestation, to the effect that "it is my intention at some future time to alter the tenor of the above will; or rather to make another will; therefore, be it known, if I should die before another will is made, I desire that the foregoing be considered as revoked and of no effect," signed by the testator, were held to be a revocation of the will.

A will was held to be revoked in Walcott v. Ochterlony (1837) 1 Curt. Eccl. Rep. (Eng.) 580, where a letter was written for a testatrix to a relative, asking him to write the custodian of the will, "and request him to destroy" it; that she "wishes it might be destroyed without delay," and where shortly thereafter a letter was written for the testatrix directly to the custodian, mentioning the previous letter to the relative, and stating that the writer was desired to ask the relative "to write, and request you to destroy" the will, whereupon the custodian indorsed on the envelop of the will, "This will to be destroyed as per Mrs. Boyle's letter to Captain Walcott and J. George," and sent the will to the testatrix, who died before its arrival, in the intention to revoke the will and in the belief that it was revoked. The theory of the court is not altogether clear. After stating that the Statute of Frauds provides that no will in writing of personal estate shall be repealed, nor any clause or bequest therein altered or changed by any words, the court asks the question, Is this a revocation by words? In answering this, the court states: "I apprehend not; the deceased did not say, 'I revoke my will,' but in effect says, 'Mr. George is in possession of my will; I am not able to destroy it myself, but I desire that he will destroy it,' and this amounted to a present intention absolutely to revoke, which was written down at the time, approved of by the deceased, and by her direction communicated to the person in whose custody the will was. It was an absolute direction to revoke, reduced to writing in the deceased's lifetime. There is nothing in the Statute of Frauds which prevents such revocation having effect, and it is clear that, prior to that statute, a will might be so revoked."

a. In general.

Three ways are provided in the most usual form of statute for the revocation of a will, viz.: (1) A subsequent will or codicil; (2) a writing executed with the formalities essential to the execution of a will; and (3) by burning, tearing, or canceling the will with intent to revoke the same. The language used in the provision as to the third method varies in different jurisdictions. The English Wills Act (§ 20) and the Ontario Act (Wills Act of Ontario, Rev. Stat. [Ont.] 1897, chap. 128, § 22) provide that "no will or codicil, or any part thereof, shall be revoked otherwise than as aforesaid, or by another will or codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, or by some item declaring an intention to revoke the same, and executed in the manner in which a will is hereinbefore required to be executed, or by the burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying the same, by the testator, or by some person in his presence, and by his direction with the intention of revoking the same." The words, "otherwise than as aforesaid," in the first part of the above statute, refer to revocation by marriage or change of circumstances. Revocation by canceling is absent from this provision. The variations in the statute emphasize the necessity of consulting the contemporary statute in the jurisdiction in which the question arises.

With the first of the above methods of revocation, that is, by subsequent will or codicil, this note has nothing to do; as above stated, the note is confined to writings not testamentary.

The writings which have been urged as revoking instruments have been divided, for the purpose of this discussion, into two classes, viz.: (a) Writings separate and apart from the will, and (b) writings upon the will.

It is clear under the above statute, and it has been so held, that if there is a separate writing, showing an intention to revoke the will, which does comply with the necessary formalities, the will is revoked. Seymour's Succession (1896) 48 La. Ann. 993, 20 So. 217; Bayley v. Bailey (1849) 5 Cush. (Mass.) 245; Re Backus (1900) 49 App. Div. 410, 63 N. Y. Supp. 544; Chestnut v. Capey (1915) 45 Okla. 754, 146 Pac. 589; Eyre's Goods [1905] 2 Ir. R. 540.

Thus, it may be revoked in a deed of trust which contains express words of revocation. See Re Backus (1900) 49 App. Div. 410, 63 N. Y. Supp. 544. A will was held revoked in Eyre's Goods (Ir.) supra, by a letter directed to a daughter of the testatrix, stating: "My will is to be destroyed, and your father's kept safe," signed by the testatrix, and properly witnessed.

See Bayley v. Bailey (1849) 5 Cush. (Mass.) 245, infra.

If the writing does not comply with the statute it does not revoke the will. Thus, a separate paper declaring a revocation of the testator's will, signed by him, but not attested as required by statute, does not revoke the will. Nelson v. Public Administrator (1852) 2 Bradf. (N. Y.) 210.

In the execution of a separate writing, it is not necessary to declare it to be a last will and testament, although this is one of the formalities required by statute in the execution of wills. Bayley v. Bailey (Mass.) and Re Backus (N. Y.) supra. The court in Re Backus (N. Y.) supra, dealing with a revocation in a deed of trust, says that "the statute permitting a revocation of a will by 'some other writing,' and requiring that it should be executed with the same formality as a will, is not to be construed as meaning that the other writing, which is not a will, should erroneously be characterized as such by the person executing it. In other words, it would be an unreasonable construction to give the statute, to hold that every literal and verbal expression required in the publication of a will should be applied to other paper writings, when it is evident that such language, when so used, would be an untrue statement, and not applicable or germane as indicative of the character of such other writing. . . . What is evidently meant by the statute is that the formality required in the making of a will shall be applied to a paper of revocation, so far as the latter, from its nature and character, is susceptible of having the same formality observed."

Under a statute authorizing the revocation of a will by a writing executed with the formality necessary for the execution of a will, it is not essential to a valid revocation that there be an affirmative disposition of property in the writing; a writing merely revoking the will is sufficient. Seymour's Succession (1896) 48 La. Ann. 993, 20 So. 217.

A separate writing need not be probated. Rudy v. Ulrich (1871) 69 Pa. 177, 8 Am. Rep. 238 (obiter). In fact it has been held not to be entitled to probate. Fraser's Goods (1869) L. R. 2 Prob. & Div. (Eng.) 40, 39 L. J. Prob. N. S. 20, 21 L. T. N. S. 680, 18 Week. Rep. 263. But there is some uncertainty about the probate of such writings. In Hicks's Goods (1869) L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. (Eng.) 683, 38 L. J. Prob. N. S. 65, 21 L. T. N. S. 300, letters of administration were issued with the revoking writing annexed, by the same judge who decided Fraser's Goods (Eng.) supra. In Fraser's Goods the judge states that, in the case of Hicks's Goods, the writing did, "perhaps, do something more than merely revoke the will, while in this case it stops at a revocation." In Durance's Goods (1872) L. R. 2 Prob. & Div. (Eng.) 406; 41 L. J. Prob. N. S. 60, 26 L. T. N. S. 983, 20 Week. Rep. 759, a letter addressed to the testator's mother, and witnessed as required by law for a writing revoking a will, was held to be a revocation of the will, and also to be of a testamentary character, so that administration with the letter annexed was granted. In Toomer v. Sobinska [1907] L. R. P. (Eng.) 106, 76 L. J. Prob. N. S. 19, 96 L. T. N. S. 475, a grant of letters of administration was directed to go as upon intestacy, without annexing the paper revoking the will, but with the note that the grant was made in consequence of the execution of the revoking instrument. Administration was granted in Hubbard's Goods (1865) L. R. 1 Prob. & Div. (Eng.) 53, 35 L. J. Prob. N. S. 27, with a codicil annexed which purported to revoke previous wills. In this case, so far as appeared, there was no previous will to revoke.

A letter by a resident of Massachusetts while in the state of New York, directed to the custodian of his will, stating: "It is my wish that the will that I made be destroyed and my estate settled according to law," signed by the testator, and witnessed according to the law of New York relating to the execution of wills, so as to entitle it to probate in that state, was held to be a testamentary writing and entitled to probate in Massachusetts, where it operated as a revocation of the testator's will. Bayley v. Bailey (1849) 5 Cush. (Mass.) 245.

c. Writing on will.

1. In general.

It is clear that under the above statute a writing, even though it be on the will itself, which is not executed with the formalities requisite for the execution of wills, cannot revoke a valid will under the second method. This is conceded rather than decided in many cases. Howard v. Hunter (1902) 115 Ga. 357, 90 Am. St. Rep. 121, 41 S. E. 638; Oetjen v. Oetjen (1902) 115 Ga. 1004, 42 S. E. 387. A statement to the effect that such a writing cannot revoke the will sometimes appears. Opinion of surrogate in De lafield v. Parish (1857) 1 Redf. (N. Y.) 1, decision of surrogate affirmed by the supreme court in (1858) 42 Barb. 274, and by the court of appeals in (1862) 25 N. Y. 9. And in other cases this provision of the statute is stated to be mandatory. Re Akers (1902) 74 App. Div. 461, 77 N. Y. Supp. 643, affirmed in (1903) 173 N. Y. 620, 66 N. E. 1108.

Accordingly, it is held that a writing by the testator on the will, to the effect that it is "canceled," or is "void," or is "revoked," or is "obsolete," which is not executed with the formalities necessary for the execution of a will, does not, as a writing, revoke the will. Howard v. Hunter (Ga.) supra (writing across back of paper, and signing, the words: "This will is made void by one of more recent date"); Oetjen v. Oetjen (Ga.) supra (entry upon the last page of a will, and signing, of the words: "This my will and testament is of no avail and null and void"); Re Akers (N. Y.) supra; Re Miller (1906) 50 Misc. 70, 100 N. Y. Supp. 344; Re Barnes (1912) 76 Misc. 382, 136 N. Y. Supp. 940; Re Hildenbrand (1914) 87 Misc. 471, 150 N. Y. Supp. 1067; Lewis v. Lewis (1841) 2 Watts & S. (Pa.) 455 ("obsolete" on the margin of the first page); Warner v. Warner (1864) 37 Vt. 356; Brewster's Goods (1859) 6 Jur. N. S. (Eng.) 56, 29 L. J. Prob. N. S. 69; Fischer v. Popham (1875) L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. (Eng.) 246, 38 L. T. N. S. 281, 28 Week. Rep. 683; Adamson's Goods (1875) L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. (Eng.) 253; Re Mulholland (1915) 34 Ont. L. Rep. 242, 24 D. L. R. 785. See De lafield v. Parish (N. Y.) supra.

See Gosling's Goods (1886) L. R. 11 Prob. Div. (Eng.) 79, 55 L. J. Prob. N. S. 27, 34 Week. Rep. 492, 50 J. P. 263, infra.

In Re Akers (N. Y.) supra, there appeared upon a will, written upon legal cap paper to the left of the usual marginal line, words in the handwriting of the testator to the effect that "this will and codicil is revoked, Jany. 14/96," and under this line was the signature of the testator. None of the words of this sentence and signature was written across, nor did they come in contact with any of the writing of the will, except that a small portion of the lower extremity of some of the letters in the signature crossed three of the lower extremities of the letters on three lines; the words and letters, however, were perfect in themselves and not in the slightest degree obliterated; there appeared two pages on which a codicil had been written, and on the left-hand margin of the second page of what purported to be the codicil, but in no wise crossing or canceling the writing thereon, appeared the following: "This codicil and will is revoked. Jany. 14/96," and this was signed by the testator. On the back of the first page of what purported to be a codicil were written the words, "Revoked, Jany. 14, 1896," and this was signed by the testator. This writing was held not to be a compliance with the statute, and therefore not a revocation of the will. In Re Hildenbrand (1914) 87 Misc. 471, 150 N. Y. Supp. 1067, the drawing of diagonal lines across a paragraph in a will, and writing the word "canceled" upon it in ink, are held not to amount to a revocation of this paragraph in writing within the meaning of such a provision in a statute. Drawing a pen through the various letters in his signature by a testator, and writing below the signature, "I hereby revoke this will, made by me, May 28th, 1885," and dating and initialing the same, which writing was witnessed by the testator's wife, do not constitute a writing executed in accordance with the Ontario Statute of Wills, and therefore cannot revoke the will. Re Mulholland (1915) 34 Ont. L. Rep. 242, 24 D. L. R. 785.

A writing upon the will itself, declaring that clauses of the will relating to a specified beneficiary should cease and be void, which writing was signed by witnesses, but not by the testator, has been held ineffectual as a revocation. Hilton v. King (1682) 3 Lev. (Eng.) 86.

Some cases have considered only in a general way whether the writing effected a revocation, and not with reference to specific provisions of the statute. In Brewster's Goods (1859) 6 Jur. N. S. (Eng.) 56, there was held to be no sufficient act in law to effect a revocation where the testator wrote the words, "Canceled—Wm. B.," across each signature to the will, and, below the names of the attesting witnesses, had written the words: "Mem.—I hereby declare this will revoked, and altogether canceled, the bequest and other arrangements being rendered nugatory by the sale of my property. . . . I intend to make another will, whereupon I shall destroy this. Wm. Brewster." In Fischer v. Popham (1875) L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. (Eng.) 246, 33 L. T. N. S. 231, 23 Week. Rep. 683, a will and codicil were held not revoked where it appeared that the signature of the testatrix at the foot of the first, third, and last sheets of the will had been struck through with a pen, and a memorandum in her handwriting added on the last sheet, to the effect that "I, Elizabeth Hogg, declare this will to be null and void. Clewer Hill House, May 28, 1873," and the signature of the testatrix at the end of each sheet of the codicil had been crossed out, and a memorandum written under the last, to the effect that "this will is null and void. Elizabeth Hogg," neither memorandum being attested. A will as originally written was admitted to probate in Adamson's Goods (1875) L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. (Eng.) 253, although some passages had been struck through with a pen, and opposite to these was written, "Canceled. J. A." words which had also been written opposite to another passage, which was not struck through.

But in Gosling's Goods (1886) L. R. 11 Prob. Div. (Eng.) 79, where the testator had obliterated by means of thick black ink marks the whole of the first codicil to his will, including his own signature and the subscriptions of the attesting witnesses, and had written at the foot of the obliterated codicil the following words: "We are witnesses to the erasure of the above, October 10, 1881," this writing being signed by two witnesses, and the signature of the testator appearing in conjunction therewith. The court, in holding that the codicil was revoked upon a motion on behalf of the executors to declare that the words were a writing declaring an intention to revoke, within § 20 of the Wills Act, states: "The intention of the testator is so manifest, and the writing, though it does not come up quite to the letter of the statute, is so clearly within its intention that I grant the application and exclude the first codicil from probate."

2. As a cancelation.

In many of the cases in which there was a writing upon the will itself of some word or words indicating an intent to revoke the will, it has been urged that this amounts to a cancelation within the meaning of the statute providing for this method of revocation, and therefore revokes the will, although the writing is not executed with the necessary formalities for the execution of wills. As subsequently appears, a majority of courts deny this contention. It is held that a revocation by cancelation cannot result, even though there is an intent to revoke, unless some material portion of the will is obliterated or canceled. Howard v. Hunter (1902) 115 Ga. 357, 90 Am. St. Rep. 121, 41 S. E. 638; Oetjen v. Oetjen (1902) 115 Ga. 1004, 42 S. E. 387. Again, it has been stated that there can be no such thing as the cancelation of an instrument, either as a physical fact or as a legal inference, unless the instrument itself is in some form defaced or obliterated. This court continues: "A mere writing upon a will, which does not in any wise physically obliterate or cancel the same, is insufficient to work a destruction of the will by cancelation, even though the writing may express an intention to revoke and cancel." Re Akers (1902) 74 App. Div. 461, 77 N. Y. Supp. 643, affirmed in (1903) 173 N. Y. 620, 66 N. E. 1103. And see DOWLING v. GILLILAND (reported herewith) ante, 829.

Accordingly, a writing upon the will of words to the effect that the will is "revoked," or "made void," or is "obsolete," in such a way that there is no obliterating or canceling or destroying of any words of the will itself, is held not to be a canceling and therefore not to be a revocation. Howard v. Hunter (Ga.) supra (the words: "This will is made void by one of more recent date," were written on the back of the will as folded and signed by testator); DOWLING v. GILLILAND (reported herewith); Re Akers (N. Y.) (see supra for facts); Re Miller (1906) 50 Misc. 70, 100 N. Y. Supp. 344 (holding a statement signed by testator, indorsed on the back of a will, to the effect that it is revoked, not a cancelation); Lewis v. Lewis (1841) 2 Watts & S. (Pa.) 455 (testator wrote word "obsolete" on margin of first page). But see Evans's Appeal (Pa.) infra; Ladd's Will (1884) 60 Wis. 187, 50 Am. Rep. 355, 18 N. W. 734, where testatrix, whose will was written on the first page of a double sheet of paper, wrote and signed on the fourth or outside page, the words, "I revoke this will."

It is stated, obiter, in Re Shelton (1906) 143 N. C. 218, 55 S. E. 705, 10 Ann. Cas. 531, to be clear that the words, "This will I this day make void and of no effect," dated, signed, and written in ink on the margin of the will, do not revoke the same by canceling, tearing, or obliterating it; but it was found as a matter of fact, in this case, that the writing alleged was not made by the testator.

In some cases the words were written across words in the will, and then the question has been held to be whether the words so written across were material.

There was held to be no cancelation of a material portion of a will, by writing across a word in a sentence in the last line of the will, which stated merely that a word in the will had been changed before signing, the words, "This my will and testament is of no avail, and null and void," even if the mere writing across a word in a will, leaving the same perfectly legible, can be said to be an obliteration or cancelation within the meaning of the statute. Oefjen v. Oefjen (Ga.) supra.

See Re Akers (N. Y.) supra, and DOWLING v. GILLILAND (reported herewith) ante, 829.

But if the words indicating an intent to revoke the will are written upon the writing which composes the will in such a manner that many words of the will are crossed there is a cancellation. Re Barnes (1912) 76 Misc. 382, 136 N. Y. Supp. 940. In this case there were written with red pencil upon the face of the will the words, "Null and void," which were signed by the testator and dated. None of the words in red pencil extended to the margin of the page, but every sentence of the will which contained any disposition of property was in some part intersected by the legend of revocation, except that the new writing did not reach the words with which the first sentence closed, viz., "revoking all former wills by me at any time made." The signature upon the original writing was touched by a part of the signature to the revoking phrase. In holding that this amounted to a cancellation, the court states that the "marks intersecting the face of the will are such in extent and material that they would undoubtedly be regarded as an act of cancellation, if they did not take the form of written words, and the intent of revocation should appear. Have they any less or other significance if they are found to assume a legible character? . . . The only office which lines upon the face of a will need fulfil, in order to invoke the warrant of the statute quoted supra, is that they shall be a manual indication by the testator of the mental conception that he intends to annul his will. Their form and extent or other essence are all totally unimportant, so long as they are a physical token of the inward intent. If the marks, in the light of all surroundings, symbolize this purpose, their mission is performed, whether they be plain or fantastic, mechanical or verbally intelligible. Though traced in the form of letters, the lines in this case were drawn across the will with the statutory intent that it should thereby become null and void."

In Re Wellborn (1914) 165 N. C. 636, 81 S. E. 1023, there seems to have been no question but that the words, "Canceled by Isaac C. Wellborn," in the handwriting of the deceased across the will, amounted to a cancellation, at least of the part over which it was written, the question being whether it did not amount to a cancellation of the entire instrument. The same words were written on two parts of the will. The latter place at which they appeared contained the clause designating the executors and including the date. There was also a tear, indicating an intention to revoke, in this case.

Interlineations and erasures, made in a will by direction of the testator with the purpose of revoking it, were held to amount to a canceling or obliterating of the will, sufficient to carry out the intention of the testator, in Bohanon v. Walcot (1836) 1 How. (Miss.) 336, 29 Am. Dec. 631.

As shown above, the Ontario Wills Act does not provide for revocation by cancellation, but does provide for revocation by "burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying the same." The acts done by the testator in Re Mulholland (1915) 34 Ont. L. Rep. 242, 24 D. L. R. 785, supra, were held not to amount to a revocation within the meaning of the words, "otherwise destroying the same," as used in the act.

The foregoing cases require that some part of the written words making up the will be defaced or obliterated. A contrary view has been taken, and it is held in Pennsylvania and Vermont that it is a cancellation within the meaning of the statute, for a testator to write, "canceled," or "canceled and annulled," or words of similar import in such a position as to become an inseparable part of the instrument, although none of the writing of the will is touched thereby. Evans's Appeal (1868) 58 Pa. 238; Warner v. Warner (1864) 37 Vt. 356.

Not all the cases adhering to the above theory, that the writing of such words upon the will in such a way as not to deface or obliterate the writing does not constitute a cancelation within the meaning of the statute, involved facts which would bring them within the rule of the Pennsylvania and Vermont cases. This is true of the case of Ladd's Will (Wis.) supra, but the Wisconsin court expressly disapproves of the theory of Evans's Appeal and Warner v. Warner.

As stated, the writing involved in the Pennsylvania and Vermont cases was upon such parts of the will as to be inseparable from it, and this is a condition of such writing being a cancelation, according to both courts. Both the supreme court of Vermont and that of Pennsylvania distinguished the cases at bar from that of Lewis v. Lewis (1841) 2 Watts & S. (Pa.) 455, by saying that, in the Lewis Case, the word "obsolete" was so placed upon the paper that it might be separated and leave the written part of the will entire and intact, while, in the Warner Case, the supreme court of Vermont states that the act of the testator was done not only upon the paper on which the will was written, but upon such a part of it as always to go with that part of the will which contained the disposition of the property,—not indeed on the face, but on the back of such disposition.

The facts in the Pennsylvania case detract somewhat from that case as authority for the rule announced therein. The will there involved was signed twice by the testator, once in the ordinary position, and once after a provision added to the will. There was also a codicil signed by the testator. In canceling the will the testator tore the will in a number of places, drew a line through the last of his signatures to the will proper, also drew a line through his signature to the codicil, and wrote the word "Canceled" immediately under this signature, drew a line through the word "will," indorsed on the instrument, and wrote the word "Canceled" under this word. The court considers the case without reference to any act of tearing, and alone with reference to the effect of writing the word "Canceled" under the word "will," which had been indorsed upon the instrument, and through which the testator had drawn a line when he had written the same word "Canceled" under a codicil to the will, and had drawn a line through his signature thereto, and also had drawn a line through the last of two signatures to the will. As just stated, the court considers the question of revocation without reference to any act of tearing, and, after referring to the facts as above stated, adds, "Was this cancelation? Were the question presented to the common mind the verdict would not be a moment in doubt. There are both the intent to cancel and the act done in pursuance of it. True, there was no revocation or repeal by mere force of the word 'canceled.' Neither that word, nor any other, would suffice if written on a separate paper. But I think a repeal is effected by the act of writing upon the will itself a word that manifests an intention to annul it. Such an act is a mode of repeal, of the second kind [that is, by 'burning, canceling, or obliterating, or destroying the' will] recognized by the legislature, a thing done to the paper on which the will is written. It would be strange if drawing ink lines across the will, without obliterating a word, should amount to cancelation, and writing on it words that leave no doubt of an intent to cancel should be anything less. It is plain that cancelation does not require a signature under the statute, nor is any form of cancelation required." The court, then, after referring to cases from other jurisdictions, refers to Lewis v. Lewis (Pa.) supra, and in distinguishing that case says that "it should be observed that though the word was written upon the paper on which the will was written, it was placed where it could have been detached without defacing the instrument. It might have been separated and the will itself remain intact. In this respect it differed from the case now before us. . . . It does not hold that a will cannot be canceled by making marks upon it, inseparable from the will, clearly with an intent to cancel, if the marks consist of letters and words rather than lines drawn across the instrument. It does not rule that cancelation is necessarily erasure or defacement. What would have been the judgment if, instead of the word "obsolete," the word "canceled" had been written, and written where it could not be removed and leave the will entire, can hardly be gathered from the case." In defining the meaning of cancelation, the court, after stating that the statute does not declare what shall amount to a cancelation, continues: "The word is not a technical one, and therefore the legislature must be presumed to have used it in its ordinary and commonly understood sense. It amounts to nothing to show what the original etymological meaning of the word 'cancel' was. Long before the statute was passed it had acquired an accommodated meaning, plain to the common understanding. To most minds it did not suggest a thought of its primary signification. No one supposed that when a canceled bond or note or power of attorney was spoken of, it was intended exclusively a bond, note or power over which lattice-work lines had been drawn. No one would have doubted that drawing parallel lines or curved lines across the bond, or a single line through its signature, would amount to cancelation, if done with the intent to annul the instrument. Nor would anyone have doubted that writing the word 'canceled,' or the word 'annulled,' upon any other instrument than a will, would be an act of cancelation and effective as such, if done by one who had authority to destroy it, and with an intent to destroy. The reason is that the act puts the instrument into such a condition that it shows on its face its invalidity, the moment it is produced. It is a common ordinary mode in which writings are annulled, and the act of cancelation being palpable, and inseparable from the writing, there can be no mistake in regard to an executed intention to render it of no effect. How, then, can it be maintained that the word 'canceling' was used in the statute in any peculiar sense? Why, as it confessedly may be in case of a bond, note, check, letter of attorney, or any other instrument, may not a will be canceled, not by words alone, not by words in writing alone, but by an act done to the will which stamps upon it an intention that it shall have no effect, though the act done be not complete obliteration or physical destruction? Can it be that a will may be repealed by straight or crooked lines drawn upon it, and yet not by lines in such form as to express words? Putting the one on the paper is as much an act done to it as is writing the other, and no more, but the latter may indicate the purpose of the act more clearly than the former can. It is true we have to do with the meaning of the words 'canceling,' 'obliterating,' and 'destroying,' as used by the legislature, but there is nothing in the statute that requires us to attach to them any unusual signification. . . . Revocation by cancelation, then, is not to be understood to mean exclusively drawing cross lines upon the paper, but it means any act done to it which, in common understanding, is regarded as cancelation when done to any other instrument." The court concludes that an act which would be a cancelation of a bond must be a cancelation of a will, that the court is "not at liberty to restrict the act by reading it, 'canceling by defacing some material and essential part of the script.' That would make cancelation synonymous with obliteration."

In Warner v. Warner (1864) 37 Vt. 356, the will was written upon a sheet of foolscap paper, and covered the first page and about one third of the second page. Upon the last half of the second page were written the following words: "This will is hereby canceled and annulled in full this 15th day of March, in the year 1859," and several lines lower down upon the page were the following words, erased: "In testimony whereof I here I have." Written lengthwise of the paper, as folded, and below the fling of the paper upon the back, being the outside on the fourth page, were these words: "Canceled and is null and void. I. Warner." The court states the case to be: "What amounts to canceling,—how, with reference to the text of the instrument, must the act be done,—not as to the shape or character of the marks, but where must they be located, is the main point of debate in the present case." In discussing the meaning of cancellation the court states, generally, that "the net result of all the cases and all the textbooks, as well as the reason of the thing, and the appropriate analogies, seems to be this,—that when the instrument is so marked by the maker of it as to show clearly, whenever it is produced, that the act was designed by him to be a canceling, that act becomes effectual, by force of the statute, as a revocation of the will by canceling." Referring to the writing upon the will in the case at bar, the court states that "in the present case the act of the testator was done, not only upon the paper on which the will was written, but upon such a part of it as always to go with that part of the will which contained the disposition of the property, not indeed on the face, but on the back of such disposition. It is obvious that the act itself was designed to constitute a revocation by canceling. This is not a mere memorandum or declaration, which, as such, operates a legal effect by force of the terms, but it was the performing of an act upon the instrument itself, which act operates the legal effect. If cross lines had been drawn over the face of the writing of the will, they would have been effectual, because they would have constituted an act done to the instrument, showing the intent of the testator, by that act, to destroy the validity of it. Instead of thus drawing lines, he equally performed an act to the substance of the instrument, and as inseparable from the written text as cross lines over its face, showing with even clearer certainty the intent by that act to destroy its validity. Instead of leaving the significance of informal marks to be fixed by the location they occupy, he formed the marks into letters and words expressive of their significance, and as effectually placed them upon the instrument as if they had been made upon the face of the script of the will. If he had drawn a slight mark from the top to the bottom of the writing, though that would not have been cancelli within the etymological and primary meaning of the term, still it is conceded that it would have been a canceling of the will, if done with that intent, within the legal meaning of that term. We think that writing upon the will, as was done in this case, as nearly answers to the primary sense of that term, as such mark would, and, having regard to the ground on which effect is given to an act of cancellation, such writing answers every reason and requisite of the law."

3. Writing in connection with some act of cancellation.

Where words indicating an intent to revoke are written upon the will and, in addition thereto, there is some other act of cancellation, the written words are competent to show the intent with which the other act was done. Semmes v. Semmes (1826) 7 Harr. & J. (Md.) 388; Kirkpatrick's Will (1871) 22 N. J. Eq. 463; Smith v. Runkle (1915) — N. J. —, 97 Atl. 296, affirmed in (1916) 86 N. J. Eq. 257, 98 Atl. 1086; Re Alger (1902) 38 Misc. 143, 77 N. Y. Supp. 166.

Thus, in Semmes v. Semmes (Md.) supra, where a testator canceled his own signature and those of the subscribing witnesses, by drawing a pen a number of times and in different directions across such signatures, and also wrote at the foot of the paper the words, "In consequence of the death of my wife, it is become necessary to make another will," there is held to be a revocation of the will. In Kirkpatrick's Will (1871) 22 N. J. Eq. 463, a testatrix drew lines across two of the legacies in her will, and added on the margin memoranda to the effect that she wished to erase these parts. The words, "Canceled October 5, 1912, Wm. Runkle," written on the margin of a paragraph which is obliterated by lines drawn across the written provisions therein, may be accepted as a contemporaneous expression of intention to cancel and revoke the bequest. Smith v. Runkle (1915) — N. J. —, 97 Atl. 296, affirmed in. (1916) 86 N. J. Eq. 257, 98 Atl. 1086. The words, "Canceled by death," written across the body of a will, and signed by the testatrix, were stated in Cummins's Estate (1908) 37 Pa. Super. Ct. 580, not to have been written to effect a cancellation, but to give a reason for her action in canceling by obliteration.

In some such cases there has been held to be a revocation, although the cancellation marks were not sufficient of themselves to indicate an intention to revoke the entire instrument, as distinguished from a part; an intention to revoke the entire instrument is held to be shown by words written at the foot of the paper on which the will is written, stating that it was canceled by the testator. Re Alger (1902) 38 Misc. 143, 77 N. Y. Supp. 166.

But if the word "canceled" is written so as to indicate an intent to revoke only a part of the will, its effect must be determined by the rule as to validity of partial revocation by burning, tearing, canceling, etc., and where partial revocation in this manner is not allowable no revocation results. Re Hildenbrand (1914) 87 Misc. 471, 150 N. Y. Supp. 1067; Gugel v. Vollmer (1883) 1 Dem. (N. Y.) 484. W. A. E.

FIRST MORTGAGE BOND HOMESTEAD ASSOCIATION, Trustee, etc., of Roberta Porter et al., Appt.,

v.

HERMAN G. MEHLHORN and Wife.

Maryland Court of Appeals — January 14, 1919.

(— Md. —, 105 Atl. 526.)

Judgment — collateral security.

1. A judgment may be taken as collateral security for an existing debt or as security for future advances.

Loan association — credit of sinking fund on bond.

2. Although a loan association is, under its contract, the agent of members in accumulating a sinking fund to pay off the bond securing the loan to a borrowing member, and not of the one to whom the bond has been assigned, yet if, under the contract, it becomes, on default in payment, the agent of the bondholder to enforce the security given for his protection, it should credit the amount which has accumulated in the sinking fund upon the bond and not seek judgment for the face of the bond.

Judgment — incorporation of agreement.

3. When a judgment is entered as collateral security the substance of the agreement between the parties, or at least a reference to it, should be inserted by the clerk in his memorandum.

4. A loan association cannot enter judgment by confession for the face of the bond given by a borrower from it, where it has accumulated money in a sinking fund to be credited on the bond, even though the court would have power to compel the allowance of credits on the judgment after it was entered.

Costs — refusal of judgment by confession — failure to dismiss case.

5. Where a loan association has attempted to enter a judgment by confession against a member borrower for the amount of the bond given to secure the loan, the court may, upon refusal of the association to enter the case dismissed upon the court's refusal to permit entry of the judgment, allow defendant his costs.

[See 7 R. C. L. 783.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Baltimore City Court refusing to enter judgment against defendants by confession, for the amount of a bond given to secure a loan, and from a judgment for defendants for costs. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. S. S. Field, for appellant:

The power of attorney, under which the attorney for the mortgagors appeared and confessed judgment, is contained in the mortgage, immediately ahead of the ordinary consent to a decree for the sale of the mortgaged premises.

This stipulation, like the consent to a decree immediately following it, was a part of the security upon the faith of which the mortgagors obtained the money.

Cross v. Moffat, 11 Colo. 212, 17 Pac. 771; 23 Cyc. 704; Byles, Bills, 8th ed. § 239; Norris v. Aylett, 2 Campb. 329.

It is a contract, entered into by the parties under seal, acknowledged before a notary, and recorded among the land records, and is lawful and binding.

23 Cyc. 703; 2 Chitty, Pl. 234; Bush v. Hanson, 70 Ill. 480; Cross v. Moffat, 11 Colo. 210, 17 Pac. 771; McClish v. Manning, 3 G. Greene, 223; Toledano v. Relf, 7 La. Ann. 60; Insurance Co. v. Barley, 16 Gratt. 363; Johns v. Fritchey, 39 Md. 258; Tyrrell v. Hilton, 92 Md. 177, 48 Atl. 55.

The rule that the power to confess a judgment must be clearly given and strictly pursued must not be applied to defeat the obvious intentions of the party granting the power.

Keith v. Kellogg, 97 Ill. 147; Holmes v. Parker, 125 Ill. 478, 17 N. E. 759; Holmes v. Bemis, 124 Ill. 453, 17 N. E. 42; Sunderland v. Braun Packing Co. 119 Md. 125, 86 Atl. 126, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 156; Tyrrell v. Hilton, 92 Md. 176, 48 Atl. 55; Johns v. Fritchey, 39 Md. 258; 23 Cyc. 703.

If any attempt were made by the association to collect the whole amount of the judgment without crediting the amounts which have been paid into the association, the court of law has adequate and ample powers to prevent that from being done.

Mr. O. Parker Baker for appellees.

Thomas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 25th of April, 1912, the appellees executed what is termed in the record an "application," by which they subscribed to fifteen shares "of series A and B stock in the First Mortgage Bond Homestead Association, Incorporated," and agreed to comply with the by-laws, rules, and regulations of the association, and "to pay all payments in monthly instalments of $16.67 each on said stock as dues on the first Monday of each month in advance," and further agreed, in case a loan was procured by the association for them, that they would not withdraw any portion of the amount deposited by them until the maturity of the stock, "or when the mortgage is released," when the association or trustee named in the mortgage to be executed by them was authorized to pay to the holder or holders of the bonds, in the names of the appellees, all moneys due the appellees under the by-laws and necessary to redeem the bonds and procure a release of the mortgage; "also in the meantime to pay all interest coupons on the mortgage indebtedness, taxes, water rent, ground rent, or other charges due or to become due on the property" therein referred to, and to deduct the same from any payments or deposits made by them to the association. Following a formal application to the association to procure for them a loan of $1,500, at 6 per cent interest, and an offer as security therefor of all moneys paid by them to the association, at No. 2016 St. Paul street, in Baltimore city, they agreed to execute a mortgage to the association as trustee, and to execute coupon bonds in such denominations as might be desired, secured by the mortgage, and payable to bearer or registered holder thereof at the maturity of the stock, or upon default, not later than ten years after date. After certain statements or representations in regard to the property to be conveyed by the mortgage and charges against the same, the application contained, among others, the following additional stipulations:

"We further agree that said association shall be our agent in the creation of the sinking fund to meet this loan, with no risk or responsibility on the part of the person or persons advancing the money for this loan in any manner, and that we will deposit in addition to the dues above mentioned on the first Monday of each month hereafter, the sum of $7.50, as interest on said loan, to be paid by said association each six months to the holders of the securities, and the sum of $16.25 as the expenses on said property to the parties legally entitled to receive the same, and such other sum as may be necessary.

"It is also understood and agreed that said association will invest and keep invested all moneys deposited by us, and after we have deposited as dues the sum of $104 that the association will assume, if invested, the interest on this amount, and the same may be deducted from the monthly payments of the applicants, or added to the dues, or in such other manner as may be agreed upon from time to time.

"It is also understood and agreed that if we adopt the drop interest plan, we are not to share any of the profits of the association, and shall get credit for only such payments as we shall make as dues.

"It is further understood and agreed that if we should become in arrears in our monthly instalments of dues, interest, fines, expenses or any portion of either, or shall fail to pay any expense or public dues or charges on the property when due and payable, or shall fail to keep up the improvements on the property in their present condition, or make a false statement concerning said property herein, then the entire mortgage debt shall be deemed due and payable, and any method may be pursued for the collection of the mortgage debt at the option of the trustee as may be enumerated in the mortgage."

On the same day the appellees executed a mortgage of their said property to the association as trustee, and also two bonds, one for $1,000 and the other for $500, payable to bearer or registered holder thereof, with interest at 6 per cent, payable semiannually from the 25th day of April, 1912, until the principal of the bonds was paid according to the terms of the application and mortgage, on surrender of the coupons at the office of the association.

The mortgage, after reciting that the appellees were members of the association; that they had subscribed to ten shares of series B stock and five shares of series A stock of the association; that they had filed with the association an application to secure for them a loan of $1,500; that the association, relying upon the truth of the statements contained in the application, had procured the money applied for from divers persons; and that the mortgagors had executed their two coupon bonds for $1,000 and $500, No. 126 and No. 127, respectively, payable to bearer or registered holder thereof, with interest, at the maturity of the stock of the mortgagors, "not later than ten years from date, or upon default"—contained the following recital: "And in order to create a sinking fund with which to meet said bonds at maturity, the mortgagors have agreed in said application to deposit regularly on said stock monthly instalments of $40.39 each, being principal, interest, and expenses, as particularly set forth in said application, which is hereby made a part of this mortgage, with said association as their depository, until their stock has matured (with no power of withdrawal in the mortgagors, and with no risk or responsibility on the part of the bondholders in any way), when it shall be paid by said association to the bondholders upon presentation and cancelation of their bonds and coupons, or as hereafter provided; and in order to secure the prompt payment of said bonds and the interest coupons attached hereto, as they shall respectively become due and payable, the performance of the agreement to create a sinking fund and all other covenants and agreements contained in the application, the bonds, and this mortgage, these presents are executed."

The mortgage declared that the property thereby conveyed should be held by the association in trust for the benefit and security of the holders of the bonds and the enforcement of the payment of said bonds and interest thereon, "and the performance and compliance with the covenants and conditions of the mortgage, the application for this loan and the bonds which are secured hereby," and then provided "that if the said mortgagors, their heirs, personal representatives, and assigns, shall well and truly pay or cause to be paid, the aforesaid bonds, aggregating $1,500, and all interest or coupons attached to said bonds, when and as they shall respectively become due and payable, and shall perform all the agreements contained in the application for this loan, the bonds, and the by-laws of said association, and all the covenants contained herein on their part to be performed, then this mortgage shall be void. And it is agreed that, until default be made in the premises, the mortgagors shall possess the aforesaid property upon keeping up the improvements on said property in their present condition, which they covenant to do; and paying in the meantime all fixed charges and expenses, which charges and expenses, mortgage debt, and interest the said mortgagors for themselves, their heirs, personal representatives, and assigns, do hereby covenant to pay when legally demandable, but should any of the statements contained in the application for this loan be untrue, or if default be made in the payment of said bonds or the interest obligations attached thereto, or in the payment of the instalments of principal and interest in the creation of the sinking fund to meet the bonds and interest obligations attached thereto, as specifically set forth in the application for this loan and the by-laws at the time limited for the payment in said application or by-laws, or any part of either, or in any agreement, covenant, or condition contained in said bonds, application, by-laws, and this mortgage, then the entire mortgage debt shall be due and demandable."

The association was authorized by the mortgage in case of default to take possession of the property and to hold the same for a period not exceeding five years and to collect the rents, etc., and to deposit the net income therefrom, if any, with the association "the same as if the mortgagors had deposited under the terms of" the mortgage, and the mortgage also contained the following provisions for a judgment by confession and a decree for the sale of the property:

"And it shall be lawful for O. Parker Baker, Esq., or any attorney he may designate, of any court of record, to appear for the mortgagors in any court of law or equity having jurisdiction over mortgagors or their property, and waive all process and confess a judgment in favor of said trustee to the use of the holders of the bonds for the face value of all the bonds secured hereby, with accrued interest, and the cost of the proceedings.

"And the said mortgagors hereby consent that a decree may be passed for the sale of said property under the provisions of the law in such cases made and provided, or this mortgage may be foreclosed under any law or laws of the state of Maryland, either public, local, or general, or by the method usually practised by mortgagees in the city or county where this mortgage is recorded. In any method the attorney conducting the proceedings shall be allowed a fee of $25 in addition to usual commissions."

The bonds executed by the appellees referred to the application and to the terms of the mortgage, and also contained the following provision: "It is also understood and agreed by the mortgagors that they will create a sinking fund to meet the series of bonds and the coupons attached thereto, and will deposit with the First Mortgage Bond Homestead Association on the first Monday of each month the sum of sixteen sixty-seven one hundredths ($16.67) as a part of the principal, and the sum of seven fifty-one hundredths ($7.50) dollars as the accrued interest on this series of bonds, and also all other expenses and charges and costs to the trustee as are particularly set forth in the sworn application for this loan and the mortgage or deed of trust which secures this bond. This bond shall become due and demandable at a time when the mortgagors should have to their credit on account of the principal with the First Mortgage Bond Homestead Association, their agent or depository, a sum equal to the face value of all bonds issued in this series and secured by the mortgage or deed of trust aforesaid (if they continue to deposit regularly the instalments aforesaid with the association on the property aforesaid, with all interest charges and costs which have accrued thereon in accordance with the mortgage, or deed of trust, and the application for this loan now in the hands of the trustee, or upon default as prescribed by the mortgage or deed of trust, provided, however, the same may be paid off in other ways as prescribed by the mortgage, or deed of trust, and the application for this loan and upon the conditions therein recited, which application is hereby made a part of the entire obligation, the same as if it was recited in full herein). If default shall be made in the payment of any instalment of interest or principal or the charges and costs to the agent of the mortgagors aforesaid, in the creation of the sinking fund to meet these bonds and coupons as aforesaid as they shall respectively be due and payable, or if said agent of the mortgagors aforesaid shall fail to turn over said funds when the coupons or bonds shall be due and payable under the terms hereof or either of them, then at the option of the holders or the trustee these bonds shall be due and demandable and may be enforced by sale of the property or otherwise as provided by the said mortgage or deed of trust and these bonds."

The bonds constituted and appointed Evelyn F. Belt agent and attorney for the appellees, with power and authority to appear for them and to confess a judgment in favor of the holder of the bonds for the amount due thereon, with interest and cost of suit.

On the 8th of March, 1918, the appellant, the First Mortgage Bond Homestead Association, trustee, filed in the Baltimore city court its declaration in a suit against the appellees, "to the use of Roberta Porter and Rachel E. Robey," the application, mortgage, and bonds executed by the appellees, an affidavit executed by George E. Robinson, attesting witness to the mortgage, that the debt created by the bonds was due to the holders thereof, and that the appellees had made default, and the following order signed by George E. Robinson, attorney for plaintiff, and O. Parker Baker, attorney for defendants: "Mr. Clerk: Docket this case by consent as of the February rule day, 1918; enter the appearance of O. Parker Baker for the defendants and enter a judgment by confession for the plaintiff (to the use of Roberta Porter as to $1,000 and to the use of Rachel E. Robey as to $500) for the sum of $1,500 and the cost of the proceedings."

The declaration alleged that the defendants executed the bonds and the mortgage in which they agreed to pay the trustee $40.39 per month with which to pay the interest on said bonds, the expenses on said property, and to create a sinking fund to meet said obligations as they became due, and that by the terms of the mortgage and application upon default in the payment of said $40.39 per month the whole of said obligations became due; that the defendants had defaulted, their last payment being on August 9, 1917; and that they had also failed to pay taxes for 1917 and the ground rent due September 1, 1917, and March 1, 1918, whereby the attorney for the defendants was authorized by the mortgage to confess judgment against them for the use of the holders of the bonds for the face value thereof, with accrued interest and costs, etc.

The court below passed an order refusing to enter the judgment by confession, and a docket entry shows that on the same day a judgment was entered for the defendants for costs. This appeal is from the judgment and from the order of court refusing to enter the judgment by confession.

By the terms of the application, mortgage, and bonds, the appellees were required to make monthly payments to the association as trustee, to provide a sinking fund for the redemption of the bonds, to cover the interest thereon and the expenses on the property conveyed to the trustee by the mortgage. According to the mortgage the aggregate amount to be paid monthly was $40.30, and according to the application and bonds $16.67 of that amount was to be applied to the sinking fund for the payment of the principal of the bonds, and $7.50 was to be applied to the payment of the interest thereon as it became due. The application, mortgage, and bonds were executed on the 25th of April, 1912, and the narr. alleges that the appellees defaulted in the payment of the monthly dues of $40.30, and that the last payment thereof was made by them on the 9th of August, 1917. It would seem, therefore, from the averments of the narr. that the appellees had complied with the terms of the application, mortgage, and bonds until the default complained of, and had, during a period of five years from the date of the mortgage, etc., made the monthly payments required thereby, yet there was no account or statement filed with the declaration showing the credits to which the appellees were entitled, and the judgment by confession which the plaintiff sought to have entered was for the full amount of the principal of the bonds.

The appellant contends that the association, in receiving the monthly payments made by the appellees, acted as the agent of the appellees, and not as the agent of the holders of the bonds, and that the mortgage, as a part of the security for the loan, expressly authorized a judgment by confession in favor of the trustee for the use of the holders of the bonds for the face value of the bonds and accrued interest. Assuming that under the proper construction of the application, mortgage, and bonds, the association received the monthly payments provided for as the trustee and agent of the appellees, and that these payments, in so far as they were applicable to the payment of the principal of the bonds and interest thereon, were not, strictly speaking, credits on the bonds until so applied by the association under the arrangement and contract between the association, bondholders, and appellees, nevertheless, by the express terms of the mortgage, the entire mortgage debt became due and demandable upon default, and it is conceded by the appellant that thereupon the association became the trustee or agent of the holders of the bonds "to enforce the security given for their protection." One of the securities provided for the protection of the bondholders was the sinking fund to be created by the monthly payment to the association as trustee of the sums of $16.67 and $7.50. Therefore, when, upon default, the association became the trustee and agent of the holders of the bonds "to enforce the security given for their protection," there is no reason why the appellees should not have been given credit for the amount in the sinking fund in the hands of the association available for the payment of the bonds.

Loan association—credit of sinking fund on bond.

In Huston v. Ditto, 20 Md. 305, Chief Judge Bowie said there were three kinds of judgments recognized by our courts, viz.: Interlocutory judgments, final and effective judgments, and judgments which were final, but not effective, and he quotes the statement in Evans, Pr. 339: "A judgment by confession is not, in our practice, considered an interlocutory judgment. . . . The confession is considered as an admission of the whole claim, unless it is made, as it frequently is, on terms. The terms, whatever they may be, are in that case reduced to writing and given to the clerk, who inserts them in his memorandum."

Mr. Poe states that a final and effective judgment was one where "nothing remained to be done to establish both the liability of the defendant and its precise extent," and he gives, as examples of judgments that were final, but not effective until the precise amount of the plaintiff's claim was ascertained: "A judgment by confession for the plaintiff without specifying the amount; a judgment by confession for the plaintiff 'on terms to be filed;' and a judgment for the plaintiff for so much as A. B. shall say is due." 2 Poe, Pl. & Pr. § 357.

But he says in § 357A that since the Act of 1864, chap. 311 (Code 1912, § 18, art. 26), "our common-law judgments are simply of two kinds, interlocutory and final."

Judgments, like mortgages, may be taken as collateral security for an existing indebtedness, or as security for future advances. Mr. Poe says that when a judgment is "entered for either of these purposes an express written agreement should be filed in the case, to show the precise character and object of the judgment and prevent subsequent controversy," and, we may add, as suggested in Evans's Practice, supra, the substance of the agreement, or at least a reference to it, should be inserted by the clerk in his memorandum. 2 Poe, Pl. & Pr. § 401; Neidig v. Whiteford, 29 Md. 183, 184; Robinson v. Consolidated Real Estate & F. Ins. Co. 55 Md. 105.

In the case at bar the judgment by confession which the appellant attempted to have entered was a final judgment determining the extent of the appellees' liability as of the date thereof to be the amount of the principal of the bonds; whereas, the application, mortgage, bonds, and declaration indicated that the appellees were entitled to credits not allowed in the judgment. If the judgment was intended merely as collateral security for whatever sum should be found, upon a proper accounting, to be due the association as the trustee and agent of the holders of the bonds, there should have been an agreement filed and a memorandum in the judgment to be entered to that effect.

The appellant contends that the entry of the judgment as proposed would not have exposed the appellees to the danger of any injustice to them, because, if the association had attempted "to collect the whole amount of the judgment without crediting the amounts which had been paid into the association, the court of law had adequate and ample powers to prevent that from being done." The power of the court in which a judgment is obtained to compel the entry of proper credits thereon, whether the defendant was entitled to the credits before or after the judgment was entered, is recognized in Huston v. Ditto, supra, and Gorsuch v. Thomas, 57 Md. 334. But the existence of such power furnishes no ground for entering the judgment by confession referred to in this case. On the contrary, if the court would have compelled the association to credit the amounts paid to it before attempting to collect the judgment, there is greater reason why the court should have refused to have the judgment entered when it appeared from the declaration and papers in the case that the plaintiff was not entitled to a judgment for the amount named in the order of counsel.

—confession—credits.

Judgment—collateral security.

It follows from what has been said that the court below properly refused to enter the judgment by confession.

In regard to the judgment in favor of the defendants for costs, it is only necessary to say that the application and bonds authorize the association, as trustee, in case of default to pursue such methods for the collection of the debt as were provided in the mortgage. The mortgage did not authorize the association to maintain a suit, for the use of the holders of the bonds, in a court of law for the amount due on the bonds. The case was on the docket, and as the court below properly refused to have the judgment by confession entered, in the absence of an order of plaintiff's counsel to enter the case dismissed, the defendants were entitled to a judgment for costs.

ANNOTATION.

Entering judgment as collateral security.

- I. In general, 851.
- II. For existing indebtedness, 851.
- III. For future advances, 852.
- IV. For contingent liabilities, 856.

I. In general.

The note does not include assignment of judgment, and the title excludes the question of mortgages as collateral security.

As a practical proposition, the question of taking judgment as collateral security involves some phase of the method of taking judgment by confession in the particular jurisdiction in which the case arises, for the reason that, in actual practice, a judgment taken as collateral security is, almost of necessity, taken by confession. So in the reported case (FIRST MORTG. BOND HOMESTEAD ASSO. v. MEHLHORN, ante, 844), there was no serious question about the right to take the judgment as collateral security, but the real question was regarding the manner of confessing it under the statutes and according to the practice in vogue in the state of Maryland.

II. For existing indebtedness.

It is here assumed, as the courts in practically every case have assumed, that as an abstract proposition of law, a judgment may be taken as collateral security for an existing indebtedness or responsibility, or for one that is created at the time the judgment is taken. As the court in Integrity Title Ins. T. & S. D. Co. v. Rau (1893) 153 Pa. 488, 26 Atl. 220, said: "As security, the creditor has a right to as large collateral, and as many different forms of it, as the parties chose to contract for. That is a matter with which the court cannot interfere. But the enforcement of satisfaction, by execution or otherwise, is a matter to be governed by the rights and equities of the parties, and comes within the jurisdiction of the court. In the present case, the creditor did nothing more than enter up his judgment on the bond, as part of the security agreed on. In so doing he was within his strict legal rights, and the court had no authority to interfere with his action." Judgment had been confessed upon a bond with power of attorney, as collateral security for several notes. This general proposition is supported a fortiori by the cases cited under the following headings.

Under a statute for the confession of judgments the maker of a promissory note may, before the note is due, appear and confess judgment for the amount thereof, without having the note filed, which judgment takes precedence over later creditors of the maker of the note. Stern v. Mayer (1885) 19 Mo. App. 511; Clapp v. Ely (1854) 10 N. J. Eq. 178.

So, in Strong v. Gaskill (1891) — N. J. —, 59 Atl. 339, a valid judgment was confessed upon a bond with warrant of attorney, to secure the payment of notes given at the same time for an existing indebtedness.

And in Keep v. Leckie (1855) 42 S. C. L. (8 Rich.) 164, where a power to confess judgment as security for the payment of some notes was given, to be entered only on default of payment of the notes, it was held that the death of the maker did not prevent the confession of the judgment thereafter, when default was made.

III. For future advances.

The right to take judgment as security for future advances has been the subject of considerable discussion, but as an abstract proposition of law, the right has been upheld or recognized as existing in the following cases (as the future advances, when made, are usually evidenced by some paper, the judgment may be regarded as collateral security):

Illinois. — McDonald v. Chisholm (1890) 131 Ill. 273, 23 N. E. 596; Little v. Dyer (1891) 138 Ill. 272, 32 Am. St. Rep. 140, 27 N. E. 905; Fortune v. Bartolomei (1896) 164 Ill. 51, 45 N. E. 274.

Maryland. — Neidig v. Whiteford (1868) 29 Md. 178, 96 Am. Dec. 510; Robinson v. Consolidated Real Estate & F. Ins. Co. (1880) 55 Md. 105.

New Jersey. — Ely v. Parkhurst (1855) 25 N. J. L. 188; Sayre v. Hewes (1880) 32 N. J. Eq. 652. But under a statute in New Jersey, it has been held that a judgment confessed to secure future advances is void. Clapp v. Ely (1858) 27 N. J. L. 555; Warwick v. Petty (1882) 44 N. J. L. 542; Sterling v. Fleming (1891) 53 N. J. L. 652, 24 Atl. 1001.

New York. — Nichols v. Hewit (1809)

4 Johns. 423; Livingston v. M'Inlay (1819) 16 Johns. 165; Brinkerhoff v. Marvin (1821) 5 Johns. Ch. 320; Wilder v. Fonday (1829) 4 Wend. 100; Truscott v. King (1852) 6 N. Y. 147; Cook v. Whipple (1873) 55 N. Y. 150, 14 Am. Rep. 202.

Pennsylvania. — Holden v. Bull (1830) 1 Penr. & W. 460; Ter-Hoven v. Kerns (1845) 2 Pa. St. 96; Parmentier v. Gillespie (1848) 9 Pa. 86; Pennock v. Copeland (1850) 1 Phila. 29; Shenk's Appeal (1859) 33 Pa. 371; McClure v. Roman (1866) 52 Pa. 458; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Mosser (1894) 161 Pa. 469, 29 Atl. 1; Weiskircher v. Volk (1905) 29 Pa. Super. Ct. 611.

A judgment taken for future advances, or for responsibilities thereafter to be incurred, covers only such advances as are actually made, and the amount is limited to the amount of the judgment. Livingston v. M'Inlay (1819) 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 165; Brinkerhoff v. Marvin (1821) 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 320; Wilder v. Fonday (1829) 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 100; Truscott v. King (1852) 6 N. Y. 147; Cook v. Whipple (1873) 55 N. Y. 150, 14 Am. Rep. 202; Ter-Hoven v. Kerns (1845) 2 Pa. St. 96; Shenk's Appeal (1859) 33 Pa. 371.

And the judgment will be valid as against later encumbrances only up to the amount actually advanced at the time the later encumbrances intervened. Brinkerhoff v. Marvin (1821) 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 320; Ter-Hoven v. Kerns (1845) 2 Pa. St. 96.

The reasoning underlying this holding is set forth by the court in Ter-Hoven v. Kerns (Pa.) supra, as follows: "With respect to the validity of the judgment taken by the bank, of Kerns, there can be no question. A judgment or mortgage taken to secure the payment of an existing debt, and debts or liabilities to be created in future, has been held to be good and valid by numerous decisions. Gordon v. Graham (1716) 7 Vin. Abr. 52, pl. 3, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 598, 22 Eng. Reprint 502; Lyle v. Ducomb (1813) 5 Binn. (Pa.) 585; 4 Kent, Com. 175, and the cases there referred to. It may also be regarded as settled, when the prior encumbrancer in such case, especially if his encumbrance be a judgment, makes future advancements upon the faith of his encumbrance, with actual notice of a new intervening encumbrance, that he will not be preferred for such subsequent advancements, to the intervening encumbrance; the latter will be entitled to a preference. But suppose he makes such advancement without any actual knowledge whatever, on his part, of the existence of the intervening encumbrance; shall he be postponed, or not, the same as if he had had actual notice? This question, I think, has not been definitely settled. And I am inclined to believe that there may be a diversity of opinion in regard to it. In Gordon v. Graham (Eng.) supra, where the prior encumbrancer took a mortgage to secure the payment of money already lent, as also such other sums as should thereafter be lent or advanced, and the second mortgagee took his mortgage with notice of the first, and the first mortgagee, after this, with notice of the second mortgage, lent a further sum of money to the mortgagor, Cowper, C., was of the opinion that the second mortgagee could not redeem without paying all that was due to the first mortgagee. In Shirras v. Craig (1812) 9 Cranch (U. S.) 34, 3 L. ed. 260, Marshall, Chief Justice, gives it as the opinion of the court that a mortgage executed to secure the payment of an existing debt, and for debts subsequently contracted upon its faith, either by advancements made or liabilities incurred prior to the receipt of actual notice of the subsequent title of the defendants, was good, and entitled to a preference; see pages 50, 51. So, Chancellor Kent, 4 Com. 175, after stating that a mortgage or judgment may be taken and held as a security for subsequent advances and responsibilities to the extent of it, when this is a constituent part of the agreement, says the future advances will be covered by the lien, in preference to the claim under a junior intervening encumbrance with notice of the agreement. Indeed, Chancellor Kent seems to think the prior encumbrancer entitled to a preference, if the instrument under which he claims provides for his making future advancements, whether he has notice or not at the time of the junior intervening encumbrance, and that the junior encumbrancer will only be preferred where he has no notice or means of knowing the agreement under which such future advancements have been made. Yet in Brinkerhoff v. Marvin (1821) 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 326, after referring to several cases where it had been held or laid down that a mortgage or judgment, taken as a security for future advances beyond the amount actually due, was good and valid, he observes: The limitation to this doctrine, 'I should think, would be that, when a subsequent judgment or mortgage intervened, further advances, after that period, would not be covered,'—thus leaving the question to be decided, without regard to notice, according to the fact whether the future advances were made prior or subsequently to the junior encumbrance coming into existence. To this, I apprehend, there can be no just or equitable objection made, where every encumbrance upon real estate, before it can become such, must be placed on record, or registered, or filed in some public office, where its being and extent may be fully ascertained by anyone whose interest it may be to know it. Such is the case as to encumbrances created upon real estate in Pennsylvania; no such encumbrance can exist without being placed on record, or registered, or filed in some public office appointed by law for the purpose, where anyone may be fully apprised of its existence or nonexistence by calling and making the necessary inquiry. But, it is said, a prior encumbrancer is not bound to look to the obtainment or entry of subsequent encumbrances; and, generally, this is true, and perhaps universally where the encumbrance is given to secure the payment of a debt in being, the amount of which is fixed and mentioned, or as an indemnity against future liabilities which may and shall arise from having become bail or surety for the encumbrancer, in some particular respect mentioned and referred to in the agreement. But where the encumbrance is given for a debt of a certain amount already owing, and for future advances or responsibilities which cannot be made or incurred without the future will and consent of the party taking such encumbrance, there is no good reason why he, before he advances, or accepts of any new responsibility in future, should not examine the various offices for junior and intervening encumbrances, in the same manner as if he were to accept of a new and independent liability from the party, having no reference whatever to any prior encumbrance. Every future advancement or responsibility created is, in reality, a new debt, and such a responsibility is created by a new contract, having a reference merely to the prior encumbrance, for the purpose of making it a lien upon the debtor's real estate; so that, with respect to those who have acquired liens upon the real estate of the debtor in the meantime, there is no ground or just reason whatever, why such future advances or responsibilities should not be looked on and considered as having no connection with the prior encumbrance under which they may have been made. In the abstract, there is quite as much reason why the prior encumbrancer should look to the then-existing state of the encumbrances upon the party's real estate, or otherwise act at his peril and take the risk upon himself, as if he were about to make an advancement to, or create a liability with, the party for the first time. And if we look at the thing in practice, I think it will appear not only more practicable, but much more reasonable and just, that the prior encumbrancer should be regarded as bound to know the state of the encumbrances at the time, against the real estate of the person to whom he makes future advances, than that every junior or intervening encumbrancer shall be bound to run after and give him personal notice, or notice in fact of such subsequent encumbrance having been obtained, together with the amount of it. In some instances it may be almost, if not wholly, impracticable for the junior encumbrancer to do so, as where the prior encumbrancer may be a nonresident of the state and residing abroad in parts unknown. To require such notice to be given to the prior encumbrancer, in such cases, by the junior encumbrancer, would most likely put it out of the power of the party whose estate is so encumbered to borrow or obtain money upon it, and his ruin be produced in consequence of it. But it is, in all cases, practicable for the prior encumbrancer, without much trouble or inconvenience, to ascertain, by inquiry and search at the several offices where encumbrances are to be found, if any junior exist; and to ascertain the extent of them. He is under no obligation to make future advances, and most likely, therefore, will never do so, unless he can make profit by it, and throw the expense attending the same upon the party to whom such advances are made. Taking everything, then, into consideration, there appears to be no good or just reason why he should be regarded otherwise, in making future advances, than if he were making advances to the party for the first time."

The question thus raised in Ter-Hoven v. Kerns as to a case in which the judgment creditor is under obligation to make the advance, and does so after the junior encumbrancer files his encumbrance, is answered in Parmentier v. Gillespie (1848) 9 Pa. 86, where it is held that under such circumstances the junior encumbrance is postponed in favor of the advancement. To the same effect is Pennock v. Copeland (1850) 1 Phila. (Pa.) 29.

And where the advancement is made upon the same day as the later encumbrance is entered, the two will be prorated out of the assets of the insolvent estate of the debtor, although the judgment securing the advancement is prior in time. McClure v. Roman (1866) 52 Pa. 458.

And an agreement, at the time a judgment is paid in full, that it shall not be satisfied of record, but shall be and constitute collateral security for other loans made and to be made, continues the lien of the judgment; and the judgment, to the extent of the new loans, takes precedence over subsequent creditors who later enter judgment. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Mosser (1894) 161 Pa. 469, 29 Atl. 1; Weiskircher v. Volk (1905) 29 Pa. Super. Ct. 611. But the rule cannot be made an instrument for fraud upon innocent third parties. Weiskircher v. Volk (Pa.) supra.

And in Truscott v. King (1852) 6 N. Y. 147, it was held that a judgment may, to its extent, be confessed to secure future advances, and will be an effectual security for such advances against subsequent encumbrancers having notice of the judgment. "But the adjudged cases show that if the debt amounted to the sum specified in the condition of the bond at the time of its execution, or advances were subsequently made as agreed upon at the time, to that amount the judgment could not be available as a security for any additional indebtedness, for other advances or liabilities, although in the end, by payments made or funds received by the creditor of the debtor, the amount of the moneys advanced from time to time should be satisfied, so that the balance did not exceed the sum specified in the security. It could not be regarded as a continuing security, covering the final balance which might be found due to the creditor from the debtor, after charging the original debt and subsequent advances and responsibilities, and crediting the moneys received from the debtor from time to time, although such balance should be no larger in amount than the sum specified in the security to be secured." By Edmonds, J., concurring: "It is well settled that a judgment for future advances is good not only against the debtor, but also against subsequent encumbrances, at least, up to the time when a subsequent judgment or mortgage should intervene."

But it has been held that a judgment to secure future advances is valid as to subsequent encumbrancers only up to the amount actually advanced at the time the judgment creditor has notice of the later encumbrance. Sayre v. Hewes (1880) 32 N. J. Eq. 652; Ely v. Parkhurst (1855) 25 N. J. L. 188. But under a New Jersey statute, a confessed judgment for future advances is void. Clapp v. Ely (1858) 27 N. J. L. 555; Warwick v. Petty (1882) 44 N. J. L. 542; Sterling v. Fleming (1891) 53 N. J. L. 652, 24 Atl. 1001.

And it has been held that a judgment confessed by a tenant to the landlord to secure money to be advanced by the latter to former, to be used in building houses upon the leased premises, takes precedence, to the amount actually advanced, over mechanics' liens filed by a third party against the property for material furnished to the tenant and used in building the houses, upon the distribution of the tenant's estate in insolvency proceedings. Robinson v. Consolidated Real Estate & F. Ins. Co. (1880) 55 Md. 105.

The indebtedness or advancement secured by a judgment must be in a definitely fixed amount, or in an amount that may be rendered definite by a calculation, for the reason that one cannot confess judgment for an unliquidated and uncertain sum. Little v. Dyer (1891) 138 Ill. 272, 32 Am. St. Rep. 140, 27 N. E. 905; Fortune v. Bartolomei (1896) 164 Ill. 51, 45 N. E. 274; Nichols v. Hewit (1809) 4 Johns. (N. Y.) 423.

Where notes in the sum of $1,800, with power of attorney to confess judgment attached, were executed by a corporation to secure whatever amount of money the payee should advance to the corporation under a contract, the amount being at the time uncertain, since the money was to be used in completing a piece of work for the corporation itself, it was held, in McDonald v. Chisholm (1890) 131 Ill. 273, 23 N. E. 596, that a judgment for the full amount of the notes, regularly confessed, was valid and binding upon the corporation, although the payee had advanced in money only $1,034, it appearing that he had incurred indebtedness on account of the completion of the piece of work under the contract, in addition to the amount of money actually paid, in a sum exceeding the amount of the judgment.

In Curtice v. Scovel (1791) 1 Root (Conn.) 327, it was held that a note for more than £4, given to bind a party to abide by the award of arbitrators, is not evidence of a subsisting debt, and that a confession of judgment thereon before a justice of the peace "is not such a debt, nor such a confession of debt, as the statute contemplates and authorizes a justice to make a record of." Hence, any such judgment by a justice is void. This case was cited and followed in Talcott v. Pulsifer (1796) 2 Root (Conn.) 443.

But it has been held that a judgment entered upon a bond, in the penalty of $100, with a warrant to confess the judgment, having a condition thereunder written that the obligor will pay a fine and bill of costs, then uncertain in amount, is valid, but no execution can be issued upon the judgment until the real amount due is ascertained. Holden v. Bull (1830) 1 Penr. & W. (Pa.) 460.

IV. For contingent liabilities.

A judgment, confessed to secure the judgment creditor against a contingent liability that he has incurred by becoming the judgment debtor's surety on other paper, is valid against the judgment debtor. Farmers' & M. Bank v. Spear (1893) 49 Ill. App. 509, affirmed in (1895) 156 Ill. 555, 41 N. E. 164; Lansing v. Woodworth (1843) 1 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 43; Marks v. Reynolds (1860) 20 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 338 (reversed as to validity against subsequent creditors, in (1861) 12 Abb. Pr. 403); Allen v. Norton (1877) 6 Or. 344 (validated by statute); Miller v. Howry (1832) 3 Penr. & W. (Pa.) 374, 24 Am. Dec. 320; Stewart v. Stocker (1832) 1 Watts (Pa.) 135; German-American Title & T. Co. v. Campbell (1898) 184 Pa. 541, 39 Atl. 291; Candee's Appeal (1899) 191 Pa. 644, 43 Atl. 1093; McKee v. Verner (1913) 239 Pa. 69, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 727, 86 Atl. 646; Ford v. Elkin (1843) 29 S. C. L. (2 Speers) 146.

A judgment by confession entered upon a note with power of attorney to confess, given to secure the payee therein against loss from his having become indorser for the maker on other paper, is not void merely because entered before the payee had paid the obligations for which he became liable because of the indorsements. Farm- ers' & M. Bank v. Spear (1893) 49 Ill. App. 509, affirmed on other points in (1895) 156 Ill. 555, 41 N. E. 164; Stewart v. Stocker (1832) 1 Watts (Pa.) 135; Miller v. Howry (1832) 3 Penr. & W. (Pa.) 374, 24 Am. Dec. 320.

And an execution issued upon such an absolute judgment, intended to compel the principal to pay in the first instance and relieve the surety, is neither erroneous nor irregular, and it is not fraudulent by the Statute of the 13th Elizabeth. Miller v. Howry (1832) 3 Penr. & W. (Pa.) 374, 24 Am. Dec. 320.

The reasoning upon which this ruling may be based is stated by the court in Stewart v. Stocker (1832) 1 Watts (Pa.) 135, as follows: "It is now settled in this state that a mortgage or judgment may be given to secure a creditor, not only for a debt due, but for responsibilities which are contingent, nay, for future advances. Lyle v. Ducomb (1813) 5 Binn. (Pa.) 585. This judgment to the Pittsburgh Bank was, as the judge rightly decided, to secure the bank, and also to secure the indorsers on the notes of Bosler & Company, then in bank, or which should be given to renew those notes as they fell due. There was no stipulation for any stay of execution. The fairness and validity of this judgment are not questioned. Bosler & Company are stated to have been in debt beyond all hope of extricating themselves. It was possible that they would on any day confess a judgment to some of their creditors, without stay of execution, and their large personal property might have been, in an hour, beyond the reach of this judgment. It was certain Bosler & Company would never pay the notes in the Pittsburgh Bank; that the indorsers must pay them; they would all fall due in June. It was certain that Stocker and others would take executions on or about the 20th of June. It was no stretch of their authority in any of the indorsers in the Pittsburgh Bank to call for execution on that judgment on the 10th of June, and to levy it instantly. If Bosler & Company had objected to this execution, it is not easy to discover on what grounds the court could have set it aside. We had some cases before us at Lancaster last May not unlike this: Howry & Eshelman were largely in trade, and largely in debt; they had borrowed money on bond, with some of their friends as sureties in those bonds, and in bank with some of their friends indorsers, and, to secure those friends, had given them judgment without stipulating for any stay of execution. While those bonds and notes had still a short time to run, the creditors of Howry & Eshelman sued them, entered rules of arbitration, and obtained judgment, and in twenty days could take, and in fact did take execution on the twenty-first day. In the meantime their sureties and indorsers took out executions on their judgments, though none of them had paid the debts for which they were sureties, and were not liable to suit for those debts for some days yet to come. The property was sold, and money brought into court. The common pleas decided, and under the Act of 1827, an appeal to the supreme court, and the executions thus issued by the securities and indorsers took the money, by a decision of a majority of this court. In those cases the defendants, as here, made no objection to the first executions. I will add that in those cases the sureties had paid the money for which they were bound before the money was brought into court, so that there was no danger of the surety recovering money from his principal to pay a debt, and afterwards not paying it. So here, the bank recovering the debt, the indorsers are thereby at once discharged; and although I was not entirely satisfied with the decision at Lancaster, yet, upon reflection, there is no actual injustice in collecting the debt from the principal in the first instance, instead of pressing the surety and turning him round to the principal. And when the form of the agreement will admit of its being collected from the principal, perhaps no court will interfere to throw it on the surety in the first instance. The authority of those cases would determine the same point in this case."

But such judgment is void if the confession states no facts and does not show, as required by the statute regulating the confession of judgments, for what cause of action the judgment is entered. Adams v. Tator (1890) 57 Hun, 302, 19 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 114, 32 N. Y. S. R. 120, 10 N. Y. Supp. 617; Hammond v. Bush (1859) 8 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 152.

And such a judgment has been held to be voidable by the judgment debtor's creditors. Forrester v. Strauss (1891) 21 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 166, 18 N. Y. Supp. 41.

And a judgment confessed upon a note given to the sureties on the maker's bond, without consideration, no previous indebtedness existing, neither of the payees being able to state that they would be called upon to pay anything on account of their suretyship, is a fraud upon the maker's existing creditors, and the claims of such creditors have priority over the judgment on money made by sale of the judgment debtor's goods on execution issued from the judgment. Sprague v. Noble (1878) 3 Ill. App. 521.

the land where the timber was located and to occupy a mill site and yard provided for in the deed to him for said timber, and manufacture the same into lumber, had a common-law lien on the lumber for the price of their work stipulated in the contract, and, under the facts and circumstances in this case, the same was not lost or waived by permitting or suffering a representative of the owner to take the lumber from the dock where it was placed as sawed, and putting it upon stick in said yard, even as against purchasers thereof from the owner of the lumber.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Tucker County to review a judgment in favor of intervening petitioner in a proceeding to enforce a common-law lien on certain lumber claimed to have been purchased by it. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. A. Jay Valentine, for plaintiffs in error:

Defendants had a lien on said lumber for their services in manufacturing the same.

1 Jones, Liens, §§ 4, 998, 999, 1001.

Mr. Samuel T. Spears, for defendant in error:

Defendants lost possession of the lumber at the time it was delivered to Mr. Lentz to be placed on stick and from there hauled by him to the railroad for sale, and, having lost possession, they lost any common-law lien they might have had for labor performed, and had no right to enforce their distress warrant against the property.

1. Jones, Liens, §§ 20-22; Fishell v. Morris, 57 Conn. 547, 6 L.R.A. 82, 18 Atl. 717; 25 Cyc. 662-675; Burroughs v. Ely, 54 W. Va. 118, 102 Am. St. Rep. 926, 46 S. E. 371; Gregory v. Morris, 96 U. S. 619, 24 L. ed. 740.

Where one performs labor upon personal property for another upon the lands or leased premises of the other, he can have no lien upon this personal property because of lack of possession.

Jones, Liens, § 25.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Claiming a common-law lien on certain lumber for a balance of $300 due them for manufacturing the same under a contract with one M. B. Lentz, defendants, proceeding under § 12a, chap. 75, Barnes's Code, sued out of the office of a justice of the peace a distress warrant and caused the same to be levied on said lumber, then on stick at the mill site or yard on the lands of one Bright, from whom Lentz had previously purchased the standing timber out of which said lumber had been so manufactured by them.

Thereupon plaintiff, claiming as purchaser of said lumber from Lentz, executed to the officer a forthcoming bond, and also a suspending bond as provided by statute, and intervened by petition filed in the circuit court of Tucker county, where an issue was made up and tried by the court in lieu of a jury, and the finding and judgment of the court was that the plaintiff was the owner and in possession of the lumber so seized and levied on by the defendants, and that defendants were not entitled to enforce their common-law lien thereon for manufacturing the same as claimed by them, and that the plaintiff was entitled to hold said lumber as its property, free and discharged from the lien so asserted by defendants, and that they recover costs, etc.

The deed from Bright to Lentz for the timber, introduced in evidence, also granted to the latter "a site for the mill and yards, etc., upon the cleared ground of the party of the first part," and gave him two years in which to remove the timber, and also provided that he should have "the right to use the mill site and yards, and everything necessary to run and operate said mill upon the land of the said party of the first part for a period of five years," etc.

The contract in writing between Lentz and defendants recited the acquisition of Lentz from Bright of said timber, and the desire of Lentz as therein specified to have the same manufactured into lumber, whereby defendants agreed to manufacture said timber into lumber, at certain stipulated prices per thousand feet and cross ties at a stipulated price per tie, and which was to include skidding, etc., all to be done in a workmanlike manner, the sawing to be done so as to raise the grade of the lumber. And for said sawing, skidding, and other work to be done by defendants Lentz thereby agreed as follows: "That the work done the previous month shall be paid for the following month, the end of the month being the 20th of each and every month, and all the lumber in the yard shall be estimated at that time, but in making the payments as aforesaid the said party of the first part shall hold and retain 10 per cent of the earnings of the said parties of the second part, at the price aforesaid until the completion of the work."

The evidence of the witnesses shows that defendants moved their mill upon the Bright land where the timber granted to Lentz was located, and there occupied the mill site and lot provided for in the deed; that as the lumber was cut it was placed on a dock near the mill and from there taken by an employee of Lentz and put on stick in the yard, defendants' contract not providing for putting the lumber on stick; but where the contract provides it was to be estimated at the end of each month and paid for as stipulated, except the 10 per cent that was to be retained until the completion of the contract.

Defendants received on account of their work the note of plaintiff to Lentz of $500, turned over to them, the proceeds, less discount, amounting to $490, and when they completed the work about December 6, 1915, Lentz owed them a balance of $300.

The deed from Bright to Lentz is dated August 20, 1915; the contract between Lentz and defendants is dated September 4, 1915; and the contract in writing whereby Lentz undertook to sell the lumber to plaintiff is dated November 27, 1915. In the view we take of the case, however, these dates are unimportant. It is significant that the lumber purporting to be sold by Lentz to plaintiff is described in the contract as that "manufactured and to be manufactured at the Close and Beavers mill on Pleasant run, Tucker county, West Virginia." And the contract further provided that Lentz was to deliver all of said lumber f.o.b. cars at Porterwood, West Virginia, as called for by plaintiff, and that should he fail, then they were to have the right to put on teams and deliver the same at his cost and expense. And one of the provisions of said contract was that the title to said lumber should pass to and be vested in plaintiff, as the same should be placed on stick at the mill where said lumber was then being manufactured, and that the possession thereof should also pass to them as placed on stick.

Defendants proved that on completion of the work they left three persons in charge and possession of the lumber, and that they continued in possession thereof until seized and taken into possession by the officer under the distress warrant, and that they thereby continued to hold and retain a lien on the lumber for the balance due them for manufacturing the same.

On the other hand, plaintiff says, in support of the judgment, that defendants had no lease on the land, but were mere licensees of Lentz, and that, although they owned the mill and occupied the mill site and yard therewith as they contend, they had no such exclusive possession of the land, or of the lumber after it was taken from the dock and placed on stick in the yard, as to support any lien thereon for the work done thereon by them.

That the common law gives to every mechanic, artisan, or other workman a lien for the labor bestowed by him in the manufacture, improvement, or betterment of goods and chattels delivered to him therefor, is conceded by counsel for both parties, and besides is well supported by all the authorities on the subject of liens and bailments. 1 Jones, Liens, 3d ed. § 781; Burrough v. Ely, 54 W. Va. 118, 102 Am. St. Rep. 926, 46 S. E. 371. And this lien applies to lumbermen for manufacturing logs into lumber. 1 Jones, Liens, § 703. Such lien is in most, if not all, respects like a seller's lien for purchase money, and like that exists only so long as possession of the property is held. Respecting the seller's lien and the necessity of retaining possession, it was said in Buskirk Bros. v. Peck, 57 W. Va. 360, 370, 50 S. E. 432, and repeated in Wiggin v. Mankin, 65 W. Va. 219, 226, 63 S. E. 1094: "Although retention of the possession of the property until payment is essential to its existence, yet possession may be constructive or actual, and where goods are sold, counted out, and set apart for the purchaser, but not actually delivered into his possession, the title passes, and there is constructive delivery sufficient to execute the contract, yet the seller had a lien for the purchase money."

Lien—artisan's statute.

While the lien so given by the common law gave the lienor no right except to hold onto the property until his services were paid for (Burrough v. Ely, supra, 3 B. C. L. § 47, p. 125), nevertheless, since the decision in Burrough v. Ely, the legislature of this state, by § 12a, chap. 75, Code, supra, Acts 1909, chap. 43, has at least given the remedy by distress for enforcement of such lien, the remedy pursued in this case, and to that extent it no further enlarged the common-law right.

Whether defendants under the contract, or by the manner of executing the same, ever had or parted with the possession of the lumber in question, so as to give them a lien, or to lose it as claimed by plaintiff, are questions not entirely free from doubt. While it may be true they held no formal lease on the land for mill site and yard, yet we must assume they were let into possession thereof by Lentz under his deed from Bright, with the same rights which were given him for the purpose of sawing, manufacturing, and storing the lumber, contemplated in the deed and in the contract by defendants with him. The mill was there, and necessarily they must have had the exclusive right to and possession of the land occupied by the mill while engaged in cutting the timber into lumber; and while their contract did not call for sticking the lumber as sawed, neither did it specifically provide that it was to be stacked by Lentz. Necessarily, the contract implied some disposition of the lumber, and, as already observed, it specifically provided for its location on the yard and an estimate thereof, from month to month and payment therefor by Lentz. The only thing which Lentz did or was suffered to do was to put his man in the yard and to place the lumber on stick as it came from the mill. Can it be assumed from this that the parties contemplated, or that defendants, who provided in their contract for estimates or measurements of the lumber while still in the yard and at the mill, intended that it should go out of their possession, or to waive or relinquish their lien thereon for the price of manufacturing the same? We cannot bring ourselves to the conclusion that such was the contract or the legal effect of their conduct towards the property. The evidence shows, on the contrary, that on completing the sawing defendants left representatives in charge of the lumber, and that within three days thereafter they sued out the distress warrant and caused the lumber to be taken into the possession of the officer, and thereby did everything in their power to preserve and enforce their lien. Nor do we think they lost the lien by the fact that the representative of Lentz took the lumber from the dock and placed it on stick in the yard.

That act is not inconsistent with possession thereof by defendants for the purpose of their lien. The case is not thereby brought within the principles laid down in 1 Jones on Liens, §§ 22 and 25, relied on by counsel. The case here is not like the instance noted in § 22, of the owners of a saw-mill who permitted boards sawed by them to be moved from the mill; nor like the brickmaker referred to in § 25, who was practically only an employee of the owner of the plant, as in the case from Massachusetts, King v. Indian Orchard Canal Co. 11 Cush. 231, cited for the text will show. Moreover, we find Moore v. Hitchcock, 4 Wend. 292, also a brickmaker's case, holding that the plaintiff had a lien for brick made at the plant and on the land of the owner, under a similar contract, and that he could maintain trover against one who wrongfully took the same from his possession under execution against the owner. The delivery of a portion only of the goods does not defeat the lien. 6 C. J. 1136, § 85(b). And in Robinson v. Larrabee, 63 Me. 116, 117, it is said: "There is no question but [that] the voluntary relinquishment by the bailee, of possession of the subject of the bailment, discharges his lien, unless it is consistent with the contract, the course of business, or the intention of the parties."

The mere fact that Lentz's representative came on the mill yard and put the lumber on stick, where it was to remain until estimated or measured and payments made, does not evince intention on the part of the defendants to relinquish any right given them by law. Nor is the case here like that presented in Walker v. Cassels, 70 S. C. 271, 49 S. E. 862, holding that, "where the sawing of certain lumber had been completed, and the sawyers had left the ground without leaving any agent in charge, and plaintiff stacked the lumber, and used some of it, and sold a considerable portion of it," and where it was held the sawyer thereby lost or waived his lien. Nor is this case like McMaster v. Merrick, 41 Mich. 505, 2 N. W. 895, where the acts of the sawyers were inconsistent with their intention to assert a lien, and where they did nothing to preserve or enforce the same, and where, indeed, the contract did not contemplate such a lien, and which case is distinguished in Bank of Montreal v. J. E. Potts Salt & Lumber Co. 91 Mich. 342, 51 N. W. 890, the case of a salt manufacturer, and in which it was held that the contractor, under the circumstances of that case, not unlike those in this case, had not lost his lien.

From all which we conclude that the possession on the yard of the lumber in question was the possession of the defendants, and that they had not parted therewith at the time they sued out the distress warrant and caused the officer to seize the same for the debt due them, and that their lien thereon remained intact and enforceable by such distress.

We, therefore, reverse the judgment and remand the case to the Circuit Court to be therein further proceeded with in accordance with the principles herein enunciated, and further according to law.

ANNOTATION.

Common-law lien on personality for work performed thereon, upon the owner's premises.

At common law, mechanics and artisans have a right to retain personal property delivered to them, upon which they have bestowed labor and services, until the charge thereby attaching to it is paid. Whether this common-law lien attaches to personal property where the work is done on the owner's premises is the question for investigation in this note. The court in the reported case (KEYSTONE MFG. CO. v. CLOSE, ante, 857) takes the view that under the circumstances of that case there was a common-law lien.

In Bank of Montreal v. J. E. Potts Salt & Lumber Co. (1892) 91 Mich. 342, 51 N. W. 890, one who manufactured salt at the owner's "salt lot" under an agreement with the owner by which he was to furnish all the barrels, nails, lime, butter, etc., to pay all needed repairs on said lot except certain specified warranties, and to deliver such salt piled in workmanlike manner on a dock erected and used exclusively in connection with this salt lot, and was to be responsible for the same until it should be delivered to the boat or vessel, from the said dock, was held to have a lien on salt located on the dock and on the salt lot, for the agreed price under the contract.

One employed by the owner of a brickyard to make brick, under a contract by which the possession of the yard was in the lien claimant, for the purpose of his contract, and who remained in the possession of the yard and of the brick at the date of the seizure thereof by an execution creditor of the owner of the yard, was held entitled to a lien on the brick in Roberts v. Bank of Toronto (1894) 21 Ont. App. Rep. 629. The court states that as between the lien claimant and the owner the lien claimant was there, at least, by license to do a specific work under contract, not as a mere servant or laborer. It seems that the owner of the brickyard had been selling portions of the brick, and the court states, as to this fact, that the evidence fully warrants the conclusion that this was done with the lien claimant's consent and by arrangement with him, and to obtain money to pay the lien claimant and his men, as agreed upon.

In Moore v. Hitchcock (1830) 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 292, a brickmaker who manufactured a quantity of brick in a brickyard furnished by another, together with wood and all other necessities to carry on the work, under an agreement by which he was to receive a stated price per thousand for the brick, made and shipped, on the return of the vessel on which the same was carried to market, was held to have a lien for his labor on brick which were in the yard when seized under an execution against the owner of the yard, and purchased by the defendant. The court states that by the provision of the contract as to the shipment, the lien claimant agreed to waive his lien as against the owner, and was not to receive his pay until the vessel which carried the brick to market should return, but that this was a personal credit to the owner, founded on the confidence reposed in him, and did not interfere with the lien.

It seems to be assumed in Oakes v. Moore (1844) 24 Me. 214, 41 Am. Dec. 379, that one who cuts timber upon the land of another may have a lien at common law. But it is held in that case that, if he removes the timber and delivers it for the purpose of being sawed into lumber, his right to a lien is gone because of the surrender of possession.

See Shaw v. Kaler (1871) 106 Mass. 448, infra.

If the lien claimant has no right in respect to the land of the owner on which the work is done, it is quite well settled that there can be no lien at common law, because there is then no such unqualified possession of the property as is necessary to support the lien.

Thus, one employed by the owner of timber to cut the timber into logs and put the logs in the owner's mill pond, who had cut and skidded the logs on the tract from which they were cut, was held to have no lien thereon, at common law, in Fitzgerald v. Elliott (1894) 162 Pa. 118, 42 Am. St. Rep. 812, 29 Atl. 346. Whether the owner of the timber owned the land from which they were taken did not appear in the evidence, and the court states that it is not material; that "the possession of the timber was in the owner of it, and that possession was not changed or affected by the arrangement under which the logs were cut and skidded by the plaintiff. The latter was not a bailee of the timber, or of the logs cut therefrom. He was employed to cut the timber into logs and put them in his employer's mill pond. There was nothing in the nature of his employment which gave him an independent and exclusive possession of the timber or logs at any time, but on the contrary the agreement under which he was to do the work was inconsistent with his claim of a right to the possession of them until he was paid for his labor. He cut and skidded the logs where his employer had the right to cut and skid them, preparatory to their removal to his mill. If the plaintiff had a common-law lien upon the logs for his work, then he who cuts firewood or splits rails from his employer's timber, and hauls, or agreed to haul, the firewood to his employer's house, or the rails to designated points on his farm for the purpose of fencing it, has a like lien." The court states that the "fundamental error in the plaintiff's contention lies in his assumption that he had an independent possession of the property, when in fact such possession as he had was that of his employer. Maxwell [the employer] was in possession of the Dixon tract for the work that plaintiff did for him there, whether he owned it or not; the land on which the timber lay and the logs were cut and skidded was in his possession for the purpose for which his employee used it. It follows that the rights of the plaintiff in respect to lien and possession were the same as if his employer owned the land on which the work was done. In cutting and skidding the logs where he did, he was exercising his employer's right to cut and skid them there."

One who, under an agreement with the lessee of a brickyard, was to prepare a yard and kiln for manufacturing brick, to perform all labor connected therewith, the lessee to furnish all materials and apparatus, and to pay so much per thousand for their manufacture, was held not to be entitled to a lien upon the brick so manufactured. King v. Indian Orchard Canal Co. (1853) 11 Cush. (Mass.) 231. The court states that "upon the undisputed facts of this case it appears to us that the plaintiff fails to show any such possession of the property in question as will support the lien which he sets up in order to maintain this action. In the first place, he shows no right or interest in himself, either as owner, lessee, or tenant, to the possession of the yard in which the brick were made and burned. By virtue of the contract with the defendant corporation who owned the land, Stearns [the lessee] had the right to occupy the ground for a brickyard during the continuance of his contract, without charge, and for a year subsequent to the expiration of the contract at a moderate rent. This gave to Stearns the possession of the premises for the time specified, but it does not appear that Stearns, either by his written contract with the plaintiff for the manufacture of the brick, or by any verbal agreement or acts, surrendered the possession thereof to the plaintiff. On the contrary, it is especially provided by the written contract that Stearns shall prepare the brickyard and fit it for use, and that he shall furnish and deliver on the premises from time to time, as required, the materials for making and burning the brick, clearly implying that Stearns was to continue in possession, and it was proved at the trial that, in point of fact, the workmen of Stearns were employed in the yard, enlarging and filling it up during the whole summer, while the plaintiff was engaged in striking the brick, and preparing and burning the kilns. Upon these facts it is manifest that the plaintiff never had any exclusive and unconditional possession of the property. It was, at most, only a mixed possession with Stearns, or rather a right in the plaintiff to enter upon and use the yard of Stearns, for the purpose of making and burning the brick. It is entirely clear that such a restricted and limited possession is insufficient to support a lien. It amounts to nothing more than the ordinary transaction of work done by one person in the manufacture or repair of articles for another, upon the premises of the latter. The workman in such a case has, to a certain extent, possession of the property upon which his labor and services are expended, but it is a qualified and mixed possession, which can form no valid basis for a lien." It is further stated that if the plaintiff ever had any possession of the brick, it was relinquished by him when his foreman left the yard to do work elsewhere, and that the lessee, after that time, was in the sole and exclusive possession and control thereof.

Under a statute making possession a necessary requisite of the lien, a laborer employed by one who purchased logs to cut, skid, and draw the logs has not, from the fact of such employment, shown such a possession of the logs as entitles him to a lien. O'Clair v. Hale (1898) 35 App. Div. 77, 54 N. Y. Supp. 388. The decision in this case is approved in an action in which one who had cut, trimmed, and prepared logs to be sawed, and hauled the same to a sawmill, was claiming a lien. Brackett v. Pierson (1906) 114 App. Div. 281, 99 N. Y. Supp. 770. The court states that while the lien law of this state had been codified, there had been no attempt to enlarge the lien given to the artisan beyond that given by common law.

One employed to head and stack wheat grown on the land of the owner, who performed the services for which he is employed, does not have such a possession of the wheat as entitles him to a lien under a statute requiring possession as a condition precedent to a lien. The court states that there could be no greater absurdity than to hold that an employee of a farmer, to perform labor upon the farm, would be entitled to a lien for the work bestowed in cultivating the land or harvesting the crops, in the absence of a special contract creating it, to be followed by an actual and physical change of possession in the nature of a pledge; and, with reference to the facts of a particular case, states that the very fact that the wheat was stacked upon the owner's land, in the absence of a special agreement, precluded the possibility of an unqualified possession by the person who performed the work. McDearmid v. Foster (1887) 14 Or. 417, 12 Pac. 813.

In Shaw v. Kaler (1871) 106 Mass. 448, the supreme court of Massachusetts, however, held that one who made piano cases, at an agreed price for each upon the premises of the other party to the contract, the latter furnishing the material and also bench room for the lien claimant, was held to have such possession of the cases as entitled him to maintain an action against a wrongdoer who took possession of them. When the material was furnished by the owner of the shop it was taken and retained by the lien claimant in the portion of the shop assigned to him; the lien claimant owned the bench tools and employed and paid men to assist him in making the cases, and, during the time when he was making the cases, he retained the actual possession of them until, on being finished, they were delivered to the owner of the building; and the cases in question were retained by the lien claimant in the manner thus stated, and were in his possession at the time when the defendant, against the plaintiff's consent, took them. This decision, however, turns upon the insufficiency of the defendant's claim rather than upon the existence of a lien. The court, however, does hold that the lien claimant had possession, and states that in the action of trespass, as possession is prima facie evidence of right, a mere stranger cannot deprive the party of that possession without showing some authority or right of the true owner to justify the taking. The case of King v. Indian Orchard Canal Co. (Mass.) supra, is stated to have very little bearing upon the question; that the plaintiff in that case wholly failed to make out his own actual possession, and the defendant claimed under a bill of sale from the true owner; that in both these particulars that case differed entirely from the case at bar.

In some cases the courts have denied a lien from a consideration of all the circumstances. In McMaster v. Merrick (1879) 41 Mich. 505, 2 N. W. 895, there was held to be no lien in favor of the lessee of the sawmill on lumber sawed by him for the owner, on the theory that no lien was contemplated by the contract of the parties, who had acted as if there was no lien until after the lessors had become bankrupt, the court stating that where no lien was claimed in the past one cannot be created in the future. The lessees had recognized the rights of various creditors of the lessor, to part of the lumber, and it is stated that this recognition was inconsistent with the lessees' lien if they claimed one; that they took no steps to assert it distinctly, when all the facts appearing indicated its nonexistence; that upon the termination of the lease the lumber was on the premises of the general owner, and that no lien could exist without some distinct possession, and this was effectually negative of the recognition without denial or qualification of the right of possession and disposal in the assignees and transferees of the general owner.

For ordinary work done as a laborer on personal property on the premises of another there is no lien. One who agreed to remove fixtures for the owner from one store to another was held not to have a lien on the fixtures in the store of the owner, in A. F. Engelhardt Co. v. Benjamin (1896) 5 App. Div. 475, 39 N. Y. Supp. 31.

The laborers on a farm have been held to have no common-law lien upon the crops. Hunt v. Wing (1872) 10 Heisk. (Tenn.) 139. W. A. E.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term, Part II., for New York County, granting plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings, in an action brought to enforce a stay bond. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Henry L. Scheuerman, with Messrs. Mortimer H. Hess and Theodore F. Kuper, for appellant:

The trial court erred in granting plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings.

Bauer v. Dewey, 166 N. Y. 402, 60 N. E. 30; Charles F. Garrigues Co. v. Casualty Co. of America, 220 N. Y. 588, 115 N. E. 1036; Putnam v. Schuyler, 4 Hun, 166; Osborn v. Robbins, 36 N. Y. 365; Morehouse v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 185 N. Y. 520, 78 N. E. 179, 7 Ann. Cas. 377.

Messrs. Lehmaier & Pellet, for respondent:

A party, when sued upon his obligation, cannot avail himself of an independent cause of action existing in favor of his principal against the plaintiff, as a defense or counterclaim.

Andrews, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff brought an action in the city court in New York against one Theodore Kruger. The latter desired to obtain a stay of the trial of that action. To obtain such result he stipulated in open court to give to the plaintiff a surety company bond, providing that, in the event of the ultimate affirmance and final determination of a certain other action between the same parties then on appeal, the amount involved in the action in which he desired a stay should be paid to the plaintiff, with costs. Thereafter he obtained a bond from the National Surety

Company, and the action was, in fact, stayed. Subsequently, the action on appeal was affirmed and finally determined in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant Kruger did not pay the amount involved in the action stayed, and this action was brought against the surety company to enforce its bond.

The defense interposed is that the stipulation with regard to the stay was obtained from Kruger by the plaintiff through fraud; and the only question involved in this appeal is whether or not such defense is available to the surety.

In the past the answer to this question has not been altogether clear. Putnam v. Schuyler, 4 Hun, 166; Morse v. Hovey, 9 Paige, 197; Parshall v. Lamoreaux, 37 Barb. 189; Strong v. Grannis, 26 Barb. 122; Morehouse v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 185 N. Y. 520, 78 N. E. 179, 7 Ann. Cas. 377; Aeschlimann v. Presbyterian Hospital, 165 N. Y. 296, 80 Am. St. Rep. 723, 59 N. E. 148; Osborn v. Robbins, 36 N. Y. 365; Whitcomb v. Shultz, 138 C. C. A. 510, 223 Fed. 268; Patterson v. Gibson, 81 Ga. 802, 12 Am. St. Rep. 356, 10 S. E. 9; Griffith v. Sitgreaves, 90 Pa. 161.

It should be observed, however, that in some of the cases cited whatever is said on the subject is purely obiter. In others the defense interposed by the surety was duress practised on the principal. These are not in point because they are based upon the proposition that the minds of the parties to the contract did not meet, and that, therefore, there was no contract. If so, or if the alleged contract was void, clearly the surety would not be liable.

Principal and surety — liability of surety — void contract.

Many of the duress cases may also be distinguished on the theory that the surety was closely related to the principal. Such is the distinction taken in Plummer v. People, 16 Ill. 358. There it was said that sureties upon a recognizance cannot plead the duress of the principal unless they bear some such relation to each other as father and son, or husband and wife. In such cases the relations between the parties are so intimate that the constraint upon one is supposed to act with equal force upon the other. To the same effect is Harris v. Carmody, 131 Mass. 51, 41 Am. Rep. 188.

The rule that prevails in this state, however, is clearly laid down in Elliott v. Brady, 192 N. Y. 221, 226, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 600, 127 Am. St. Rep. 898, 85 N. E. 69. The opinion is by Judge Chase, and it was concurred in by all the court except Chief Judge Cullen, who concurred in the result. "A party when sued upon his obligation cannot avail himself of an independent cause of action [here, fraud inducing the contract] existing in favor of his principal against the plaintiff as a defense or counterclaim. It is for the principal to determine what use he will make thereof, and the surety has no control over him in this respect."

A contract induced by fraud is not void. It is voidable at the option of the party defrauded, and it requires affirmative action on his part to relieve him of the obligation. Baird v. New York, 96 N. Y. 567. If he elects to avoid the contract he can do so only on the condition of returning what he has received under it. If he elects not to avoid it he has an independent cause of action for damages arising from the fraud. Hazard v. Irwin, 18 Pick. 95; Henry v. Daley, 17 Hun, 210.

Fraud — effect on contract.

—return of property.

—action for damages.

This cause of action belongs to him, not to the surety. The latter is not defrauded and cannot maintain an action for damages occasioned by the fraud. The surety could be allowed such damages as a defense or counterclaim only upon some principle that would make the recovery of them by him a bar to any future action or counterclaim by the principal. He might thus bar a large claim in favor of the latter by canceling a small one against himself.

"If the principal could abide by the contract, and the surety repudiate it, the strange result would be produced that the principal would retain the fruits of the contract, whilst the surety would avoid the performance of his obligation on the ground of its invalidity, in direct opposition to the acts of his principal, admitting that the contract was valid." Evans v. Keeland, 9 Ala. 42.

In other words, what shall be done with a contract induced by fraud is purely a question for the determination of the party on whom the fraud is committed. He may repudiate it, and if he does so the surety may avail himself of the repudiation, as was done in Bennett v. Carey, 72 Iowa, 476, 34 N. W. 291. He may affirm it, in which case the surety cannot be heard to raise the question. He may suspend his action, at least for a time, and the surety may not compel him to elect. Henry v. Daley, 17 Hun, 210; Evans v. Keeland, supra; Tucker v. State, 72 Ind. 242; Thompson v. Buckhannon, 2 J. J. Marsh. 416; Oak v. Dustin, 79 Me. 23, 1 Am. St. Rep. 281, 7 Atl. 815; Bowman v. Hiller, 130 Mass. 153, 39 Am. Rep. 442; Robinson v. Gould, 11 Cush. 55.

Some of these cases are cases of duress and, as we have said, such cases, where it is held that the surety may plead the duress, are not strictly in point. Where they reach the contrary conclusion, however, they are authority.

A distinction is sometimes made between cases where the surety is sued alone, and those where he is sued together with his principal. But it is difficult to see how the fact that the principal is joined with the surety is material. If so, the rights of the parties depend upon the form of the action and the will of the plaintiff. For the latter cannot be compelled to bring in the principal as a defendant in an action brought by him to obtain a money judgment. Bauer v. Dewey, 166 N. Y. 402, 60 N. E. 30.

Of course, if principal and surety are in fact sued, and the principal sets up the defense that the contract should be set aside on the ground of fraud, the surety may undoubtedly avail himself of the same defense. If the principal succeeds there is nothing upon which to base the obligation of suretyship. But the principal may not choose to take any position. He may default in the action, or he may ratify the contract and counterclaim for the damages caused by the fraud. In no event can he be deprived of his right to ratify the contract or deprived of his independent cause of action to recover damages for the fraud.

ANNOTATION.

Right of surety to avoid contract for fraud on principal.

Generally.

Where the person bound as principal in a contract defends on the ground that it was procured by fraud, his surety is entitled to make the same defense against his liability thereon. Hagar v. Mounts (1832) 3 Blackf. (Ind.) 57; Hazard v. Irwin (1846) 18 Pick. (Mass.) 95; Macey v. Heger (1900) 195 Pa. 125, 45 Atl. 675.

In Macey v. Heger (Pa.) supra, the action was on a bond conditioned for the faithful performance by one of the defendants of his contract for excavating, grading, and concrete work. The president of the plaintiff company had represented to the subcontractor that only a certain amount of work was necessary. On that representation the principal signed the agreement. On finding that the statements were incorrect and untrue, the principal demanded a reformation of the contract, and, on the plaintiff's refusal to consent thereto, quit work. Both the principal and the surety defended on the ground of fraud. The court held that the fraud of the plaintiff was equally as effective as a defense in an action on a bond given to secure the performance of a contract as in an action to recover damages for a breach of contract.

In Hagar v. Mounts (Ind.) supra, it appeared that the defendant accepted a note from a member of a partnership for his individual debt, signed with the firm name and indorsed by a third person. The note was given without the knowledge of the other member of the partnership, and the indorser understood that he was indorsing a firm note. In an action on the note the defrauded member of the firm and the indorser set up the fraud of the other member of the partnership. The court held that a fraud was committed against the innocent member of the partnership, and also on the indorser, and that evidence should have been admitted tending to show this, saying: "This is a fraud on Hagar, and the note does not bind him. The note, appearing on its face to be the note of Wilson & Hagar, is executed by Hart with the intention of being their surety. If it was fraudulent and void as to Hagar, it must be so also as to Hart. Hart might be willing to be surety for the firm of Wilson & Hagar, but not for Wilson alone. The evidence offered, therefore, constituted a good bar to the action, and ought to have been admitted by the circuit court."

In Hazard v. Irwin (1846) 18 Pick. (Mass.) 95, an action on a contract for the purchase of an engine, which the defendants had signed as sureties, the defendants set up the repudiation of the contract by their principal because of the fraud of the plaintiff. The court held that the sureties could plead such repudiation, saying: "Fraud in the terms of a contract of sale renders it not absolutely void, but voidable at the election of the party defrauded. The rule is designed for his security and protection. If he is desirous to retain the commodity, and carry the contract into effect, although he has been imposed upon and cheated in the terms of it, he undoubtedly has a right so to do. He may be so situated that, although conscious that he has been grossly defrauded, yet so urgent may be his necessity for the immediate use of the article purchased that he would rather submit to the imposition than repudiate the contract. In such case, neither the other contracting party nor a stranger can avoid the contract on that ground. But we think this argument is not warranted by the pleas; but the pleas do state, not perhaps in the most precise and formal manner, but with a certainty sufficient after verdict, that the principal, Penman, did repudiate and rescind this contract. . . . The effect of the plea, therefore, is not that the contract between the plaintiff and defendants is void on the ground of fraud, but that, taking it to be valid and in full force, there is nothing due upon it from the defendants as sureties, because, the original contract between the plaintiff and Penman having been justifiably repudiated by the principal, there is nothing due from him."

In Bennett v. Carey (1887) 72 Iowa, 476, 34 N. W. 291, it was held that a guarantor of the performance of a contract by two persons was released where, by reason of the fraud practised on him, one of those persons was not bound by the contract. The court said: "When the original case was before us, we held that, if the facts as to the alleged mutual mistake were as claimed by Gunnison, no contract existed between him and defendant. See Carey v. Gunnison (1885) 65 Iowa, 702, 22 N. W. 934. And if Gunnison was induced to sign the writing by the fraudulent representation and concealment alleged the same result would follow. In either case, he was not bound by the writing; so that plaintiff is not seeking to avoid liability on the ground that he has been released by matters occurring subsequent to the execution of the contract, but the theory of his defense is that he was induced to guarantee the performance of certain undertakings by his principals, in the belief that they were both bound by the contract, whereas, by reason of the wrong or mistake of defendant, one of them, and the only one against whom he would have any adequate remedy in case of default, was not bound by the undertaking. His defense, in effect, is that there was no consideration for his undertaking, and such want of consideration was the result of defendant's wrong or mistake; and we think that proof of either the fraud or mistake alleged will establish that defense. Of course, this proof must be made in the original action. It must be established in that action that Gunnison is not bound by the written contract, or the defense will not be available to plaintiff."

Where the misrepresentation is insufficient to discharge the principal, the surety cannot avail himself of it. Bryant v. Crosby (1853) 36 Me. 562, 58 Am. Dec. 767, wherein it appeared that the defendant's testator signed a conditional bill of sale as surety. In an action on the contract the defendant set up, among other things, fraudulent representations on the part of plaintiff, the vendor, made to the principal. The court held that a surety could not avail himself of the defense of fraud practised on his principal, except when his principal could. In that case it was said: "A surety cannot be discharged on the ground of fraudulent representations made to his principal, except when that principal would be. The plaintiff could not in law be considered as conducting fraudulently, unless he knew that the representations were false. To make him lose his security because his representations were untrue, when he did not know them to be so, is to impose upon him the risk of a warrantor. A fraudulent concealment of facts from his principal would not necessarily have the effect to discharge the surety; while he would be relieved so far as his principal would be."

Where the surety has given his note, taking up his principal's, he becomes the principal, and therefore loses any defense which he might have had under the old note by reason of fraud on the principal. Fluker v. Henry (1855) 27 Ala. 403, wherein the court said: "The giving of the note sued on by the defendant, 'in discharge of the balance remaining due on the original note,' changed the relation between him and J. G. Dent & Company. On the original note, he was their surety; but, by giving his own note 'in discharge' of it, he became their creditor. He cannot, in this suit, be regarded as their surety, or as entitled to make any defense which rests upon the existing relation of principal and surety. He is the principal, the sole principal, in the note sued on, and must be so treated in the present action. . . . If a defense, either total or partial, could have been made to the original note, in consequence of fraud in the sale of the negro for which it was given, or of the breach of the warranty of his soundness, the discharge of that note, by giving the note here sued on, destroys the right of the defendant to make that defense in this suit."

In absence of repudiation of contract by principal.

By the weight of authority, where a contract has been procured by fraud a surety for the performance thereof is not entitled to set up that fraud in defense against his liability, unless the principal has, by reason of the fraud, repudiated the contract. Stockton Sav. & L. Soc. v. Giddings (1892) 96 Cal. 84, 21 L.R.A. 406, 81 Am. St. Rep. 181, 30 Pac. 1016; Brown v. Wright (1828) 7 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 396, 18 Am. Dec. 190; Walker v. Gilbert (1846) 7 Smedes & M. (Miss.) 456. And see the reported case (ETTLINGER v. NATIONAL SURETY Co. ante, 865).

Thus, in Walker v. Gilbert (Miss.) supra, it appeared in an action to enjoin a judgment at law that the complainant was surety on a promissory note, which he contended had been obtained by fraud. The court held that a surety could not take advantage of a fraud perpetrated on his principal, where the principal did not complain, saying: "This contract of sale was made between Puckett, and Enloe, Johnson, & Company, and if there was fraud in the transaction it was perpetrated on Puckett, who was the purchaser, and to whom the deed was made. Walker sets out in his bill that he was a mere surety; the consideration did not pass to him, but to Puckett; but Puckett does not complain of fraud in the contract; he is no party to this proceeding, and, for anything that appears, is content with his bargain. Suppose, then, the injunction should be made perpetual, what is the consequence? It would not vacate the contract. Puckett may still insist upon the contract. The effect would be to take from the vendor a part of his security, and leave the contract in force. Can this be done? It is evident that no decree that could be made in this cause could affect Puckett, for he is no party; the court cannot, therefore, interfere with his contract. Puckett and Fall were both defendants to the judgment, and the injunction suspended the execution as to them as well as to complainant. No reason whatever is shown why they are not made parties, which should have been done if practicable. No relief could be given to the complainant without vacating the contract, which, under the circumstances, cannot be done. Walker cannot complain that the contract was void for want of consideration. The consideration was received by Puckett, which was sufficient to make the contract binding on Walker. Puckett seems to be still satisfied with his bargain; he does not deny but what he has received a full consideration; he does not aver that any fraud was practised on him. If he were before us he might admit that he purchased with full notice of encumbrances."

In Brown v. Wright (1828) 7 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 396, 18 Am. Dec. 190, a bill was instituted to obtain an injunction relieving the plaintiff from three judgments obtained against him at law, founded on three notes executed by him as surety. The plaintiff maintained that his principals were induced to enter into the contract by reason of the false and fraudulent representations of the vendor as to the lots which his principals were induced to purchase. The principals were made parties defendant. The court held that the surety could not obtain equitable relief from his obligation, on the ground of fraud in the sale, without showing that his principal and the vendor had combined to defraud him, since the principal had the right to waive any equities which he might have and proceed with the contract. The court said: "If we waive the objections against this decree of a perpetual injunction, without setting aside the contract in toto, we cannot perceive on what principle the court below could have given relief to the surety, on the equity set up, without that relief being asked by the principal. The principal, it is true, is made a defendant; but it is not even suggested in the bill that he resists the fulfilment of the contract, or desires relief from it. The grounds relied on are fraud, delusion, and failure of consideration, for the purpose of setting aside the contract. It must rest on the election of the principal whether he will or will not avail himself of these grounds, if they exist. He still has a right to waive this equity and insist on a fulfilment, and his surety has not a right to make that election for him. Indeed, so far as the bill in this case shows, it is not even the surety forcing the principal into the measure of setting aside the contract, but it is an attempt on the part of the surety to relieve himself by the equity of a supposed fraud on his principal, leaving his principal hereafter to act as he chooses; and not only the principal, hereafter, but the cosurety, have a right each to their bill for relief, or a right to waive the equity. It is, in general, true, that a surety, where the defense rests in an equity against the contract, follows the fate of the principal, and is bound when the principal is bound, and released when the principal is released; and there are cases where, if the contract be voidable only in equity, and that at the election of the principal, the surety cannot make that election for him; and such we conceive this case to be. Whether in such cases, if the principal should refuse to make the defense by way of a fraud on his surety and combination with the opposite party, there might not still be relief granted to the surety, we need not now determine. For, if there be such, the fraud and collusion, or combination, ought to be charged in the bill and made out in evidence; and here there is no attempt to do so. We therefore conceive that, under the circumstances of this case, the complainant cannot avail himself of the equity which he has set up."

In Stockton Sav. & L. Soc. v. Giddings (Cal.) supra, the action was instituted on a note given for a certain machine which some of the defendants were induced to purchase by the fraudulent representations of an agent of the manufacturer. One of the defendants was not a party to the sale, but merely signed the note as a surety. The plaintiff held the notes as collateral security as against any overdrafts of the manufacturer. All of the defendants set up the fraudulent representations and breach of warranty. The court held, among other things, that a surety cannot avail himself of the defense of fraud on his principal, because, unless a person who has been defrauded elects to avoid a contract on the ground of fraud, he is bound by the contract, saying: "It is sometimes said that fraud vitiates the contract, but ordinarily that only means that a party may avoid the contract on that ground; but if he does not elect to do so, he is bound by his contract, and in such case the surety cannot set it up as a defense. If the claim be for damages on account of fraud, the surety cannot avail himself of the defense, for the reasons already given."

Where there are two principals, both must avoid the contract before the sureties can avoid their obligation. Kirby v. Spiller (1887) 88 Ala. 481, 3 So. 700, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff and two of the defendants were joint owners of a steamboat. The plaintiff sold his interest to his co-owners, representing to the one that the boat was making money. The other four defendants were sureties on the balance of the purchase price. In an action to recover the balance of the purchase price, the defrauded defendant and all the sureties set up as a defense and grounds for recoupment the fraudulent representation of plaintiff. Demurrers to the several pleas were sustained. In affirming that judgment, the court held that the defense could not be split so as to allow a judgment against one of defendants and a recoupment for the others. Only one judgment could be rendered. It was said: "In actions at law, prosecuted against several joint contractors, no defense which does not go to the equal defense of all can be maintained, unless it be of the class called personal. Infancy, coverture, non est factum, discharge in bankruptcy, and some others are classed as personal defenses, and not only may, but must, be separately pleaded. As to the defense attempted in this case, it must be available to all alike—must be in total or partial bar of the entire action. The reason is obvious. Only one judgment can be rendered—a money judgment for the plaintiff, a general judgment for all the defendants, or a balance certified in their favor, and a judgment therefor in favor of all of them. To allow a judgment against different defendants for different amounts would be to split up one joint action, founded on one and the same contract, into several distinct recoveries. Courts of common law, by reason of their established methods, are incapable of thus molding the relief they administer. To test the question: Let it be supposed that, in this case, it should be found that Samuel had not been defrauded, and was, therefore, liable for the whole amount of the claim sued for; that Kirby had been defrauded, and was entitled to recoup, or set-off, to the extent of one-half the notes; what judgment or judgments could be rendered? And what judgment should be rendered against the sureties, who had made themselves equally bound for Samuel's default and for Kirby's? It is no answer to this that Kirby claims the right to recoup for the entire amount claimed, and, therefore, if he makes his defense good, no judgment will be rendered against him. The rule, to be susceptible of administration, must be alike applicable to partial and to total recoupment. Otherwise, all the labor and strain of a trial must be gone through with, before it can be known whether the defense is total or partial, and, therefore, whether or not the court has jurisdiction to entertain it. Neither recoupment, set-off, nor failure of consideration, is available as a defense for Kirby, under the circumstances shown in this record, and the circuit court did not err in its rulings on the demurrers. If Kirby is entitled to any redress for the misrepresentation and deceit he complains of, he must seek it in a separate action."

But in Putnam v. Schuyler (1875) 4 Hun (N. Y.) 166, 6 Thomp. & C. 485, it appeared that two notes were made in favor of the plaintiff's testator. The defendant guaranteed the payment of the notes. The maker of the notes had since died. In an action on the notes against the sureties, the defendant offered to prove that the plaintiff's testator had induced defendant's principal to make such notes by fraudulent representations. The court held that such evidence should be admitted, as an obligee who has been guilty of fraud stands in no better position against the surety than against the principal. It was said: "And I find no case which intimates that, when a person has obtained an obligation from a principal by fraud, he can wipe out the fraud by obtaining a surety to the obligation. Assuming that in justice and equity, the obligee, by reason of fraudulent acts on his part, has either no claim or a less claim against the principal, I see no reason why he should stand in a better position against the guarantor. The distinction which has been pointed out, viz., that inability on the part of the principal to contract is no defense to the guarantor, while fraud in the contract is, may be found in the civil law. This says that personal defenses do not pass to others, but that defenses inherent in the thing, such as, among others, fraud and duress, are available to sureties. If, in the principal obligation, there is any essential vice which may annul it, as, if it has been contracted by force, if it is contrary to law, or to good manners, if it be founded only on a fraud, or on some error which may suffice to annul it,—in all these cases the obligation of the surety is likewise annulled. The defendant offered to prove acts of the plaintiff's testator, tending to show that he obtained the notes improperly from the maker, that he took advantage of her confidence in him, and that she did not owe him. If these facts be true, he ought neither to recover of her representatives on the notes, nor of the defendant on her guaranties."

It has been held, however, that a surety may defend on the ground that the contract of his principal was procured by fraud, though the principal does not repudiate the contract. Whitcomb v. Shultz (1913) 138 C. C. A. 510, 223 Fed. 268, writ of certiorari denied in (1915) 238 U. S. 632, 59 L. ed. 1498, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 937; Wile v. Wright (1871) 32 Iowa, 451.

In Whitcomb v. Shultz (Fed.) supra, an action in equity for the release of a surety from his obligation because of an alleged fraudulent misrepresentation made to the principal, it was said: "If a contract had been obtained by fraud, the courts have held that that fact would be sufficient justification for a surety's release from his guaranty, even though his principal may have failed to bring suit to annul the original contract. No cause has been brought to our attention in which it is stated to be the law that when a person has obtained an obligation by fraud he can wipe out the fraud by obtaining a surety to the obligation. The contrary is declared to be the law in Bryant v. Crosby (1853) 36 Me. 562, 58 Am. Dec. 767, supra. The courts say it is always open to a surety to show that the contract which he has guaranteed was obtained from his principal by fraud or duress. And such was the rule of the civil law. Strahan's Domet, bk. 3, title 4, § 5, art. 2; id. bk. 3, title 4, § 1, art. 10; Dig. 44, l. de exceptionibus, chap. 7, § 1; Cod. 2, 24 (23), de fide juss, 2. We do not controvert this proposition. What we do say is that the fraud must relate to material matters."

In Wile v. Wright (Iowa) supra, it appeared that the principal was procured by fraud to purchase a patent right. A third person deposited with the seller a bond as security for the performance of the contract, which bond the seller converted to his own use. In sustaining a recovery by the surety against the seller, the court said: "After a careful consideration of the case, we are constrained to hold that the court below adopted the correct view. It may well be inferred that the supposed ability of Fear to pay his assumed liability out of the profits of his purchase constituted the inducement to plaintiff to deposit the bond as security for such payment. If the patent proved worthless, the deposit with defendant was made under circumstances different from those that were supposed to exist. If, then, the defendant be allowed to retain and appropriate this deposit, he is permitted to substitute for plaintiff's agreement one which he did not make and would not voluntarily have made.

It seems to us manifestly unjust that the perpetrator of a fraud should be allowed to avail himself of the proceeds of this bond, and the plaintiff be restricted to a remedy against Fear alone, who may be utterly insolvent. It is further claimed that Fear should, upon the discovery of the fraud, have tendered back a deed for the patent right and offered to rescind the contract, and that a failure to do this promptly defeats the plaintiff's right of recovery. If, however, the deposit was made on account of a belief in Fear's ability to pay the debt out of the profits of the patent, engendered by the fraudulent representations of defendant, we cannot see how the laches of Fear should compromise the plaintiff's rights. Without an offer to rescind, Fear, when sued for the purchase money, could recoup the damages sustained through the fraud, and would be liable only for the real value of the patent purchased. And the deposit being made to secure the performance of Fear's contract, defendant could retain only so much of the avails of the bond as would equal Fear's liability to him. This view was presented by the instructions given."

v.

CHARLES T. BONNER et al.

Texas Supreme Court — May 9, 1917.

(108 Tex. 399, 194 S. W. 1098.)

Usury — effect of usurious renewal.

1. Antecedent indebtedness is not affected by subsequent usurious renewals or extensions where the transactions are distinct.

[See note on this question beginning on page 877.]

Contract — subsequent agreement — effect.

2. A contract originally valid is not rendered invalid by a subsequent agreement.

Usury — application of rule.

3. The rule that the holder of a debt of which there has been a usurious renewal may recover upon the debt notwithstanding the renewal has no application where, without the renewal, the debt is barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Limitation of action — promise to remove bar — cause of action.

4. When, in an action for debt, a new promise is relied on to avoid the Statute of Limitations, such promise, whether made before or after the bar is completed, constitutes the cause of action and must be declared on as such.

Estoppel — pleading usurious contract — effect.

5. A creditor cannot plead a usurious renewal of a contract for the purpose of avoiding the bar of the Statute of Limitations against the original contract, and not be bound by its usurious character.

Usury — application in reduction of principal.

6. If a usurious renewal of a contract is pleaded to avoid the bar of the Statute of Limitations against the original one, any usurious interest collected under it should be applied in reduction of the principal of the debt.

Appeal — cross writs of error.

7. Cross assignments of error should be considered by the Texas court of civil appeals, although appellees do not prosecute an appeal.

— absence of writ of error — effect.

8. Failure of appellees, whose cross assignments of error were not considered by the Texas court of civil appeals, to apply for writ of error on account of the action of the court of civil appeals, precludes their consideration by the supreme court.

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Sixth Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor for part only of the amount claimed in an action brought to recover a balance due with interest upon a mechanic's lien contract. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Cone Johnson and B. B. Cain for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Lasseter & McIlwaine for defendants in error.

Phillips, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As originally brought, this suit was by W. G. Cain for a balance due, with interest, upon a mechanic's lien contract in the amount of $3,000, executed by Charles T. Bonner and wife in favor of one James Bothwell. It was instituted more than four years after the maturity of the contract. Special exceptions urged by the Bonners to the petition on the ground of limitation were sustained. Thereupon, the plaintiff, on February 22, 1911, by an amended petition, set up respective written acknowledgments and renewals of the debt executed by the Bonners in his favor, and also its acknowledgment by Charles T. Bonner through a letter.

The original contract given Bothwell provided for interest at the conventional rate from its maturity. The renewal obligations given plaintiff stipulated for the payment of interest at a usurious rate. The defense of usury was made. The recovery, as a penalty, of double the amount of usurious interest paid the plaintiff, was also sought by the defendants. The judgment of the trial court denied the plaintiff any recovery. On his appeal the court of civil appeals rendered judgment in his favor for a balance, ascertained by applying as a credit the interest paid him under the usurious renewal obligations to the amount due upon the contract when he acquired it, with foreclosure of the mechanic's lien.

It is urged by the plaintiff that his suit was upon the original contract, which was free from usury, and that he was, therefore, entitled to recover thereon, principal and interest, unaffected by the usurious interest collected by him upon the renewal obligations. This contention presents the question in the case.

A contract, originally valid, is not rendered invalid by a subsequent agreement. It is therefore recognized that antecedent indebtedness is not affected by subsequent usurious renewals or extensions where the transactions are distinct. Webb, Usury, § 307; Cousins v. Grey, 60 Tex. 346; Krause v. Pope, 78 Tex. 478, 14 S. W. 616; Harn v. American Mut. Bldg. & Sav. Asso. 95 Tex. 79, 65 S. W. 176. This simply means that the holder of an indebtedness is not obliged to declare upon a contract of renewal not accepted in payment of the debt; that such a usurious renewal is no defense to an originally valid debt; and that the holder of such a debt may declare, and, where not subject to other defenses, recover upon it, notwithstanding the usurious renewal. The rule has no application, and can have none, to cases where, on account of limitation, there is, without the renewal, no maintainable cause of action, and it is made for that reason the sole foundation of the suit.

—application of rule.

When in an action for debt a new promise is relied upon to avoid a plea of limitation, such promise, whether made before or after the bar is complete, constitutes the cause of action and must be declared upon for a recovery. Since the statute, when pleaded, makes a recovery upon the barred debt impossible, reliance upon the new promise to overcome limitation necessarily makes of it the cause of action. Otherwise there is no cause of action that may be enforced.

This has been the holding of the court since Coles v. Kelsey, 2 Tex. 542, 47 Am. Dec. 661. It is the settled law of the state, and there can be no occasion now for opening the question of whether the new promise is to be regarded as only a means of continuing the original indebtedness in life and vigor.

The renewal obligations were set up by the plaintiff in his amended petition for the evident purpose of avoiding the limitation to which the original contract was subject, and for which reasons the defendants' exceptions to the declaration upon it in the original petition had been sustained. There could have been no other reason for pleading them. The right of recovery, according to the amended petition, was based upon them and the letter. With a plea of limitation to the suit on the contract properly sustained, the plaintiff was left without any maintainable cause of action upon it. If the renewal agreements and the letter were not asserted as a means of enforcing his demand, and as therefore constituting a new cause of action, his suit was already at an end.

Having declared upon the renewal agreements, the plaintiff's right of recovery was measured by them. He could not avail himself of their benefits without subjecting his action to the defenses which they afforded. The ordinary principles of estoppel would deny to him the appropriation of only their favorable results. With the suit resting upon them, their usurious character was necessarily an available defense. It was therefore proper to apply the usurious interest collected by the plaintiff under them to the reduction of the principal of his debt, as was done by the court of civil appeals in its judgment.

Cousins v. Grey; Krause v. Pope, and Harn v. American Mut. Bldg. & Sav. Asso. supra, relied upon by the plaintiff in error, were all cases essentially different in character from this one.

In each of them the cause of action, in whole or in part, was upon a contract or contracts of indebtedness which were untainted by usury, and to which the defense of limitation was either not available or was not pleaded. In such state of case, under the rule already noted, recovery under the original contract, unaffected by collateral or subsequent usurious agreements, was permissible.

In Cousins v. Grey, the usurious notes were set up by the defendant. The plaintiff's action was upon a note not usurious. It does not appear that it was barred by limitation when the action was filed. There is no mention of limitation in the case. The usurious notes were not only not relied upon by the plaintiff for the purpose of avoiding limitation, as is the case here, but they were not declared upon by him at all.

In Harn v. American Mut. Bldg. & Sav. Asso. the action was upon an original note not usurious, and upon a note given in extension of it which was usurious. No question of limitation was in the case. It was properly held that recovery could be had upon the note, as unimpaired by the usurious renewal.

Krause v. Pope, upon which stress is laid, was a suit upon two notes not usurious and upon subsequently executed renewal agreements, the original of which provided for usurious interest, and by which the others were affected. The opinion of Associate Justice Henry does not disclose whether the defense of limitation was urged against the cause of action asserted upon the notes, though it appears that they were barred when the action was filed. The writer has examined the original record to ascertain its state in this regard. Limitation was pleaded by John Hancock, to whom the notes were originally given and who was joined as a defendant, but the plaintiff dismissed him from the suit. It was not pleaded by the maker of the notes, nor by any other defendant. To be available, limitation must be specially urged either by exception or plea. With the plaintiff asserting a cause of action upon the notes, unchallenged by limitation, he was, of course, entitled to judgment upon them, unaffected by the usurious renewals. The question presented by this case was not involved.

Certain rulings by the trial court adverse to the defendants were made by them the subject of cross assignments of error in the court of civil appeals. We think they were entitled to have them there considered, though they did not prosecute an appeal. Duren v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. 86 Tex. 287, 24 S. W. 258; Carroll v. Carroll, 20 Tex. 732; Brown v. Hudson, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 605, 38 S. W. 653. But a writ of error was not applied for on account of the court of civil appeals' disposition of these rulings; and we are therefore not called upon to determine the questions which they involve.

The judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals is affirmed.

I. General rule.

It is universally recognized that if a transaction or an obligation is free from usury in its origin no subsequent usurious transaction respecting it can affect it with the taint of usury, the theory being that the question whether a contract is usurious or not must be decided with reference to the time when it was entered into.

Cockayne (1811) 3 Campb. 119.

In Richards v. Kountze (1876) 4 Neb. 200, in summing up the law on this question, it was said that the rule that "if the original contract is bona fide, and wholly free from the taint of usury, then no subsequent agreement to pay usury, or a usurious premium upon the debt, will invalidate the instrument given for the payment of the debt, or affect the original contract with the vice of usury . . . is well founded in principle and just in equity, for, if there was once a valid subsisting debt, bearing interest, the contract creating such debt cannot be impaired or destroyed by a subsequent void agreement."

In connection with the above-cited English cases it is of interest that the English Usury Act was repealed by the Usury Laws Repeal Act (1854) (17 & 18 Vict. chap. 90), and that now there is no limit except that certain courts have statutory power to set aside or vary a transaction where the interest charge is excessive. See 21 Laws of England (Halsbury) p. 42.

II. Application of rule.

The general rule that a contract originally valid is not affected by a subsequent usurious transaction applies to extensions and renewals, where the evidence of the original contract is given up.

Alabama. — Bernheimer v. Gray (1917) — Ala. —, 78 So. 840.

drawn only for 5 per cent, and the mortgagee takes 6, it would be void; and as to which it was said in Nichols v. Lee (Eng.) supra, that the court could not have meant what it said.

And the taking of a separate usurious note for additional interest does not invalidate a pre-existing valid note. Hovey v. Shumway (1775) 1 Root (Conn.) 70; Swartwout v. Payne (1822) 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 294, 10 Am. Dec. 228. And see Crane v. Hubbel (1839) 7 Paige (N. Y.) 413.

And the validity of an indebtedness originally valid is not affected by the fact that it forms a part of the consideration for a subsequent usurious security which was substituted therefor. Hammond v. Hopping (1835) 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 505; Cook v. Barnes (1867) 36 N. Y. 520; Patterson v. Bird-sall (1876) 64 N. Y. 294, 21 Am. Rep. 609; White v. Freeman (1884) 79 Va. 597.

Nor is a mortgage given to secure a valid debt vitiated by a subsequent agreement that it shall also be security for a usurious debt. Hynes v. Stevens (1896) 62 Ark. 491, 36 S. W. 689.

And the rule that the usury has no retroactive effect applies to all cases where the subsequent transaction is a mere cover for a usurious contract of forbearance, the original obligation remaining untainted. Crippen v. Heermance (1841) 9 Paige (N. Y.) 211 (usurious bond and mortgage given on pretended repurchase of property at an advance). And see Hagaman v. Reinach (1905) 48 Misc. 206, 96 N. Y. Supp. 719.

And the rule is that a contract not usurious at the time it was entered into cannot become so by any future contingency. York Bank v. Asbury (1858) 1 Biss. 230, Fed. Cas. No. 18,142 (holding that a contract which was valid at its inception was not rendered invalid by the fact that it might or might not become usurious according to circumstances at the time of payment); Gates v. Hackenthal (1871) 57 Ill. 534, 11 Am. Rep. 45 (renewal note made subject to variations in value of gold and treasury notes).

III. Rights and remedies.a. In general.

Valid security which has been given up and canceled upon the substitution therefor of securities fatally tainted with usury may be renewed and enforced as if the latter had not been given. Burnhisel v. Firman (1875) 22 Wall. (U. S.) 170, 22 L. ed. 766, see also Rose's Notes to this case; Patterson v. Birdsall (1876) 64 N. Y. 294, 31 Am. Rep. 609; Underhill v. Crennan (1881) 25 Hun (N. Y.) 569. And see Rountree v. Brinson (1887) 98 N. C. 107, 3 S. E. 747.

And in Virginia it has been held that the obligor may, in equity, have the usurious renewal obligation canceled. Fox v. Taliaferro (1812) 4 Munf. (Va.) 243.

And in New York it has been held that a court of equity, in canceling the new usurious agreement, should reinstate the valid securities which had been surrendered or canceled. Brown v. Dewey (1843) 1 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 56; Gerwig v. Sitterly (1874) 56 N. Y. 214.

So, it has been said that where the complainant has declared upon the usurious renewal note he may amend his complaint so as to recover on the original note. Bank of Malvern v. Burton (1900) 67 Ark. 426, 55 S. W. 483; Webb v. Bishop (1888) 101 N. C. 99, 7 S. E. 698.

And it has often been held, generally, that the surrender of a valid obligation at the time of the execution of a usurious new one covering it is not a satisfaction of the debt and does not bar a recovery based on the original indebtedness.

Arkansas.—Humphrey v. McCauley (1891) 55 Ark. 143, 17 S. W. 713.

Hopping* (1835) 13 Wend. 505; Winsted Bank v. Webb (1868) 39 N. Y. 325, 100 Am. Dec. 435 (holding that the taking of a usurious renewal note is not a satisfaction of the original note nor a discharge of a cause of action thereon, although upon the renewal the original note had been surrendered); Leary v. Miller (1875) 61 N. Y. 488; Re Consalus (1884) 95 N. Y. 340; Sheppard v. Hamilton (1859) 29 Barb. 156; Central City Bank v. Dana (1860) 32 Barb. 296; Froese v. Prosnitz (1890) 34 N. Y. S. R. 9, 12 N. Y. Supp. 88.

Texas.—Harn v. American Mut. Bldg. & Sav. Asso. (1901) 95 Tex. 79, 65 S. W. 176; Collier v. Soule (1892) 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 550, 19 S. W. 506; Hennessy v. Clough (1897) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 40 S. W. 157.

Vermont.—Edgell v. Stanford (1834) 6 Vt. 551 (holding that the original note is evidence under the money counts, and that if it has been destroyed evidence of its existence and contents may be given).

Virginia.—Parker v. Cousins (1845) 2 Gratt. 372, 44 Am. Dec. 388.

Wisconsin.—Eastman v. Porter (1861) 14 Wis. 42.

England.—Phillips v. Cockayne (1811) 3 Campb. 119.

And it has been held that, where the maker of a renewal note which is usurious interposes the defense of usury, recovery may be had on the original obligation, as to which no usury was attached. Farmers & M. Bank v. Joslyn (1867) 37 N. Y. 353. And see Winsted Bank v. Webb (1863) 46 Barb. (N. Y.) 177.

And a usurious contract to forbear enforcement of an original valid obligation, since it does not affect such validity, is itself no bar to an action on such original obligation. Mallett v. Stone (1864) 17 Iowa, 64, 85 Am. Dec. 545; Pyke v. Clark (1842) 3 B.

Mon. (Ky.) 262; Stebbins v. Smith (1826) 4 Pick. (Mass.) 97; Crane v. Hubbel (1839) 7 Paige (N. Y.) 413; Wharton v. Eborn (1883) 88 N. C. 344; CAIN v. BONNER (reported herewith) ante, 874. And a note or other security may be relied upon, although usurious interest has been received, provided such interest was not originally contracted for. Thompson v. Woodbridge (1811) 8 Mass. 256. And in Vermont it has been held that an indorser of a valid note cannot set up as a defense thereto that a subsequent note given in extension of or forbearance upon the prior note was usurious, the theory being that the taker of a usurious obligation is the wrongdoer, and that the usury laws are for the protection of the borrower personally. Austin v. Chittenden (1861) 33 Vt. 553.

And a valid mortgage may be foreclosed notwithstanding a usurious agreement for forbearance as to suit on the debt which the mortgage was given to secure. Beauchamp v. Leagan (1860) 14 Ind. 401; Gardner v. Flagg (1811) 8 Mass. 101; Drury v. Morse (1862) 3 Allen (Mass.) 445; Richards v. Kountse (1876) 4 Neb. 200; Dell v. Oppenheimer (1880) 9 Neb. 454, 4 N. W. 51; Chicago Lumber Co. v. Bancroft (1902) 64 Neb. 176, 57 L.R.A. 910, 89 N. W. 780; Ruh v. Dwiggin (1910) 77 N. J. Eq. 117, 76 Atl. 243; Real Estate Trust Co. v. Keech (1877) 69 N. Y. 248, 25 Am. Rep. 181; Allison v. Schmitz (1883) 31 Hun (N. Y.) 106; Rosenbaum v. Silverman (1898) 22 Misc. 589, 50 N. Y. Supp. 860; Wharton v. Eborn (1883) 88 N. C. 344.

And where a usurious note or bond has been given to cover a pre-existing valid indebtedness not evidenced by a written obligation, it has been held that the creditor is under no necessity of relying thereon, but may found his claim upon the clearly separable antecedent debt. Johnson v. Hall (1893) 57 Ark. 550, 22 S. W. 176; Depau v. Humphreys (1829) 8 Mart. N. S. (La.) 1; Fleischmann v. Stern (1881) 24 Hun (N. Y.) 265; Bost v. Smith (1843) 26 N. C. (4 Ired. L.) 68; Meshke v. Van Doren (1862) 16 Wis. 319; Gray v. Fowler (1790)

1 H. Bl. 462, 126 Eng. Reprint, 268; Phillips v. Cockayne (1811) 3 Campb. (Eng.) 119. And see Johnson v. Johnson (1814) 11 Mass. 359 and Nesbit v. Goodrich (1901) 25 Tex. Civ. App. 28, 60 S. W. 1017.

So, where the usurious note was founded upon an antecedent valid account, it has been held that the creditor may sue upon the account. Tillman v. Thatcher (1892) 56 Ark. 334, 19 S. W. 968. And see Rountree v. Brinson (1887) 98 N. C. 107, 3 S. E. 747.

However, it has also been held that where the suit is based upon the subsequent usurious agreement the plaintiff cannot recover therein on the original contract, at least, if such a right is not in issue or litigated. Barrows v. Thomas (1890) 43 Minn. 270, 45 N. W. 443; Botsford v. Bean (1899) 44 App. Div. 190, 60 N. Y. Supp. 737 (so holding where the pleadings contain no reference to the original indebtedness, and no amendment of the complaint was made or requested).

And where the suit is based upon the new and usurious contract and the statutes merely declare such contracts void except as to the principal, recovery may be had on such contract, but only in the amount specified by the statute, namely, the principal of the obligation. Troutman v. Barnett (1850) 9 Ga. 30; Dotterer v. Freeman (1891) 88 Ga. 479, 14 S. E. 863; CAIN v. BONNER (reported herewith) ante, 874; Quinlan v. Smye (1899) 21 Tex. Civ. App. 156, 50 S. W. 1068. However, for the purposes of this rule it has been held that the term, "principal," as used in the Indiana statute, is the amount of the principal of the original debt, with legal interest thereon up to the time of the making of the usurious contract, provided the debt was one which carried interest. Pratt v. Wallbridge (1861) 16 Ind. 147. And see, to the same effect, Lalande v. Breaux (1850) 5 La. Ann. 505. And that where the statute provides that, if excessive interest shall be stipulated for, "all interest shall be forfeited," the amount of the original indebtedness with legal interest down to the date of the usurious contract may be recovered, was held in Warrack v. Boyd (1886) 63 Miss. 488, and Rozelle v. Dickerson (1886) 63 Miss. 538. And in Nebraska it has been held that the statute forfeits all interest subsequent to the making of the usurious contract, so that, in a suit based on an original note and mortgage, the recovery must be limited to principal and lawful interest accrued at the time a usurious extension was contracted for. Chicago Lumber Co. v. Bancroft (1902) 64 Neb. 176, 57 L.R.A. 910, 89 N. W. 780.

And it seems that in Vermont, where usurious contracts are valid to every intent except as to interest in excess of the legal rate, recovery may be had upon a usurious contract given for an obligation originally valid. See Farmers' Bank v. Burchard (1860) 33 Vt. 346. And in Virginia a similar rule has been laid down in White v. Freeman (1884) 79 Va. 597.

And it has been held that where the usurious contract is declared by statute to be valid, but that the recovery shall be limited to the principal, "without interest," the declaration "must" be thereon, and that the amount with interest cannot be recovered under a common count. Justice v. Charles (1848) 1 Ind. 32, Smith (Ind.) 67. In this connection the court said: "It would be a manifest evasion of the penalty which the statute intended to impose upon persons for attempting to take usurious interest, that is, the forfeiture of all interest and of the right to recover costs in a suit upon a usurious contract. If the plaintiff in such suit had only to fall back to the original consideration, and recover that with legal interest under the common counts, the attempt by statute to prohibit the recovery of any interest in such cases would be wholly nugatory."

In Texas, it has been held that the rule that a usurious contract of forbearance does not prevent suit upon the original indebtedness has no application to cases where, on account of limitations, there is, without the renewal, no maintainable cause of action, so that a suit brought after expiration of limitations as to an original valid obligation, but within the period as to a usurious renewal or extension, must be regarded as an action on the latter contract; and that, since such was the case, the recovery, in view of the Texas rule which allows recovery of the principal, but not the interest, of usurious contracts, must be limited to the principal less any payments of usurious interest which had been made, and credit for which must be given. See the reported case (CAIN v. BENNER, ante, 874). It will be observed that the theory adopted in this case, namely, that the original cause of action is barred by the Statute of Limitations, and that the action must be regarded as based upon the new and usurious contract, would preclude recovery altogether in jurisdictions where usury renders a contract absolutely void instead of void only as to the interest.

However, that result has been avoided in the only case which seems to have involved a similar state of facts. Thus, in New York, in Re Consalus (1884) 95 N. Y. 840, where the Statute of Limitations was set up as a bar to a claim based on an original valid obligation, the renewal of which was absolutely void for usury, it was held that where the rule is that the subsequent usurious agreement for forbearance, or in renewal or extension, wholly avoids such new agreement, but leaves the debtor liable on the original indebtedness, and that any payments of usurious interest on the new contract must be credited on the original one, such payments, although indorsed on the usurious obligation, are made for the money originally owed, and may be regarded as payments of interest on such indebtedness, so that the Statute of Limitations furnishes no bar to an action on the original debt, such payments having been made within the statutory period, although such original indebtedness was not incurred within that usurious obligation may be resorted to, to take the case out of the statute. This point, upon which the New York case was made to turn, does not appear to have been raised or considered in the CAIN CASE. G. J. C.

Gift — delivery to third person.

1. The indorsement by the payee upon a note taken for the purchase price of land of a statement that the note is to become the property of the maker at the payee's death, and its delivery to a third person to collect the interest during the lifetime of and turn it over to the payee, and at his death to deliver the note to the maker, constitutes a valid gift.

2. A mere gift which is testamentary in character will not be recognized or given effect by the courts unless it is made in writing and executed after the manner prescribed by the statute for the execution of wills.

[See 12 R. C. L. 941.]

Evidence — conditions of sale.

3. That a provision that a note taken for the purchase price of real estate was to become the property of the grantee upon the death of the grantor was indorsed upon the instrument at the very time it was made affords satisfactory evidence that it was one of the terms or conditions of sale.

Gift — postponement of delivery — effect.

4. Postponement of delivery and enjoyment of a gift does not necessarily prevent the passing of a present interest, even though possession by the donee is not obtained until after the donor's death.

[See 12 R. C. L. 936.]

— delivery to third person — sufficiency.

5. Delivery to a third person for the benefit of another, the property to be retained by such third person until the death of the person so delivering it, and then to be turned over to the beneficiary, is a sufficient delivery.

[See 12 R. C. L. 934.]

— refusal to accept — effect.

6. That the beneficiary of a gift of a note handed to a third person for delivery after the death of the donor does not accept the note when tendered to him, on the ground that he preferred to have it surrendered to him by the administrator or by order of court, does not impeach his right to claim the gift as a defense to an action on the note.

Appeal — dismissal of counterclaim — error.

7. The dismissal of a counterclaim in an action on a promissory note, in defense of which the maker sets up a gift from the payee, is not reversible error, if the claim had been filed against the payee's estate and was pending in court at the time of the dismissal.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Hamilton County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a promissory note. Reversed.

Statement by Weaver, J.:

Action at law upon a promissory note, made by the defendants in the lifetime of the intestate. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Mr. W. J. Covil, for appellants:

The note for $1,000, upon which this action was based, was never delivered to Morris, and never intended by him or by the parties who signed the note to be his property. The only right he had in the note was the interest accruing annually. A valid delivery is necessary to give legal existence to a note.

Crawford, Neg. Inst. 2d ed. § 35, note C; Roberts v. McGrath, 38 Wis. 57; Chipman v. Tucker, 38 Wis. 43, 20 Am. Rep. 1.

The delivery of the note to Sogard to hold, collect the interest, and, at the death of Morris, return to defendant, was a delivery in escrow for him, and was not effectual to give title to the payee Morris.

Daggett v. Simonds, 173 Mass. 340, 46 L.R.A. 332, 53 N. E. 907; Re Podhajsky, 137 Iowa, 743, 115 N. W. 590.

The signing of the note by defendant East, the indorsement thereon by Morris, and the delivery to Sogard with instructions to pay Morris the interest annually and at his death deliver the note to East were all one transaction, an entirety, by virtue of which said note, at the death of Morris, became the unconditional property of East.

Hogan v. Sullivan, 114 Iowa, 460, 87 N. W. 447; Larimer v. Beardsley, 130 Iowa, 706, 107 N. W. 935; Mollison v. Rittgers, 140 Iowa, 365, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1179, 118 N. W. 512; Abegg v. Hirst, 144 Iowa, 196, 138 Am. St. Rep. 285, 122 N. W. 838; Miles v. Miles, 168 Iowa, 153, 150 N. W. 21.

The transaction whereby the note was delivered to Sogard, to be by him given to East at the death of Morris, amounted to a gift by Morris to East, the delivery to him being only postponed until the death of Morris.

Ibid.

Mr. Wesley Martin for appellee.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants admit the making of the note in suit, but allege that at the time of its execution, and as a part of the same transaction, the payees therein named indorsed and signed upon the back of said instrument an agreement as follows: "This note is to be void and to become the property of W. R. East at the death of the undersigned.

(Signed) Michael Morris, and witnessed by J. E. Sogard." They further allege that at the time of making said note and the indorsement thereon said instrument was, by agreement of parties, placed in the hands of a third person, J. E. Sogard, to hold and collect the interest thereon during the lifetime of the payee, and then to surrender or deliver it to East; that Sogard did in fact receive and hold the note during all the remainder of the lifetime of Morris, and then offered to turn it over to East; but the latter, to avoid any ground for criticism, suggested that it would be better to let the delivery be made through the court or administrator. For the reasons stated, the defendants deny plaintiff's right to maintain the action. Jury being waived, the issues were tried to the court, which found for the plaintiff.

The record indicates that Morris, who was the uncle of East, had no direct heirs. At the date of the note he sold a tract of land to his nephew, and the note in suit represents a part of the purchase price. The papers in that transaction were drawn by the witness Sogard, a banker in that neighborhood, who at the time, and at the request of Morris, wrote and witnessed the indorsement which we have above quoted. Morris then deposited with Sogard the note so indorsed, directing him to turn it over to East at his (Morris's) death, and saying at the same time "that the income should go to him as long as he lived, and when he was dead it should be turned over to East." This testimony is in no manner disputed. The conclusion reached by the trial court appears to have been that the transaction witnessed by the indorsement on the note and by the testimony of Sogard shows no more than an imperfect attempt at testamentary disposition of property, or at best an incomplete gift by Morris to East, which never was consummated by delivery, and that, no title to the subject of the gift having passed to East in the lifetime of Morris, the note became, at the death of the latter, a part of the assets of his estate. In support of this theory, the court, in a written memorandum of its views, cites the following cases: Crispin v. Winkelman, 57 Iowa, 523, 524, 10 N. W. 919; Schollmier v. Schoendelen, 78 Iowa, 426, 16 Am. St. Rep. 455, 48 N. W. 282; Furenes v. Eide, 109 Iowa, 511, 77 Am. St. Rep. 545, 80 N. W. 539, and Re Brown, 113 Iowa, 351, 85 N. W. 617. We have examined each of these cases, as well as the citations therein made, and think they do not sustain the view of the trial court. The Crispin Case involved a claim by the father of the deceased that the son, before his death, had authorized the father to use so much of his property or estate as might be necessary to pay the debts of the deceased, and apply the remainder to the support of his children. This claim was contested by the son's administrator, and the court held that the agreement on which the father relied was testamentary in character and, not being executed according to the law of wills, was void—a decision the correctness of which can be conceded. It does not, however, rule this case, in fact or in principle. The father there made no claim that the title had passed in the lifetime of the son, or that there had been any completed gift to him or to the children of the deceased. The court expressly says: "The defendant does not claim that the title to the property passed to the children except as heirs. Prior to the decedent's death, the defendant, upon his own theory, was trustee of the property for the decedent. His trusteeship for the heirs commenced, if it commenced at all, with their inheritance. But to hold that it commenced then would be giving testamentary force to the agreement, which, as we have seen, is not allowable." The court does, however, hold and say—and this holding is in harmony with the claim of appellant in this case—that if the deceased had given the property in such a way that the title thereto had passed in his lifetime to the children, or to his father as trustee for their benefit, then the law would uphold it. The Schollmier Case sustains the validity of a gift of a bank deposit, made by writing in the donor's bank book: "Pay to the order of Elizabeth Schoendelen and Dorothea Hasenmiller all within deposit after my decease." There was some evidence that the book was in the possession of one of the defendants at some time before the donor's death. Referring to the defense that her gift was of a testamentary character, the court says: "In our opinion, the proper effect to be given the assignment must depend upon the intent of the decedent with respect to it. In terms, it is a full assignment of the amount shown by the book to be due at the time it was made—not of the amount which should be due at the death of the assignor. No right to revoke or rescind it is shown to be reserved; and if it was treated by the assignor as a completed transaction, we think it passed a present interest in the bank account, and is not vulnerable to the objection made by plaintiff."

The court further held that the direction in the writing to make the payment after her death "related to the time when the interest transferred might be enjoyed, and not to its transfer." It is also there said that, if the book was delivered in the donor's lifetime, or if the assignment was delivered, or "in any other manner given effect," then the title could be said to have passed. As we shall later see, the deposit of the note in this case in the hands of Sogard was in legal effect a delivery, sufficient to validate the transaction. The Furenes Case relates to the alleged conveyance of land by three separate deeds to the grantor's grandchildren. These deeds were handed to a third person to be delivered, nothing being said about a delivery after the death of the grantor. One deed was delivered at once, while the other two were not delivered until after the grantor had died. The first deed was held to constitute a good conveyance, while the other two were of no effect, for want of delivery in the grantor's lifetime. That case in no manner controls the one at bar, where the delivery was in fact made to a third person, upon the express condition that the person so receiving it should surrender it to the defendant after the death of Morris. The court, in the cited authority, expressly distinguishes the case then before it from those where a third party taking the papers may be considered as acting for the grantee, as well as where the papers are placed in the hands of a third person, to be delivered after the grantor's death. So also in Brown's Case, the court again expressly recognized the principle that where a present delivery is intended, or the instrument is left with a third party without reservation or right of recall, a present interest passes to the donee or grantee.

The additional precedents cited by counsel for appellee in this court are principally those announcing the rule that a mere gift which is testamentary in character will not be recognized or given effect by the courts unless it be made in writing and executed after the manner prescribed by statute for the execution of wills. Of the soundness of the proposition so relied upon, there can be no question; and if the transaction in the case at bar, witnessed by the indorsement on the note and the deposit of the paper with Sogard, is no more than a mere undertaking to make a gift, which should take effect only upon the death of Morris, then the judgment below is right, and should be affirmed. But it is our opinion that the undisputed facts demonstrate that this is not a case of testamentary disposition of property, and that under rules of law well established in this and other courts the defendants have established a good defense.

In the first place, it does not seem to be necessary to the defense to show that a mere gift was intended. It appears in evidence that the note was given and this transaction had in the course of settlement for the purchase price of land sold by Morris to East, and that in making such settlement Sogard, who made the papers, was directed by Morris to prepare the indorsement, which was then and there signed. The defendant, as a party to the transaction, was not a competent witness there-to against the administrator of Morris's estate, and we know nothing of the terms and conditions agreed upon between defendant and deceased, except as already indicated. Why, then, are we not bound to presume that the release or discharge of the principal sum of $1,000, subject only to the payment of interest to Morris during his lifetime, was one of the terms or conditions of the sale? Certainly, there is nothing shown to contradict that conclusion, while the fact that such provision was put into writing and indorsed upon the note given in consummation of the contract of sale, at the very time it was made, affords very satisfactory evidence in support of it. The writing also imports a consideration for the agreement.

In the next place, even if we proceed upon the theory that there was nothing in the terms of the sale of the land requiring Morris to do as he did with reference to this note, and that it was a voluntary act, prompted by his desire to favor or show his good will to his nephew, the facts shown require us to hold that the transaction effected a change of title in the subject of the gift, and that the note is not an asset in the hands of the administrator of Morris's estate. The fact that Morris placed the note in Sogard's hands for the benefit of East, and retained to himself no interest therein or control thereof, except to demand and receive the interest, is sufficiently established. Sogard says: "He said this was to go to East on his death. . . . Morris told me to turn that over to East on his death. He said the interest was to go to him as long as he lived,—that the income should go to him as long as he lived,—and when he was dead, it should be turned over to East. . . . He said it would be the best place to leave it, at the bank; to leave it at the bank in a third party's hands, the bank to be considered a third party."

The note was in fact so left, and was never withdrawn or demanded by Morris, though he lived for several years thereafter.

We have held that postponement of the delivery and enjoyment of a gift does not necessarily prevent the passing of a present interest, even though possession by the donee is not obtained till after the donor's death.

Schollmier v. Schoendelen, 78 Iowa, 426, 16 Am. St. Rep. 455, 43 N. W. 282; Hogan v. Sullivan, 114 Iowa, 456, 460, 87 N. W. 447; Abegg v. Hirst, 144 Iowa, 196, 198, 138 Am. St. Rep. 285, 122 N. to the beneficiary, is a sufficient delivery, has frequently been decided. Larimer v. Beardsley, 130 Iowa, 706, 107 N. W. 935; Hogan v. Sullivan, 114 Iowa, 456, 460, 87 N. W. 447; King v. Smith, 54 L.R.A. 708, 49 C. C. A. 46, 110 Fed. 95; Mollison v. Rittgers, 140 Iowa, 365, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1179, 118 N. W. 512; White v. Watts, 118 Iowa, 549, 92 N. W. 660; Tucker v. Tucker, 138 Iowa, 344, 349, 116 N. W. 119; Re Podhajsky, 137 Iowa, 743, 115 N. W. 590; Jones v. Nicholas, 151 Iowa, 362, 130 N. W. 125; Grymes v. Hone, 49 N. Y. 17, 10 Am. Rep. 313. And a gift may be so made that the grantor shall retain the use during life. Klehr's Will, 147 Wis. 653, 133 N. W. 1105; Tucker v. Tucker, 138 Iowa, 344, 116 N.

W. 119; McNally v. McAndrew, 98 Wis. 62, 73 N. W. 315; Martin v. Martin, 170 Ill. 18, 48 N. E. 694; Innes v. Potter, 130 Minn. 320, post, 896, 153 N. W. 604. The gift may be in the nature of a forgiveness or a release of a debt due from the donee to the donor, subject to payment of interest during the life of the donor, and a delivery of the note or evidence of debt to a third person, to be surrendered upon the death of the donor, is sufficient to complete the gift. See, as directly in point, Hagerman v. Wigent, 108 Mich. 192, 65 N. W. 756. See also Stewart v. Hidden, 13 Minn. 43, Gil. 29. Even where there is a right to revoke a deposit which has been made with a third person for delivery to the beneficiary after the death of the depositor, it has often been held that, if such right of revocation has never been exercised, it does not affect the beneficiary's title. Blanchard v. Sheldon, 43 Vt. 512; Grymes v. Hone, 49 N. Y. 17, 10 Am. Rep. 313; Worth v. Case, 42 N. Y. 362; Belden v. Carter, 4 Day, 66, 4 Am. Dec. 185; Giddings v. Giddings, 51 Vt. 227, 31 Am. Rep. 682.

Whether we would be willing to go to the full extent of some of these cases, we do not here say, for it is unnecessary in disposing of this appeal; but the precedents are of value, as illustrating the strong tendency of the courts to look into the actual intent of the parties to any lawful contract or undertaking and give effect thereto, whenever it can be done without overriding well-established rules. The intent of Morris to surrender or relinquish to East the right to enforce payment of the principal sum named in the note, but to retain in himself the right to demand and receive the interest thereon during his lifetime, is clear. The intent was lawful. The delivery of the note to Sogard operated to carry that intent into execution, so far as it could be done, yet to protect Morris in his right to collect the interest. Nothing was postponed except the right of East to demand and receive a surrender of the paper upon the death of Morris. In the matter of a conveyance of real estate, where the deed is deposited with a third person, to be delivered after the grantor's death, we have held it equivalent to the present delivery to the grantee of a conveyance which, by its terms, reserves a life estate to the grantor. White v. Watts, 118 Iowa, 549, 92 N. W. 660. If this be true, there would seem to be equally good reason for saying that the making of the quoted indorsement upon the note, and its deposit with Sogard, to be delivered after the death of the payee, was a present gift to East of the principal sum of $1,000, with reservation of the interest, or use thereof, during life. This remark is, of course, applicable only upon the theory that proof of a gift is necessary to sustain the defense in this case. But, for reasons already stated, we think the defense is not thus restricted. The supreme court of Minnesota, passing upon a state of facts closely parallel with those in the case at bar, has announced a holding in accordance with the conclusions reached herein. See Innes v. Potter, 130 Minn. 320, post, 896, 153 N. W. 604.

The court below laid some stress upon the fact that after the death of Morris, when Sogard handed the note to East, he handed it back, with the suggestion that he did not wish to do anything which might cast suspicion upon him, and he preferred to have the paper surrendered to him by the administrator, or by order of court. It is suggested that the act was in the nature of an admission that he did not claim the note, or did not feel certain of his right in the matter. We can see no reason for looking on his conduct in this respect as an impeachment of his —refusal to accept—effect. defense in this case.

That he was not forward or over-eager to insist upon his right is much less suspicious than if he had gone to the other extreme. He was named as executor of Morris's will, but refused to serve; and the fact that he did so, and was willing to have his claim pass the scrutiny of the administrator and the court, was to his credit, rather than otherwise. Upon the admitted facts, the defense to the note was well established, and defendant should have had judgment for costs.

There was a counterclaim pleaded, which the trial court dismissed on the theory that defendant should first establish it as a claim against the estate. As it was conceded that the claim had been filed and was then pending in court, the order of the court in dismissing it from this case could work the Appeal—dismissal of counter-claim—error. defendant no substantial prejudice, and the ruling, even if wrong, was not reversible error.

For reasons stated, the judgment of the District Court will be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in harmony with this opinion.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Orangeburg County in favor of defendant in an action brought to marshal the assets of the estate of plaintiff's deceased husband. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

The testimony in the record, referred to in the opinion, showing the circumstances and what was said and done in reference to the attempted gift of the $1,500, is as follows:

Q. Did he say anything about some money he had in bank?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did Mr. Sharpe say to you, if anything, in relation to the money in bank?

A. He told me he had $1,500 in the bank in Swansea, and if there was not something done about it, his widow would be left with nothing to go upon, and that he wanted me to go to Swansea and draw that money out, bring it to my home, and take care of it, until I seen what became of him, whether he would live or die. If he lived, why I could turn it over to him, and if he died, why I was to let the widow have it, turn it over to her or take care of it; so he called her and told her to get the bank book and give it to me, and I told him I could not get money out of the bank that way, unless I had a check. He asked me if I had any blank checks, saying that he had none. I told him: "Yes; I had a check book in my pocket." He told me to write out a check for it, and I did so. I handed it to him to sign; I helped him up in bed and steadied him for to sign it, and he told me he felt so weak that he did not feel able to write his name; that he would just make his mark, which he done.

Q. Who does it belong to?

A. Well, it belongs to the widow, I suppose.

Q. Tell us that conversation now.

A. He told me that he had $1,500 in the Bank of Swansea, and he wanted it to go to his wife, and he wanted me to go up there and get the money out of the bank that day, or as soon as I conveniently could, bring it home, keep it until he seen whether he lived or died; if he lived, turn it over to him, and if he died, to give it to his widow; that if he didn't make some provision for her, that she would be left without it, and no one to see after her; and I said: "Well, I would do the best I could for him."

Q. Did you have any more conversations with him, Mr. Justus, in reference to this matter until he died?

A. Yes, sir. Several times he talked to me about it. He tells me that he wanted me to attend to it, and he didn't think he would be able to get up. He wanted me to see that his wife got the money.

Q. Who did he give you the check or the money for?

A. For his wife.

Q. What was it that he told you that he wanted done with that check?

A. He wanted me to bring it home and keep it, and, if he lived, turn it over to him, and if he died, to give it to his widow.

Q. You were not his agent?

A. No, sir.

Q. He didn't make you his trustee?

A. No, sir.

The foregoing is the testimony of the witness, C. C. Justus, who was the brother-in-law of the intestate.

It appears in the record that Justus took the check in question to the Bank of Swansea the next day, and the check was marked paid by the cashier, and the amount placed to the account of the said C. C. Justus in the bank. Jefferson Sharpe died about a week afterwards, and Justus gave the plaintiff a check for this money, but the bank, on objection of the defendant, refused to pay the same.

Testimony of Watson Justus (son of C. C. Justus):

Q. What did Mr. Jefferson Sharpe say he wanted done with the money?

A. He said for Mr. Justus to get it, and, if Mr. Sharpe got well, to turn it back to him, and if he didn't, to give it to his widow, Mrs. Ellen Sharpe.

Q. What did your father say to him?

A. He told him, all right, that he would.

Q. After your father came there, did you hear any conversation in reference to any money in the Bank of Swansea?

A. Yes, sir; Mr. Jefferson Sharpe told Mr. Columbus Justus that Mr. Sharpe had $1,500 in the Bank of Swansea, and he told him that "I want you to get it out, I don't know whether I am going to live or not;" and he said, "If I don't live, you give it to my wife;" and he said, "If I do live, you can give it back to me." Mr. Justus told him all right, that he would do the very best for him that he could.

Rev. T. L. Belvin testified:

Q. Did he mention anything about his property to you?

A. Yes, sir; he told me to help him, and after talking about some matters concerning his spiritual interests, he then referred to some business matters.

Q. What did he say in respect to the business matters?

A. He said: "I am troubled about my little business;" he says: "I have fixed the money part; I had some money in the Bank of Swansea. I gave a check for that to my wife; but this property, this house and lot, is not fixed like I want it."

Q. Is that all he said?

A. Yes, sir. That is, I believe, absolutely all.

Mr. Webster King testified:

Q. During the night when you were there, did he talk with you?

A. Yes, sir; but he said nothing about his business affairs. Later during the night, Mr. C. C. Justus told Mr. Jefferson Sharpe in the presence of myself and Mr. Hooker that he had taken the check down to the bank, and that they didn't have the money, but just transferred it to his account, meaning Justus, and that he (Justus) understood that Ben Sharpe was complaining about it; then Mr. Jefferson Sharpe said: "Well, that is all right; it is a poor chance if a man cannot do what he wants to with what is his own;" that Ben was always too fast anyhow.

Mr. James Hooker testified:

Q. Do you recall any conversation being had in reference to Mr. Sharpe's property matters during the night?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Please tell us what was said or done.

A. Mr. Justus said to Mr. Jefferson Sharpe, that he had attended to that matter, that he had told him that they didn't have the money to cash the check at Swansea, and he placed it to his credit at Swansea, and he said it was all right. He said that he understood that Mr. Ben Sharpe was cutting up about it, and he said that it was all right, that he had got all he aimed for him to have; that he was always too fast anyhow.

Messrs. Wolfe & Berry for appellant.

Messrs. Barrett Jones and William L. Glaze for respondent.

Gage, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is widow of Jefferson Sharpe, and the defendant is his son by a former marriage. These two are at outs about $1,500 in money which had belonged to Jefferson, and which he had in a bank. The plaintiff, in an action to marshal the assets of Jefferson's estate, made claim for that $1,500, which she alleged her husband had given her on the eve of his death, donatio causa mortis. The defendant disputes the gift. The master sustained the gift; the circuit court concluded against the gift. And that is the issue.

There is no difference about the words used when the transaction was had. There is no difference about what in law constitutes a gift by reason of death. The only difference is the application of the law to the admitted transaction. If an intent may be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, the testimony here proves that the deceased intended for his wife to have this money after his death in the event of his death; all the testimony is that way, there is none contra. If that intention, as expressed, was in truth performed by the deceased, then the gift ought to be sustained. The court found that the transaction was had while the deceased was of sound mind, and that it was free from fraud, and to that there is no exception. The court also found that the transaction was had in view of the impending death of the deceased, and that the deceased died of the disorder which was then upon him; and to this there is no exception.

The only other factor going to constitute a donatio causa mortis is a delivery of the thing. All the real argument centers about that; the plaintiff's eleven exceptions and the defendant's one exception all go in the main to that issue.

The defendant, by proper exception, insists that Jefferson did not even sign the check, and there was, therefore, no first step taken towards the execution of his intent. The court did not decide that issue, and it is renewed here.

It is true that Jefferson's hand did not direct the pen which marked his name. The hand of Watson Justus did that. But Jefferson was present and directed the act to be done, and touched the pen which made the X.

It is true that the words, "his mark," were not written until Jef-

tion—attestation
after death.

erson was dead; and neither were the names of the two witnesses to the check written on the check until Jefferson was dead; but they were present and saw Jefferson give the direction and touch the pen. The bank took no exception to the manner in which the check was executed, for it paid it, so marked it, and the amount of it was put to the credit of the payee, bank—effect.

—recognition by

C. C. Justus. It is true that the bank's action is not conclusive against the defendant.

But when Watson Justus signed the name of Jefferson, in the presence of Jefferson, and by his direction, that was a signing by Jefferson, whether those who saw the transaction signed as witnesses or not. The authority of Watson to write Jefferson's name was confer-to attach signa-

able by parol; and the proof of the power and the execution of it rests upon the words of those who stood by and saw the transaction, whether they were designated as witnesses on the check or not. See Story, Agency, chap. 5; 2 C. J. pp. 449-451.

The testimony is clear that Jefferson authorized Watson to sign his name; there is none contra. The circuit court concluded from the testimony that C. C. Justus, the payee of the check and he who collected the money on it, was the agent of Jefferson; or, at most, was the agent of both Jefferson and Ellen. And the court concluded that a man cannot deliver to himself; and for that reason alone the court decreed against the gift. Let the three and a half pages of testimony quoted in the circuit opinion be reported.

A gift inter vivos does not differ, in its essential elements, from a gift <sup>Gift—characteristics.</sup> causa mortis, except that in the latter the survival of the donor may defeat the gift. Hall v. Howard, Rice, L. 314, 33 Am. Dec. 115.

In every gift, like in well-nigh every human act, there exist two elements. One of these involves the intent of the donor's mind; the other of these involves the act of the donor's hand. If a donor intends to confer on another ownership of his <sup>—what necessary.</sup> property, and if he proceeds so far as to do it, then the gift is complete.

The particular transaction, in the facts of it, may be muddled by the character of the thing given, to wit, a check on a bank, or by the agency through which the act is done, to wit, through the hands of another than the donee.

In the instant case, as we have held, the check was rightfully signed by Jefferson. The payee, Justus, drew the money from the bank and redeposited it in his own name. It is the same, then, as if Jefferson had put $1,500 into Justus's hands, with the direction to him about which there is really no dispute. Nor can there be any question but that Jefferson intended to give to Ellen; all the testimony is that way.

The only issue of fact and of law is, Did he sufficiently do it? Jefferson, if alive, could not be interested in that question, for had he put the money into Ellen's hands under the admitted direction, yet upon recovery it must have come back to him. Jefferson's heirs alone are interested in whether Jefferson went so far as to do what he intended to do. Under our cases, it is true, Jefferson must have done that which he intended to do. If he did not do that, that is, put the money into Ellen's hands, but instead of his agent to do that for him, then his act stopped short of a gift for it stopped short of a completed act. Plainly the putting of the money into Justus's hands was a putting it into Ellen's hands, if Justus represented Ellen. About that there will be no denial.

The court thought that the testimony made Justus the agent of Jefferson, or at least, the agent of both Jefferson and Ellen, and that, therefore, there was no delivery to Ellen. That is the narrow issue upon which the cause was decided, and we venture to think wrongly decided. In well-nigh every transaction of this sort where the donor acts in delivery through the agency of another, that other is in some sort his agent.

The action must be through another unless it be directly with the donee, because the donor acts in view of certain death. It is not likely to be exclusively with the donee, because his ownership is defeasible. And if the transaction be between the donor and the donee in their own persons, even in that case the donee is in some sense the agent of the donor to return the article to the donor in the event he shall survive. But that circumstance would not rob the delivery of its effectiveness. The emergencies of every such case press hard; a dying man, with mind freighted with memories of the past and apprehensions of the future; his friends gathered about the scene; no expert to advise what ought to be done to accomplish his intentions. Such a situation calls generally for the intervention of a third party, to hold the stake until the event be determined. We think too much nicety may be exercised in determining whom the third man exactly represents. If it be possible to do so, the law ought to be construed not too logically, but to meet the common transactions of our people in their homes. In the instant case the third person was the friend and kinsman of Ellen, his trust was to deliver to her, if the contemplated event shall happen, as it did.

It is true that had the donor recovered, it would have been the duty of the third person to return the money to the donor; but, as before suggested, that is not decisive of the question, for had the transaction been betwixt the donor and the donee, without the intervention of a third person, the same duty under the same circumstances would have rested on the donee. Enough was done to accomplish that which the donor intended; there was a sufficient delivery. —agent of donee.

The cases on the subject are not in harmony, of course. Our own case of Gilmore v. Whitesides, 1 Dud. Eq. 23, 31 Am. Dec. 563, was based largely on what the third person said; he said he acted for the donor. And that case involved the force and effect of a written instrument which was plainly not a gift causa mortis.

One case from Minnesota is on all fours with that at bar; and there the gift was sustained. Varley v. Sims, 100 Minn. 331, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 828, 117 Am. St. Rep. 694, 111 N. W. 269, 10 Ann. Cas. 473. And there are others of like import. The courts put the case upon a presumption of fact, that it will be presumed, nothing else appearing, that the third party acts for the donee. 12 R. C. L. 960. The respondent insists that gifts of this character ought to be looked in the mouth; that the courts ought to be jealously distrustful of them. Judge Butler said as much in Hall v. Howard, supra; but other judges have not expressed that view. Trenholm v. Morgan, 28 S. C. 278; 5 S. E. 721. Gifts causa mortis are older than the Republic; and if they be satisfactorily proved, it is the duty of the court to give effect to them. —duty of court.

We have not considered the suggestion of the respondent that the transaction was of a suspicious character; the decree below settled that issue, and there is no appeal from it.

Our opinion is that the judgment below be modified, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court to carry out our views herein expressed.

NOTE

The effect of delivery of personalty to a third person with directions to deliver after the donor's death to consummate a gift is considered in the annotation following INNES v. POTTER, post, 902, the status of the third person in respect of a gift causa mortis being considered at pages 912 et seq.

IRVINE INNES, Admr., etc., of Warren Potter, Deceased, Appt.,
v.

HELEN MARCIA POTTER, Respt.

(180 Minn. 320, 158 N. W. 604.)

Gift — direction to deliver after donor's death.

1. Similar rules apply to personal as to real property, and the owner of personal property may make a valid gift thereof with the right of enjoyment in the donee postponed until the death of the donor, if the subject of the gift be delivered to a third person with instructions to deliver it to the donee upon the donor's death, and if the donor parts with all control over it, reserves no right to recall, and intends a final disposition of the property given.

— delivery to stranger.

2. Defendant's father, now deceased, delivered to one Casey an envelop containing a certificate of corporation stock with an assignment to defendant indorsed thereon, with directions in writing to Casey to deliver the certificate to defendant "only in case of" his death. After his death Casey delivered the certificate to defendant.

Deed — deposit for delivery after death.

3. Where a grantor executes a deed of real estate and deposits it with a third person to be delivered by him to the grantee after death of the grantor, and reserves to himself no right to control or recall the instrument, the transaction is a valid one, and full and complete title is vested in the grantee after the death of the grantor.

Gift — character.

4. The gift in this case is within the rule. The test of a "gift," as distinguished from a will, is, that in case of a gift some interest vests at once in right. The gift in this case was not testamentary in character, and it was valid.

— testamentary character.

5. The direction to the trustee to deliver to the donee "only in case of the death" of the donor is not decisive of testamentary character. Nor is the statement of the donor that he wants to "leave" a certain property to the donee.

— necessity of delivery.

6. Delivery is necessary to give effect to a gift.

Will — testamentary character of instrument.

7. Whether or not an instrument is testamentary in character depends upon the intention of the maker; the fact that it postpones the enjoyment of the subject-matter until after the death of the grantor is not decisive.

[See 12 R. C. L. 931.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Aitkin County in defendant's favor in an action brought to determine the ownership of a certificate of corporate stock which had been delivered by defendant's father to a third party, to be held by him and delivered to defendant after the father's death. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Fryberger, Fulton, & Spear, for appellant:

The facts in this case do not and cannot constitute in law a valid gift inter vivos.

Logenfiel v. Richter, 60 Minn. 49, 61 N. W. 826; 20 Cyc. 1198, 1199, 1211, 1213; Bowen v. Kutzner, 93 C. C. A. 83, 167 Fed. 281; Harris Bkg. Co. v. Miller, 190 Mo. 640, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 790, 89 S. W. 629; Burt v. Andrews, 112 Ga. 465, 37 S. E. 726.

There was no valid intent on the donor's part so as to constitute a gift inter vivos.

McFerrin v. Templeman, 102 Tex. 530, 120 S. W. 167.

The impression produced on the agent's mind was that the donor intended the gift to be revocable, and not to vest in presenti.

Wagner v. Kirchberg, 166 Mich. 411, 181 N. W. 1114; Cole v. Cole, 144 Mich. 676, 108 N. W. 101.

The words used show the delivery to have been conditional and revocable.

Where a deed or gift which is beneficial to the grantee or donee, and imposes no burden upon him, is delivered unconditionally by the grantor or donor, with intent that it will take effect immediately, to a third party, for the use and benefit of the grantee or donee, who has no knowledge of it, the latter's acceptance of it will be presumed, and the delivery will be complete and sufficient to pass the title to him.

Hallam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Warren Potter was the owner of 1,370 shares of stock, of the par value of $100 a share, in the Potter-Casey Company, a business corporation of Aitkin county. In 1910, he was a man advanced in years. He had made a will some years before. In the meantime his business associate, Mr. Casey, had died and his estate had been probated. There was "considerable noise" about the amount of his property, and a substantial inheritance tax had been paid. On December 27, 1910, after some talk with J. A. Casey, son of his former associate, in which deceased stated that he wanted to leave a certain amount of property to his daughter, he took a certificate of 1,000 shares of stock of the Potter-Casey Company, indorsed upon it an absolute assignment to the defendant, and wrote a letter addressed to her in which he stated that he had transferred this stock to her, and making certain requests. The certificate, with the indorsement upon it, and this letter, he inclosed in an envelop, securely sealed it, and indorsed thereon the following:

The certificate No. 1 for 1,000 m shares to be sent by registered letter to H. Marcia Potter if not present, or handed to her, taking her receipt for the same. ———. These certificates to be held by J. A. Casey and delivered to the above parties only in case of the death of Warren Potter.

This he then delivered to J. A. Casey, and Casey held it until Mr. Potter's death. Deceased never mentioned the matter to Casey again, and never exercised or attempted to exercise any control over the stock. Warren Potter died in February, 1914. After his death, J. A. Casey delivered the envelop and its contents to the defendant. She opened the envelop, and took therefrom the letter and the certificate. Potter's will was admitted to probate, and plaintiff was appointed administrator with the will annexed. He commenced this action to recover possession of the certificate of stock, or its value. The trial court found that defendant owned the stock, that deceased intended to and did relinquish all control over the stock and all rights in it, that he intended to and did give the stock to defendant, and intended that the gift take effect at once on the delivery to Casey, but that the right of defendant to the beneficial enjoyment thereof was postponed until the death of deceased.

2. The first question is this: Is it competent for a person to make a gift of personal property by delivery of the subject of the gift to a trustee, where delivery by the trustee to the donee and beneficial enjoyment by the donee are postponed until the death of the donor?

As to deeds of real estate, the law in this state is well settled. Where a grantor executes a deed and deposits it with a third person, to be delivered by him to the grantee after the death of the grantor, and reserves to himself no right to control or recall the instrument, the transaction is a valid one, and full and complete title is vested in the grantee after death of the grantor. Haeg v. Haeg, 58 Minn. 38, 55 N. W. 1114; Wicklund v. Lindquist, 102 Minn. 321, 113 N. W. 631; Dickson v. Miller, 124 Minn. 346, 145 N. W. 112. This is true, even though the enjoyment of the estate granted is postponed until the death of the grantor, and even though the deed thereof expressly reserves a life estate in the grantor (Ekblaw v. Nelson, 124 Minn. 335, 144 N. W. 1094), and even though the grant is subject to the contingency that the grantee survive the grantor, or to any contingency, as long as it is one over which the grantor has no control (Thomas v. Williams, 105 Minn. 88, 117 N. W. 155).

3. Anciently there was no such thing recognized in law as an expectant estate in personal property. This was because of the perishable nature of such property, its movable characteristics, and its insignificance. An exception was early made in favor of chattels real. Manning's Case, 8 Coke, 94b, 77 Eng. Reprint, 618; Lampet's Case, 10 Coke, 46b, 77 Eng. Reprint, 994. But in that case only as to interests created by will, and when merely the use of the chattel was given to the first legatee. 2 Bl. Com. 398. The exception was later extended from chattels real to chattels personal, under like restrictions. 2 Bl. Com. 398; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 360, 21 Eng. Reprint, 1102. These limitations one by one dropped away. In chancery, before the close of the seventeenth century, it was settled that a bequest of an expectant estate in goods to another was good, whether the goods or the use of the goods were given to the first legatee. Hyde v. Parrat, 1 P. Wms. 1, 24 Eng. Reprint, 269, 2 Vern. 331, 23 Eng. Reprint, 813. And in recent times it has not been necessary in England that limitations of this sort be made by will. They are equally good when made by deed of trust. Child v. Baylie, Cro. Jac. 459, 79 Eng. Reprint, 393; 2 Bl. Com. 398.

Perishable chattels are said to constitute an exception to the rule, particularly chattels the use of which consists in their consumption. But the reason given is one of construction, the theory being that the gift of such articles for life must have been intended as an absolute gift, since one could not use without consuming the property. Andrew v. Andrew, 1 Colly. Ch. Cas. 686, 63 Eng. Reprint, 598; Randall v. Russell, 3 Meriv. 190, 36 Eng. Reprint, 73, 17 Revised Rep. 56; Evans v. Iglehart, 6 Gill & J. 171; Henderson v. Vaultx, 10 Yerg. 30; German v. German, 27 Pa. 116, 67 Am. Dec. 451.

The doctrine that personal property may be limited by way of remainder after a life interest created at the same time was early recognized in the United States. 2 Kent, Com. 13th ed. *352, 353, and notes; Moffat v. Strong, 10 Johns. 12; Langworthy v. Chadwick, 13 Conn. 42. The disposition of the later cases has been to dispense with all fictitious distinctions between transfers of real and personal property, and to apply the same rules to both, except where distinctions are founded upon some substantial principle of law, or are required by some statutory enactment. In this state, expectant interests in personal property are recognized. State ex rel. Tozer v. Probate Ct. 102 Minn. 268, 291, 113 N. W. 888. Since it is competent for a person to create an expectant interest in personal property, we see no ground for saying that he may not do so either by will, by sale, or by gift. Nor do we see any reason why the rules as to delivery to a third person, with direction to deliver to the donee on the death of the donor, should not apply to personal as well as to real property. Delivery is, of course, necessary to give effect to a gift, but so it <sup>Gift—necessity of delivery.</sup> is to give effect to a deed. If valid delivery may be made to a trustee in case of a gift of a deed of real property, why not in case of a gift of personal property? Not only do we think there should be no distinction between the two classes of property in this respect, but we are equally convinced that it is the settled law in most of the states of the Union that no such distinction does exist. Grant Trust & Sav. Co. v. Tucker, 49 Ind. App. 345, 96 N. E. 487; Tucker v. Tucker, 138 Iowa, 344, 116 N. W. 119; Meriwether v. Morrison, 78 Ky. 572; Green v. Tulane, 52 N. J. Eq. 169, 28 Atl. 9; Re King, 115 App. Div. 751, 100 N. Y. Supp. 1089; see also Smith v. Wold, 125 Minn. 190, 145 N. W. 1067. The decision in Logenfiel v. Richter, 60 Minn. 49, 61 N. W. 826, as we understand it, does not hold to the contrary.

We accordingly hold that the owner of personal property may make a valid gift thereof, with the right of enjoyment in the donee postponed until the death of the donor, if the subject of the gift be delivered to a third person, with instructions to deliver it to the donee upon the donor's death, and if the donor parts with all control over it, reserves no right to recall, and intends thereby a final disposition of the property given.

4. The next question is, Did this transaction constitute such a gift? Plaintiff's contention is that the transaction was not a gift at all, but that it is testamentary in character, and void. The gift, if sustainable at all, must be sustained as a gift inter vivos. It was in no sense a gift causa mortis. Effect should be given to the transaction if possible. Thomas v. Williams, 105 Minn. 88, 117 N. W. 155. If, as plaintiff claims, the documents were testamentary in character the transaction was void, for the formalities required for the execution of a will were not followed. It is only by construing the transaction as an executed gift that effect can be given to it at all. It is not always easy to determine whether or not an instrument is testamentary in character. It depends upon the intention of the maker.

Will—testamentary character of instrument.

The fact that the instrument postpones the enjoyment of the subject-matter until after the death of the grantor is not decisive that the instrument is testamentary in character. The test is whether the maker intended the instrument to have no effect until after the maker's death, or whether he intended it to transfer some present interest. If some interest vests at once in right, though the enjoyment of it be postponed, the instrument is not a will, and it is irrevocable. Thomas v. Williams, supra. We think the evidence sustains the finding of the trial court that the transaction constituted an absolute and irrevocable gift from deceased to defendant.

5. Plaintiff contends that the direction to deliver "only in case of death" of the donor signifies a condition attached to the delivery, and an intent that the gift shall become operative only in the event that the donee survived the donor. There is some authority sustaining plaintiff's contention. Sterling v. Wilkinson, 88 Va. 791, 8 S. E. 533. We do not, however, agree as to this effect of the words, "in case of death." If the donor were at the time suffering with some illness, as in the case of Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 27 L. ed. 500, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 415, such language might well be construed to imply a condition that the gift should be operative only in the event of death from such illness, and the survival of the donee. But Warren Potter was not ill, nor was there anything that suggested impending death. Under the circumstances, we think the language, "in case of death," which was —testamentary character, certain sooner or later to occur, meant nothing more or less than that delivery should be made upon the death of the donor. And this is sustained by authority. Small v. Marburg, 77 Md. 11, 19, 25 Atl. 920; Goodell v. Pierce, 2 Hill, 659; Ewing v. Winters, 34 W. Va. 23, 11 S. E. 718.

Plaintiff lays much stress upon the fact that J. A. Casey testified that if Potter had in his lifetime demanded a return of the envelop and its contents he would have returned it to him. It is not certain that this expressed anything more than Casey's mistaken view of the law applicable to such a case, or his submission to Potter's judgment. But in any event the evidence is not decisive. The intention of Potter, not of Casey, controls.

Nor do we attach great importance to the statement of Casey that Potter said that he wanted to "leave" a certain amount of property to his daughter Marcia. The word "leave" is often used in reference to property left by will, but the word is often loosely used, and its use should not be given controlling importance.

Plaintiff also urges strongly that deceased was endeavoring by this transaction to evade the payment of the inheritance tax. We are not sure that he did not have such a purpose. But we cannot see that it is important whether he did or not. It seems to be conceded that he did not succeed, and that his property is subject to tax whether this be construed as a gift or not. If the construction of this as a gift would result in a fraud upon the state, that circumstance might be a reason for not adopting that construction, but this is not such a case. Judgment affirmed.

896). And see the cases cited throughout this subdivision.

It is well settled that delivery to a third person as agent or trustee for the use of the donee, and under such circumstances as to indicate that the grantor relinquishes all control over the property, and intends to vest title in the donee, is quite as effectual as a delivery to the donee as a manual delivery directly to him. Tucker v. Tucker (1908) 138 Iowa, 344, 116 N. W. 119; Jones v. Nicholas (1911) 151 Iowa, 362, 130 N. W. 125.

In such a case, where the gift is absolute, postponement of the delivery and enjoyment of the gift does not necessarily prevent the passing of a present interest, even though possession by the donee is not obtained until after the donor's death. Tucker v. Tucker and Jones v. Nicholas (Iowa) supra; PYLE v. EAST (reported herewith) ante, 885. And see the cases cited throughout this subdivision of the note.

The gift may be in the nature of a forgiveness or a release of a debt due from the donee to the donor, subject to the payment of interest during the life of the donor; and a delivery of the note or evidence of debt to a third person to be surrendered on the death of the donor is sufficient to complete the gift. PYLE v. EAST (Iowa) supra; Hagerman v. Wigent (1896) 108 Mich. 192, 65 N. W. 756.

Even where there is a right to revoke a deposit which has been made with a third person for delivery to the beneficiary after the death of the depositor, it has been held that if the right of revocation has never been exercised, and the delivery has been made, the reservation does not affect the beneficiary's title. PYLE v. EAST (Iowa) supra; Giddings v. Giddings (1878) 51 Vt. 227, 31 Am. Rep. 682. See also Blanchard v. Sheldon (1871) 43 Vt. 512.

Where personal property is thus delivered to a third person with directions to deliver it to the donee after the donor's death, and the delivery is absolute and unconditional, so that the gift takes effect at once, the gift being beneficial to the donee, the law presumes the assent of the donee to and his acceptance of the gift. Taylor v. Harrison (1899) 179 Ill. 137, 58 N. E. 584, affirming (1896) 79 Ill. App. 380; Langworthy v. Crissey (1894) 10 Misc. 450, 31 N. Y. Supp. 85, affirmed in (1895) 92 Hun, 608, 26 N. Y. Supp. 1127; Blanchard v. Sheldon (Vt.) supra. And the acts of the trustee or third person receiving the property for the benefit of the donee are deemed to be in the interest of the latter, and the acceptance of the gift is presumed. Re Podhajsky (1908) 137 Iowa, 742, 115 N. W. 590; Jones v. Nicholas (Iowa) supra. The acceptance of the donee being presumed until such presumption is removed, where nothing appears to remove the presumption it is conclusive for the purposes of the case. Grant Trust & Sav. Co. v. Tucker (1911) 49 Ind. App. 345, 96 N. E. 487.

Where there is an absolute gift inter vivos, and the effect of the delivery is to vest a present title in the donee, no subsequent act of the donor, such as retaking of the property given, can detract from the title which has already vested in the donee. Coward v. De Cray (1918) — Cal. App. —, 176 Pac. 56.

1. Evidence held to show relinquishment.

(a) In general.

In order to constitute a valid gift inter vivos of personal property delivered by a donor to a third person, with instructions to deliver it to the donee at the death of the donor, there must be an immediate transfer of the title, and the donor must relinquish all present and future right, possession, dominion, or control over the property given.

Thus, in each of the following cases, the evidence was held to be sufficient to show that, by his delivery of personal property to a third person to be delivered to the donee after his death, the donor relinquished all present and future control, possession, and dominion over the property given, and hence that there was a valid gift inter vivos:

Ruiz v. Dow (1896) 113 Cal. 490, 45 Pac. 867. It appeared that a husband executed an instrument conveying all his personal property to his wife, which instrument was subsequently delivered to the cashier of a bank, with an indorsement on the envelop containing it, directing that at his death it should be recorded.

Coward v. De Cray (1918) — Cal. App. —, 176 Pac. 56. It appeared that a donor delivered certain certificates of bank stock owned by her and indorsed to her niece, to her attorney for the indorsee, and directed him to hold them until her death, and then to give them to the indorsee. Some six weeks later she procured the certificates from the attorney for the purpose of surrendering them and obtaining new ones, the change being necessary, she claimed, because the bank intended to change from a state to a national bank, and she stated that when the change was made she would replace the certificates with the attorney. This, however, she did not do, but kept them until her death.

Wyble v. McPheters (1875) 52 Ind. 393. It was alleged that certain bonds and money were, in the lifetime of the donor, delivered by him to the defendant, with directions to deliver them to the donor's children on his death, and that the defendant received them, and agreed to execute the trust thus reposed in him.

Grant Trust & Sav. Co. v. Tucker (1911) 49 Ind. App. 345, 96 N. E. 487. It appeared from the special finding of facts that the donor, the owner of certain bonds, inclosed them in an envelop and left them with a bank for safe-keeping, indorsing on the envelop the following: "April 7, 1899. In case of my death deliver to Cora Breed. H. S. Mark,"—and delivered the package to the bank, and it was placed in its vault. Thereafter the donor procured additional government bonds, and in each instance he directed George Webster, Jr., who was cashier of the bank, to place the bonds in the envelop with the bonds already placed therein, to which he referred as "Cora's other bonds." Webster on such occasions asked him if he desired to continue his previous instructions, to which he replied, in substance, that he did, and on each occasion, at his direction, the cashier indorsed on the envelop the following: "May 5, 1905. Renewed this instruction. G. W., Jr." "May 9, 1906. This instruction continued. G. W., Jr." "February 14, 1908. This instruction continued. G. W., Jr." All bonds placed in the envelop on April 7, 1899, and those subsequently placed therein, remained continuously in the vault of the Marion Bank and its successor, Marion State Bank, until after the death of the donor, with the exception that on one occasion, at the donor's request, the cashier forwarded to Washington a portion of the registered bonds, to have an error in the use of the name "Marks" instead of "Mark" corrected. After such correction had been made the bonds were returned directly to the bank, and again placed in the envelop so indorsed as aforesaid. The vault in which the package containing the bonds was kept was at all times under the exclusive control of the officers of the bank, and was used by them for the safe-keeping of the funds and valuable papers of the bank, and also the papers of its customers, the donor never having known the combination to the safe, nor ever having any means of access to the vault. Webster acted as cashier of the banks during all the time the bonds were so held by them, and, at the request of the donor, when each quarterly instalment of interest fell due on the bonds he detached the interest coupons, and they were by the donor deposited to his own credit in the bank; and on one occasion he caused the cashier to place in the envelop a sum of money, and subsequently called for and received it. After April 7, 1899, on divers occasions and to numerous persons, including the husband of the plaintiff, and to other close friends and business acquaintances of his, the donor, in substance, stated that he had given the bonds in question to "Cora" (meaning the plaintiff); and on different occasions, while the bonds were in the keeping of the bank, he stated to the husband of the plaintiff, that he had deposited the bonds with the bank for "Cora," but that he had reserved the interest during his lifetime. When requested by the donee's husband, Breed, to use the bonds in purchasing real estate, he replied that the bonds did not belong to him, and that if he should make an arrangement to exchange them for the real estate he could not put the real estate under the same conditions that the bonds were, without making an absolute deed; that he had given the bonds to the plaintiff, but had placed them in the bank so they would be easily accessible for the clipping of the coupons from which he derived enough money to live on. He did not at any time after April 7, 1899, assert ownership of the bonds, or seek to regain possession or control of them.

Snyder v. Frank (1913) 53 Ind. App. 301, 101 N. E. 684. It appeared that a donor executed deeds to his real estate and assigned notes, certificates of deposit, and certificates of stock in various banks and other corporations, and placed these in separate envelops addressed to each of his children, and then delivered the envelopes to the cashier of a bank to be delivered to his children after his death.

Re Podhajsky (1908) 137 Iowa, 742, 115 N. W. 590. It appeared that the owner of certain lots executed a deed of conveyance thereof to his wife, and placed the deed in the hands of a third person, with an instrument in writing appointing the third person trustee and directing the latter, on his wife's paying $1,000 to the latter for the property so deeded to her, after his death, to distribute the money to the beneficiaries named therein.

PLYE v. EAST (reported herewith) ante, 885. It appeared that the note in suit was given by a nephew to his uncle as part of the purchase price of land sold by the latter to the former, the latter indorsing and signing an agreement on the back of the note to the effect that it was to be void and to become the property of the nephew on the uncle's death. The instrument was then, by agreement of the parties, placed in the hands of a third person to hold and collect the interest thereon during the life of the payee, and, on his death, then to surrender or deliver it to the maker.

Meriwether v. Morrison (1880) 78 Ky. 572. The undisputed facts were as follows: The owner of certain promissory notes indorsed them as follows: "I transfer the within note as a gift to Miss Agnes Morrison." He told the donee of the fact, and gave the notes to his nephew, directing the latter to put them back in his (the donor's) desk, and after his death to give them to the donee.

Burge v. Burge (1903) 25 Ky. L. Rep. 979, 76 S. W. 873. It appeared that a father, a few days before his death, gave a third person a certificate for $600, directing the latter to use $300 of it for the purpose of paying the expenses of his last illness and his funeral expenses, and to pay the remaining $300 to his son.

Davis v. Ney (1878) 125 Mass. 590, 28 Am. Rep. 572. It appeared that a depositor assigned her deposits and delivered her bank books to the treasurer of the bank on the agreement that he was to draw for her whatever she wanted during her lifetime, and to pay the balance, if any, left at her death, to her son.

Scrivens v. North Easton Sav. Bank (1896) 166 Mass. 255, 44 N. E. 251. It appeared that a father deposited a sum of money in the bank, telling the treasurer that he wanted his son to have it after his death, and on the bank book an entry was made stating that the account was "payable, in case of my death," to the son. About four months after the deposit was made, the father handed the book to his son, and told him to take it and keep it safe. The son took the book, looked it over, saw what it was but handed it back, saying that he would leave it there until called for. On several occasions thereafter the father told him that when he wanted the money he could have it.

INNES v. POTTER (reported herewith) ante, 896. It appears that the donor, after stating that he wanted to leave a certain amount of property to his daughter, took a certificate of stock, inclosed in it an absolute assignment to her, and wrote a letter to her in which he stated that he had transferred this stock to her. The certificate, with the indorsement on it, and this letter, he inclosed in an envelop, securely sealed it, and indorsed thereon the following: "The certificate No. 1 for 1,000 m shares to be sent by registered letter to H. Marcia Potter if not present, or handed to her, taking her receipt for the same."

These certificates to be held by J. A. Casey and delivered to the above parties only in case of the death of Warren Potter." He then delivered it to the trustee named, who kept it until after the donor's death, the latter never having exercised or attempted to exercise any control over the stock while in the trustee's hands.

Greene v. Tulane (1893) 52 N. J. Eq. 169, 28 Atl. 9. It appeared that the owner of certain bonds deposited them with a third person and at the same time handed to the latter a paper signed by himself, stating that: "Having deposited in the hands of [naming the person] three $1,000 bonds of the state of New Jersey, I hereby authorize and direct him, in case of my death, to deliver said bonds to [the donees named], to be equally divided between them."

Langworthy v. Crissey (1894) 10 Misc. 450, 31 N. Y. Supp. 85, affirmed in (1895) 92 Hun, 608, 36 N. Y. Supp. 1127. It appeared that a donor delivered a promissory note to a third person, without indorsing it, and directed the latter to take care of it, and when she died to give it to the donee.

Blanchard v. Sheldon (1871) 43 Vt. 512. It appeared that the donor delivered to the defendant $300, and took from him the following instrument in writing: "For value received I promise to pay Aurilla Ballou $300, with annual interest, if she called for it before she deceased; if not, to be paid to Daniel M. Blanchard by her order. Henry L. Sheldon. Miranda Hines. January 12, 1867." She put the instrument with her other papers and kept it awhile, but before her decease sent it with her other papers in a box to defendant, who retained them in his custody till after her decease.

(b) Reservation of life interest by donor.

Where there has been an absolute and completed gift of personal property to a third person to be delivered to the donee after the donor's death, the fact that the donor has reserved to himself during his lifetime the earnings of the property, such as the interest on bank deposits, or the dividends on stock, will not show such a failure to relinquish dominion and control over the property, as will defeat a gift inter vivos, otherwise valid.

The test seems to be whether any interest in the property itself has been retained, as distinguished from the mere use or enjoyment. Tucker v. Tucker (1908) 138 Iowa, 344, 116 N. W. 119; Jones v. Nicholas (1911) 151 Iowa, 362, 130 N. W. 125.

In Robertson v. Robertson (Ala.) supra, it appeared that a donor gave by a written agreement certain bonds to a trustee, charging the trustee with the payment to him of the interest on the bonds for his life, and directing that on his death they should be delivered to persons named. It was held that this was an irrevocable disposition of the property conveyed by the assignment, by which the title passed immediately out of the grantor, and was not testamentary in its character as against the wife.

In Green v. Tulane (1893) 52 N. J. Eq. 169, 28 Atl. 9, it appeared that the owner of certain bonds deposited them with a third person, and at the same time handed to the latter a paper signed by himself, stating: "Having deposited in the hands of [naming the person] three $1,000 bonds of the state of New Jersey, I hereby authorize and direct him, in case of my death, to deliver said bonds to [the donees named], to be equally divided between them." It was held that the delivery of the bonds to the third person invested the latter with the title at law to them, and put it in the latter's power to dispose of them and make title to them without any further act on the part of the donor. The donor having died without resuming possession of the bonds, or having revoked his direction in writing that they should be delivered to the beneficiaries named, it was held that the gift was complete, and the donees were entitled to the subject of it. The court also held that the mere fact that the third person paid the donor the interest that accrued on the bonds up to the latter's death went no further than to show, prima facie, that he held the bonds for the donor's benefit during his lifetime, but did not contradict the donor's declaration in writing as to who were to be the cestuis que trust of the bonds at and after his death.

In Grant v. Trust & Sav. Co. v. Tucker (1911) 49 Ind. App. 345, 96 N. E. 487, it appeared that a donor delivered certain bonds to a bank, to be delivered to the donee after his death, but reserved to himself the interest accruing thereon during his lifetime. The court held that the fact that the bonds were under the control of the donor to the extent of enabling him to obtain the interest coupons as they matured, was not inconsistent with the idea that the bank held the bonds as trustee for the donee, and that the owner had unconditionally parted with the control and ownership thereof, but only tended to show that the bank was also trustee for the donor for the purpose of securing to him the interest thereon during his lifetime, and which he had reserved to himself. The court held that if he desired to retain the interest during his lifetime and to give to the donee the principal of the bonds, with interest thereon after his death, the bank could consistently act as trustee for both the donor and the donee for the accomplishment of the ends in view.

In Seavey v. Seavey (1888) 30 Ill. App. 625, it appeared that a father indorsed certain notes and delivered them to his son, who in effect retained possession thereof until the donor's death, for the benefit of the donee's daughters. The donor reserved the right to have the interest accruing on the notes, or so much as he should need for support during his natural life, and at his death the notes were to be delivered to and divided between the beneficiaries. It was held that the trial court did not err in holding that the disposition of the notes was a valid gift inter vivos.

In Smith v. Youngblood (1900) 68 Ark. 255, 58 S. W. 42, the lower court found that the donor gave to the defendant a sum of money for the plaintiffs, to be held by him for them for and during the term of the donor's natural life, and to be paid over to the plaintiffs in equal proportions at her death, the donor reserving the interest for her life for the support and maintenance of herself and the plaintiffs. The evidence supporting this finding, the court held the following principle of law was applicable: "The delivery of property to a third person as trustee for the donee, and not as the agent of the donor, where the latter relinquishes all dominion of the property to the trustee for the purposes of the trust, is a sufficient delivery to complete the gift, which in such case is not revoked by the subsequent death of the donor before the property has been actually delivered to the donee. And the validity of the gift is not affected by the fact that the trustee is not to deliver the property to the donee until after the donor's death." The court stated that the transaction as shown constituted a gift inter vivos.

In PYLE v. EAST (reported herewith) ante, 885, the note in suit was given by a nephew to his uncle as part of the purchase price of land sold by the latter to the former, the latter indorsing and signing an agreement on the back of the note to the effect that it was to be void and to become the property of the nephew on the uncle's death. The instrument was then, by agreement of the parties, placed in the hands of a third person to hold and collect the interest thereon during the life of the payee, and, on his death, then to surrender or deliver it to the maker. The court held that, the evidence sufficiently establishing these facts and that the uncle retained to himself no interest therein or control thereof except to demand and receive the interest, the deposit of the note in the third person's hands was, in legal effect, a delivery sufficient to validate the transaction.

In Hagerman v. Wigent (1896) 108 Mich. 192, 65 N. W. 756, it appeared that the donor frequently expressed her intention of giving the donees a mortgage executed by them to her, stating that she only expected and desired to recover interest on it while she lived. To effectuate this intention, she delivered the mortgage to her husband, with instructions to deliver it to the donees after her death. It was held that this was a sufficient delivery to constitute a valid gift inter vivos.

In Larimer v. Beardsley (1905) 130 Iowa, 706, 107 N. W. 935, it appeared that a donor delivered to the defendant, his attorney, a certificate of national bank stock, assigning the same to him as trustee, with the oral agreement that the defendant should hold the same as trustee until the death of the donor, when the stock was to be equally divided between the defendant and the donee, with a reservation to the donor during his lifetime of the right to use the dividends from the shares of stock. Later the donor wrote a letter to the defendant, expressing in definite terms the purpose of the assignment previously made. Later still, he wrote a letter to the donee, to whom he was engaged to be married, in which he related the fact that, after having had an attack of pneumonia, he had, when sufficiently recovered to get about, made an assignment to her for $5,000 of the stock, and left it in the hands of the defendant with instructions to surrender the stock to the bank and have new stock issued to the donee in her name, and to send the same to her in case of his death. The donor and donee subsequently entered into an antenuptial contract, wherein it was stipulated that the donor should pay the donee on demand $15,000, and the donee, in consideration of the promise and payment, relinquished all her claims and demands on all other real or personal property of the donor. Subsequently, and after the marriage of the donor and donee, a new certificate of stock was issued for reasons not indicating any change of relations between the parties, and was held by the defendant as a substitute for the original certificate. It was held that facts showed that the gift became effectual as a completed gift inter vivos by the unconditional assignment and delivery of the certificate of stock to the defendant as trustee, and that the subsequent antenuptial contract could not operate by its terms as a waiver or relinquishment thereof on the part of the donee.

In Tucker v. Tucker (1908) 138 Iowa, 344, 116 N. W. 119, it appeared that a donor deposited two sums of $4,500 in a bank, the second sum two months after the first, receiving certificates of deposit from the bank, bearing interest on return after the lapse of a year. The cashier of the bank testified that some time later, at the donor's request, he called at the latter's house and wrote across the back of the first certificate, "Pay to George F. Tucker," and on the back of the last, "Pay to John A. Tucker" (sons of the donor), and signed each indorsement. As George was then out of the state, he handed the one indorsed to him to John, with the request that the latter take care of it for his brother, and John placed it in a safety box in the bank, where it remained until a year later, when the donor removed it therefrom, and, in order to draw the interest thereon, surrendered it to the bank. The bank issued another, which was placed in the safety box, where it remained until the donor's death. The same procedure was followed with respect to obtaining the interest on the second certificate. The court held that the evidence showed a valid gift inter vivos, saying: "The intention that his sons should have them, and that in executing the assignments thereof, and their manual delivery with such assignments to John A. Tucker with the expressed purpose of giving them, leaves no escape from the conclusion that the gifts were consummated. If the certificates of deposit were surrendered, this was the sole object of complying with the requirements of the bank in procuring the interest. They were evidences of the funds in the bank which then belonged to the sons, and their title thereto was not affected by the substitution of other certificates without their consent. The second certificate indorsed to John was like the first, save in the matter of date, but the certificate issued in the place of that assigned to George was payable 'to order of A. C. Tucker, or to George F. Tucker in case of death of A. C. Tucker.' Neither George nor the person in whose care the certificate had been left was consulted as to this change, and the evidence is conclusive that it was made only to enable the donor to draw his interest, and without any purpose on the part of deceased to revoke the gift or assert title to the fund. After the fund had passed irrevocably to George, it is idle to contend that the donor could acquire it again without some act of the donee indicating a purpose to revest him therewith."

In Jones v. Nicholas (1911) 151 Iowa, 362, 130 N. W. 125, the facts were as follows: The donor deposited $1,000 in a bank to be held and used for the benefit of the donee, and declared at the time of the deposit, and frequently thereafter, that she wished the deposit to vest in the donee, payable to her at the donor's death, without any reservation whatsoever, save as to the interest on the money. A certificate of deposit was issued by the bank for that amount, payable to the donor, and, in the event of her death, to the donee, the principal being deposited for the benefit of the donee, interest thereon being payable to the donor, and the principal payable to the donee at the death of the donor, but the certificate of deposit was never delivered to the donee. Subsequently the donor directed her attorney in fact to cash the certificate made payable to the donee, and told him to use the money as he saw fit, preferably, however, investing it in the purchase of a lot for a granddaughter. It was held that the evidence established an irrevocable voluntary trust or gift in favor of the donee, which the subsequent acts of the settlor or trustee could not affect.

In Abegg v. Hirst (1909) 144 Iowa, 196, 138 Am. St. Rep. 285, 122 N. W. 838, the question was whether the assignment of a note and mortgage to a husband and wife jointly, and the delivery of the instruments to him, and the subsequent retention thereof in his possession during his lifetime, accompanied by the collection of the interest thereon by him, apparently in his own right, showed a gift of a one-half interest therein to his wife. The court stated that, had the assignment been to the wife, accompanied by delivery to a trustee to hold for the wife until her husband's death, collecting the interest in the meantime for the benefit of the husband, there would have been no doubt as to the complete consummation of the gift; for knowledge of such a gift, purely beneficial, need not have been shown to have been brought home to the donee during the lifetime of the donor, and it was immaterial that there was a postponement of the time of enjoyment of the property until after the donor's death.

In the case of Re Soulard (1897) 141 Mo. 642, 43 S. W. 617, it appeared that a donor executed an instrument in writing which provided in part as follows: "I hereby give to [the donees named] the following described notes and bonds, or any reinvestment of the principal of the same that may be hereafter made, . . . reserving, however, for my own use during my life, the income or interest from said notes, and restraining them from making any disposition of the principal of said notes during my life, and also reserving the right to reinvest any money from the payment of these notes as to me may seem fit." This instrument, and also the notes and bonds, were delivered to one of the donees, who also acted as agent for the donor under a power of attorney, on the understanding "that he would not have any of the income, or anything of that sort, during" the donor's life. The interest on the notes and bonds was collected by the donor or his agent until his death. Several of the notes matured during the lifetime of the donor, and they were collected, and the proceeds thereof reinvested, under the direction of himself or his agent. It was held that though the evidence showed a delivery of the notes and bonds to one of the donees, who was also the agent of the donor, and also a clearly expressed intention to give them to the donees named, yet the transaction did not amount to an executed gift, under the rules of law applicable to gifts inter vivos. The court held that the transfer to the donees was not absolute and unqualified; that the right of control reserved by the donor was inconsistent with absolute ownership by the donees, the latter taking no present, unconditional title to the notes so long as the donor retained control over them and their proceeds; and that it was clear that the donor intended that the gift should not become perfect until his death.

Where there has been a completed gift, the mere fact that naked possession has been acquired by the donor for the temporary purpose of enjoying the use thereof only, as for the collection of interest on deposits in a bank, or the dividends on stock therein, without intent to reinvest himself with the title, will not disturb it. Tucker v. Tucker and Jones v. Nicholas (Iowa) supra; Woolley v. Taylor (1914) 45 Utah, 227, 144 Pac. 1094.

In Woolley v. Taylor (Utah) supra, it appeared that a donor indorsed in blank certain stock, placed them in an envelop, indorsed thereon a description of its contents, stating the number and kind of shares of stock, and that they were the property of his daughter, naming her, signed the indorsement, and delivered the envelop containing the stock to his banker, with directions to deliver it to his daughter after his death. He similarly placed other shares of stock in another envelop, with similar indorsements, and delivered it also to the banker, with directions that it be delivered after his death to his son. Because the father directed the banker not to deliver the stock to his daughter until after the father's death; because he, after he had delivered it to the banker, and until his death, collected and used the dividends paid on the stock; because, when changes were made in one of the companies and new certificates were issued for old, he took the stock from the envelops, exchanged it and replaced it with the new,—the claim was made of nondelivery of the stock and want of a sufficient transfer beyond the control and dominion of the father, and hence that there was no consummated gift inter vivos. It was held, however, that the evidence showed that the father, the donor, when he delivered the stock to the banker, made an unconditional delivery and parted with all present and future control and dominion over the property. It was held that the exchange of the stock was made necessary by a change in the company, and that the donor's action was but to protect and safeguard the property, and neither that, nor the fact that after delivery he collected and used the dividends on the stock, was inconsistent with an absolute delivery and parting of title.

2. Evidence held not to show relinquishment.

In each of the following cases, the evidence was held to be insufficient to show an absolute and unconditional delivery of personal property by a donor to a third person, to be delivered to the donee after the former's death, the donor having retained dominion and control over the property given, and hence that there was no valid gift inter vivos:

Taylor v. Harminson (1899) 179 Ill. 137, 53 N. E. 584, affirming (1898) 79 Ill. App. 380. It appeared that the owner of certain notes had them renewed in his name, and then, dividing them into five lots, put them in five separate envelops, and had the names of his children severally written on the envelops, but did not indorse or assign the notes. He then handed them to a third person, telling the latter that he wanted to make the latter their custodian, and "if anything happened to him, and he was planted," he wanted the custodian to deliver them in person, telling the children that the gift was from the donor. It also appeared that when the donor was asked, when he had the notes renewed, why he did not have them made payable to the children, his reply was that he did not wish to do so; that he might live during the life of the notes, and then might want to collect the notes or the interest on them.

Trustees of Permanent Fund v. Hall (1892) 48 Ill. App. 536. It appeared that a donor procured from a missionary convention, a blank form for a note, for the payment of money to it. This he signed, but instead of delivering it to the convention as a binding obligation, he deposited it with one who was to act for him, and retain it during his lifetime. To the same effect see Foreign Christian Missionary Soc. v. Hall (1892) 48 Ill. App. 546.

Smith v. Ferguson (1888) 90 Ind. 229, 46 Am. Rep. 216. It appeared that the owner of certain promissory notes delivered them to the defendant, directing him to take them and do the best he could with them, and to furnish her with what means she needed to live, and, after death, to pay her debts and erect a monument for her, and to give what was left to the defendant's wife.

Augusta Sav. Bank v. Fogg (1890) 82 Me. 588, 20 Atl. 92. The evidence showed that a testator retained possession of his bank book, representing a deposit made in his sister's as well as in his own name, and which it was his intention should become her property, until a few days before he died. He then delivered the key of a trunk containing the book to the executor named in his will, for his sister, "at his decease."

Jones v. Crisp (1908) 109 Md. 30, 71 Atl. 515. It appeared that the following entry was made on a book of deposit of the savings department of the bank at the time the deposit was made: "Frederica Crisp, in case of death payable to Evan Jones." Mrs. Jones, the wife of the person to whom the money was payable on the death of the depositor, testified that

Mrs. Crisp brought the book to her house, and had her sew it in a muslin bag, and that she then gave the book to her husband.

Baker v. Baker (1914) 123 Md. 32, 90 Atl. 776. The evidence did not show whether the money in suit was actually drawn and redeposited, or whether the change in the account was made by writing the names of the children and the respective amounts to be paid to them above the entry of their parents' names, and adding the words, "payable at our death to above children." The evidence did show, however, that the intention of the parents was to reserve for themselves the interest on the deposits during their lives and the life of the survivor, and, at the death of the survivor, that the money should be paid by the bank to the persons named in the deposit books, as therein indicated; and also that the father kept the bank books and collected the interest during his life.

Sherman v. New Bedford Five Cents Sav. Bank (1885) 138 Mass. 581. It appeared that a deposit was entered by the supposed donor to the credit of the donee church, and the pass book was in its name, the following condition being annexed: "Interest to be paid on order of Urial Sherman [donor]. Principal to be drawn by board of managers of said church after decease of Urial Sherman." The depositor retained the pass book, and never informed the donee of the deposit.

Bailey v. New Bedford Inst. for Sav. (1906) 192 Mass. 564, 116 Am. St. Rep. 270, 78 N. E. 648. It appeared that at the time the donor deposited a sum of money in the bank, she made a written statement to the effect that the deposit was to be paid to her if she lived, but in case of her death it was to be payable to a person named.

Re Soulard (1897) 141 Mo. 642, 43 S. W. 617. It appeared that a donor executed an instrument in writing, which provided, in part, as follows: "I hereby give to [the donees named] the following described notes and bonds, or any reinvestment of the principal of the same that may be hereafter made, . . . reserving, however, for my own use during my life, the income or interest from said notes, and restraining them from making any disposition of the principal of said notes during my life, and also reserving the right to reinvest any money from the payment of these notes as to me may seem fit." This instrument, and also the notes and bonds, were delivered to one of the donees, who also acted as agent for the donor under a power of attorney, on the understanding "that he would not have any of the income, or anything of that sort, during" the donor's life. The interest on the notes and bonds was collected by the donor or his agent until his death. Several of the notes matured during the lifetime of the donor, and they were collected and the proceeds thereof reinvested, under the direction of himself or his agent.

Keyl v. Westerhaus (1890) 42 Mo. App. 49. It appeared that the owner of a promissory note left it, indorsed in blank, with the plaintiff, and along therewith a power of attorney, constituting and appointing the plaintiff the attorney of the owner for the collection of the note, and directing him to pay the proceeds of the note, in case of the owner's death, to a named church.

Godard v. Conrad (1907) 125 Mo. App. 165, 101 S. W. 1108. It appeared that the owner of certain property accompanied its delivery into the hands of the plaintiff to hold for the donee with the declaration: "If I pass in my checks, I want her to have the diamond." "I asked him what I should do with his watch and chain, and he replied with some effort, that he wanted Mrs. Searcy [the donee] to have them, too, as she had been so good to him."

Stevenson v. Earl (1904) 65 N. J. Eq. 721, 103 Am. St. Rep. 790, 55 Atl. 1091, 1 Ann. Cas. 49. It appeared that an employee of a company conducting a savings fund for its employees made written application for permission to become a depositor in the fund, and in and by his application agreed to be bound by the rules and regulations under which it was managed, and particularly "that in the event of my death all deposits standing to my credit in said savings fund, and all interest due thereon, shall be paid to my wife." The pass book delivered to him by the company he gave to his wife. Subsequently, he increased the amount of his deposits, and also drew against them, the balance varying at different times from $2,286 to $56, and amounting to $1,578 at the time of his death.

Williams v. Guile (1889) 117 N. Y. 348, 6 L.R.A. 366, 22 N. E. 1071. It appeared that about six weeks before his death, a donor executed an instrument in the form of a bill of sale to his niece, of a policy of life insurance. In the instrument was a clause empowering him to revoke the transfer at any time during his life. This instrument and the policy the donor delivered to his attorney, telling him to deliver it to the niece if anything happened to him.

Re Rose (1901) 35 Misc. 21, 71 N. Y. Supp. 172, affirmed in (1902) 75 App. Div. 615, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1139, which is affirmed in (1903) 176 N. Y. 587, 68 N. E. 1124. It appeared that some nine months before his death, the testator deposited a sum of money in a bank in his name, "in the event of death payable to" his brother, and signed an order on the bank which stated, "In the event of my death, please pay deposits" to the brother, and gave the book to him. The testator stated at the bank that he did not want the money put in a joint account.

Walsh's Appeal (1888) 122 Pa. 177, 1 L.R.A. 535, 9 Am. St. Rep. 83, 15 Atl. 470. It appeared that the day before her death the donor handed to a third person her deposit book, saying: "The money there is for my sister in Ireland, but if I don't die I want it back."

c. Status of third person.

1. Agent of donor.

Where personal property is delivered to a third person to be delivered to the donee after the donor's death, the ultimate question, whether the third person occupies the position of an agent of the donor or a trustee for the donee, is one of fact to be determined from the intentions of the donor, the situation and relation of the parties, the kind and character of the property, and the things said, written, and done in regard thereto,—all as disclosed by the evidence. Grant Trust & Sav. Co. v. Tucker (1911) 49 Ind. App. 845, 96 N. E. 487.

So, where the evidence shows that the third person is only an agent of the donor, with directions to complete an unexecuted gift on the death of the donor, the death of the latter operates as a revocation of the agency, and the gift is defeated. Wright v. Bragg (1901) 45 C. C. A. 204, 106 Fed. 25; Duryea v. Harvey (1903) 183 Mass. 429, 67 N. E. 351; Taylor v. Harmison (1899) 179 Ill. 137, 53 N. E. 584, affirming (1898) 79 Ill. App. 380; Keyl v. Westerhaus (1890) 42 Mo. App. 49.

In Wright v. Bragg (Fed.) supra, it appeared that the most that the evidence showed was that a note, mortgage, and assignment of them were deposited with the donor's agent, to be by him delivered to the donee in case of the donor's death; and this, it was held, was not a good and complete delivery, in law, to pass title, there having been no delivery to the donee, or anyone representing him or in his confidence. The court held that the agent was the donor's agent, and the assignment, with the note and mortgage, was still under her custody, her agent's custody being her custody. Therefore, the court held that there was no more a delivery to the donee, with the essentials of a valid gift inter vivos, of an immediate transfer of the title, and the relinquishment of all present right to, or control over, the thing given by the donee, than as though she had kept the papers in her own personal possession.

In Duryea v. Harvey (1903) 183 Mass. 429, 67 N. E. 351, it appeared that a donor, fearing that his physician would advise him that a surgical operation would be necessary to prevent a fatal result from a disease, from the effects of which he believed himself to be suffering, and thinking that he might commit suicide rather than submit to such an operation, put in an envelop an order on another for the payment of a certain sum per month to the donee, with a request to the drawee to pay the same. He placed the envelop in the hands of a third person, with an indorsement on the outside that it was to be opened by the third person or the donee, only by his direction or on his death. It was held that the third person held the papers during the life of the donor as his depositary, subject to his orders, and not for the donee, it being plainly the donor's intention to keep to himself during his lifetime the power to make a delivery of them. Hence, there having been no delivery to the donee, or to anybody for her, it was held that there was no valid gift inter vivos.

In Taylor v. Harmison (1899) 179 Ill. 137, 53 N. E. 584, affirming (1898) 79 Ill. App. 380, it appeared that the owner of certain notes had them renewed in his name, and then, dividing them into five lots, put them in five separate envelopes, and had the names of his children severally written on the envelopes. He then handed them to a third person, telling the latter that he wanted to make the latter their custodian, and "if anything happened to him, and he was planted," he wanted the custodian to deliver them in person, telling the children that the gift was from the donor. It also appeared that when the donor was asked, when he had the notes renewed, why he did not have them made payable to the children, his reply was that he did not wish to do so; that he might live during the life of the notes, and then might want to collect the notes or the interest on them. The court held that, if the notes were given to the third person as agent or trustee for the children, and he was accountable only to them, the delivery would have been valid, the donor having thereby parted with all control over them, reserving no right to reclaim or repossess himself of them; but that if he was only the agent of the donor, authorized to hold the notes as custodian, and to deliver them after the donor's death, there was no gift of the property. The court held that the evidence justified the conclusion that the third person held the notes as the agent of the donor, with directions to distribute them after his death, for the purpose of obviating an administration of his estate, the view that the donor did not part with the title and all interest in the notes being strengthened by the important fact that he did not indorse or assign them.

In Keyl v. Westerhaus (1890) 42 Mo. App. 49, it appeared that the owner of a promissory note left it, indorsed in blank, with the plaintiff, and along therewith a power of attorney, constituting and appointing the plaintiff the attorney of the owner for the collection of the note, and directing him to pay the proceeds of the note, in case of the owner's death, to a named church. The court held that, construing the blank indorsement of the note and the power of attorney together, as one transaction, the sum and substance was that the owner left the note with the plaintiff for collection, "constituted and appointed" the plaintiff his agent to collect it, and if he, the owner, was then dead, the agent was authorized to pay over the proceeds of the note to the church named; but if, when the money was collected, the owner of the note should not be dead, then the agent was clearly bound to pay it to him. The court held that the plaintiff's relation to the owner, in the matter of this note, was simply that of agent to principal,—nothing more. Hence, the court held, in denying that there was a valid gift inter vivos, that the death of the principal had the effect of dissolving this relationship, and especially in this case, where the agent was to act in the name of his principal.

2. Trustee for donee.

Where the evidence shows that the third person, to whom personal property has been delivered to be given to the donee after the donor's death, is a trustee holding the property for the benefit of the donee, the control and title to which have been surrendered by the donor, subject only to conditions not inconsistent with the passing of an absolute and present interest, the gift is complete, and the death of the donor does not revoke it. Grant Trust & Sav. Co. v. Tucker (1911) 49 Ind. App. 345, 96 N. E. 487; Re Fenton (1917) — Iowa, —, 165 N. W. 463; Jarrell v. Crow (1902) 30 Tex. Civ. App. 629, 71 S. W. 397; Giddings v. Giddings (1878) 51 Vt. 227, 31 Am. Rep. 682.

In Grant Trust & Sav. Co. v. Tucker (Ind.) supra, it appeared from the special finding of facts that the donor, the owner of certain bonds, inclosed them in an envelop and left them with a bank for safe-keeping, indorsing on the envelop the following: "April 7, 1899. In case of my death deliver to Cora Breed. H. S. Mark,"—and delivered the package to the bank, and it was placed in its vault. Thereafter the donor procured additional government bonds, and in each instance he directed George Webster, Jr., who was cashier of the bank, to place the bonds in the envelop with the bonds already placed therein, to which he referred as "Cora's other bonds." Webster on such occasions asked him if he desired to continue his previous instructions, to which he replied, in substance, that he did, and on each occasion, at his direction, the cashier indorsed on said envelop the following: "May 5, 1905. Renewed this instruction. G. W., Jr." "May 9, 1906. This instruction continued. G. W., Jr." "February 14, 1908. This instruction continued. G. W., Jr." All bonds placed in the envelop on April 7, 1899, and those subsequently placed therein, remained continuously in the vault of the Marion Bank and its successor, Marion State Bank, until after the death of the donor, with the exception that on one occasion, at the donor's request, the cashier forwarded to Washington a portion of the registered bonds, to have an error in the use of the name "Marks," instead of "Mark," corrected. After such correction had been made the bonds were returned directly to the bank, and again placed in the envelop so indorsed as aforesaid. The vault in which the package containing the bonds was kept was at all times under the exclusive control of the officers of the bank, and was used by them for the safe-keeping of the funds and valuable papers of the bank, and also the papers of its customers, the donor never having known the combination to the safe, nor having had any means of access to the vault. Webster acted as cashier of the banks during all the time the bonds were so held by them, and, at the request of the donor, when each quarterly instalment of interest fell due on the bonds, he detached the interest coupons, and they were, by the donor, deposited to his own credit in the bank; and on one occasion he caused the cashier to place in the envelop a sum of money, and subsequently called for and received it. After April 7, 1899, on divers occasions and to numerous persons, including the husband of the plaintiff, and to other close friends and business acquaintances of his, the donor, in substance, stated that he had given the bonds in question to "Cora" (meaning the plaintiff); and on different occasions, while the bonds were in the keeping of the bank, stated to the husband of the plaintiff, that he had deposited the bonds with the bank for "Cora," but that he had reserved the interest during his lifetime. When requested by the donee's husband to use the bonds in purchasing real estate, he replied that the bonds did not belong to him, and that if he should make an arrangement to exchange them for the real estate he could not put the real estate under the same conditions that the bonds were without making an absolute deed; that he had given the bonds to the plaintiff, but had placed them in the bank so they would be easily accessible for the clipping of the coupons, from which he derived enough money to live on. He did not at any time after April 7, 1899, assert ownership of the bonds, or seek to regain possession or control of them. The court held that if the property remained under the control of the donor, though in the keeping of the bank, and the bank was subject to his further direction as to its final disposition, then its relation was that of an agent. If, however, the bonds were delivered to the bank by the donor with the intention that the present title and ownership should pass to the donee, subject only to the donor's right to the accruing interest thereon during his lifetime, and this intention was carried into effect by the language employed and the things done in relation thereto, then the gift was executed, and the bank became and was a trustee for the donee. The ultimate question whether the bank occupied the position of agent or trustee, the court held, being one of fact to be determined from the intentions of the donor, the writing on the envelop containing the bonds, the situation and relation of the parties, the kind and character of the property, and the things said and done in regard thereto,—all as disclosed by the evidence,—the court sustained the conclusion of the lower court that the bank held the bonds as trustee for the donee. The court also stated that the fact that the bonds were under the control of the donor, to the extent of enabling him to obtain the interest coupons as they matured, was not inconsistent with the idea that the bank held the bonds as trustee for the donee; but only tended to show that the bank was also trustee for the donor for the purpose of securing to him the interest during his lifetime. If he desired to retain the interest during his lifetime, and give to the donee the principal of the bonds, with interest thereon, after his death, the bank could, the court held, consistently act as trustee for both donor and donee for the accomplishment of the ends in view.

In Giddings v. Giddings (1878) 51 Vt. 227, 31 Am. Rep. 682, a referee found that a donor executed three promissory notes in writing, payable one to each of a brother's three sons, respectively, one year after the maker's death. He intended, as the referee found, to leave these notes in the hands of some third person, subject to his own control, to be delivered after his death, if he should not retake them or otherwise direct. He informed his brother and the payees of his intention, and they all assented to the arrangement. After that, he put the notes into a letter envelop and sealed it up, and wrote on it this address: "Henry F. Giddings, of Ellisburg, Jefferson County, N. Y., and others, in care of Barnes Frisbie, Esq., of Poultney,"—and delivered it to Barnes Frisbie of Poultney, at Poultney, with directions about the custody of it, which Frisbie, as the referee found, indorsed correctly, in substance, on a wrapper that he put around it, in these words: "Letter left in my care by Benj. Giddings, to be handed to Mr. Giddings if he calls for it; otherwise not to be opened in his lifetime." The donor did not retake the package; and after his death, Frisbie opened it, and delivered the notes, respectively, to the payees named in them. It was held that the acts of the maker constituted Frisbie a trustee for the donees and that the gift was good.

In the case of Re Fenton (1917) — Iowa, —, 165 N. W. 463, it appeared that the plaintiff's intestate was taken to a hospital in a condition regarded as very grave. At the time of her removal to the hospital, her pass books and certificates in savings and loan associations, entitling her to dividends on the earnings of the companies, were all contained in her "purse." The deposits represented by the pass books were joint accounts, payable to the survivor on the death of either, and the certificates were assigned on their backs. When taken to the hospital, the plaintiff's intestate turned over to a third person her purse and its contents, but, on the third person's hesitating, a written instrument providing for the disposition of the property, and purporting to be a bill of sale thereof, was drawn up, naming another person as trustee. The court held that in delivering the papers to the third person the donor intended that this should be a delivery for the benefit of the donees.

In Jarrell v. Crow (1902) 30 Tex. Civ. App. 629, 71 S. W. 397, the evidence showed that a wife turned certain notes and accounts over to her husband, with instructions to convert them into money and to divide it between the donees named, part of which he performed before her death, part after, and part was yet to be performed at the date of trial. It was objected that there was no valid gift as to the part of the property thus given, which did not go into the possession of the donees until after the death of the donor; as to hold it effective would be to allow the husband to execute a verbal and unprobated will. The court held, however, that the delivery of the property to the husband, the donor parting entirely with possession and control, rendered the gift effective, and that the evidence showed that the husband accepted the task, became trustee for the donees, and proceeded with its execution.

II. Gift causa mortis.

a. General principles.

The concurrence of three things is essential to the consummation of a gift causa mortis: (1) The thing given must have been of the personal goods of the donor; (2) it must have been given while the latter was in peril of death, or while he was under the apprehension of impending dissolution from an existing malady; and, (3) the possession of the thing given must have been actually, or constructively, delivered to the donee, or to someone for his use, with the intention that the title should then vest conditionally on the death of the donor, leaving sufficient assets in addition to pay his debts. Devol v. Dye (1890) 123 Ind. 321, 7 L.R.A. 439, 24 N. E. 246, and see the cases cited throughout this subdivision.

A mere unexecuted purpose, however clearly or forcibly expressed, so long as it rests merely in intention, is not effectual. The intention must not only have been manifested, but in addition, in order to consummate the gift, the donor must have transferred the possession of the thing to the donee in person, or to someone for his use, under such circumstances that the person to whom delivery is made is thenceforth affected with a trust or duty in the donee's behalf. Devol v. Dye (Ind.) supra.

So, if the gift is not to take effect as an executed and completed transfer to the donee of possession and title, either legal or equitable, during the life of the donor, but the property is intrusted, merely, with other persons, to be disposed of at his death, as he may direct or shall have directed, it becomes a testamentary disposition, dependent for its validity on being made, executed, and proved as a will. If, however, the donor, being in ill health, and apprehensive of death, in view of such condition and apprehension, delivers the property to a third person absolutely, thereby relinquishing all right to the possession and dominion over it, for the use of the donee, under such circumstances as to indicate a present intention of transferring the title to the latter, the gift will be upheld as a valid one causa mortis. Deneff v. Helms (1902) 42 Or. 161, 70 Pac. 390. And see the cases cited throughout this subdivision.

The chief distinction between gifts inter vivos and those causa mortis is that, while the former are consummated by delivery, the title to the property is irrevocably vested, while in the latter the title is ambulatory and inchoate until the death of the donor occurs. Devol v. Dye (Ind.) supra. And see the cases cited throughout this subdivision.

But notwithstanding this, when the nature of the gift admits of it, a complete manual transfer of the possession of the subject should take place, and the transaction should be accompanied by words, signs, or a writing, adequately expressive of the donor's intention. And while the rule requiring delivery, either actual or constructive, in cases of gifts causa mortis, must be maintained, its application is to be mitigated and applied according to the situation of the subject of the gift, and the condition of the donor; for the intention of a donor in peril of death, when clearly ascertained and fairly consummated, within the meaning of well-established rules, is not to be thwarted by a narrow and illiberal construction of what may have been intended for and deemed by him a sufficient delivery. Ibid.

It is not necessary that the donee should have constituted the third person his bailee, or trustee, nor that he should have known of the intended gift, or of the delivery, in order to make it an effectual delivery to the third person as the trustee of the donee. Ibid. For, if the person to whom delivery is made is not to act thereafter as the agent of the donor, he is regarded as the trustee for the donee, and his acts in holding the property for the donee are deemed to be in the donee's interest. Hogan v. Sullivan (1901) 114 Iowa, 456, 87 N. W. 447; Re Podhajsky (1908) 137 Iowa, 742, 115 N. W. 590.

The matter of acceptance by the donee is of slight importance. Where the gift is beneficial, and imposes no burdens on the donee, acceptance will be presumed as a matter of law. Devol v. Dye (Ind.) supra; Hogan v. Sullivan and Re Podhajsky (Iowa) supra; Varley v. Sims (1907) 100 Minn. 331, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 828, 117 Am. St. Rep. 694, 111 N. W. 269, 10 Ann. Cas. 473.

In Walker v. Foster (1900) 30 Can. S. C. 299, however, the court said: "It is inaccurate to say that the delivery must be to an agent or trustee for the donee. No one can be an agent or trustee for another without that person's assent. Then the cases show that the delivery to the third person is sufficient without the assent or even the knowledge of the donee, provided it is for the use of the donee. Indeed, the very sense and object of a delivery to a third person is, in some cases, because the donee is not at hand to give the assent. Therefore the assent of the donee, or even his knowledge of a delivery to a third person for his behoof, is not an essential requisite, provided the donor parts with both the possession and dominion over the subject of the gift in order that the depositary may hold it for the use of the donee."

b. Relinquishment by donor of title and control of property.

1. Evidence held to show relinquishment.

In order to constitute a valid donatio causa mortis of personal property to a third person for delivery to the donee after the donor's death, there must be an actual or symbolical tradition or delivery of the property to the third person for the donee, and a relinquishment of all control or dominion of the property by the donor, never revoked by him during his lifetime, sufficient to transfer the present, though inchoate, title to the property to the donee.

Thus, in each of the following cases, the evidence was held to be sufficient to show an actual or a symbolical delivery by the donor, of personal property, to a third person, to be delivered to the donee after the donor's death, and a relinquishment by the latter of all control or dominion over the thing given, and hence that there was a valid gift causa mortis:

Sorrells v. Collins (1900) 110 Ga. 518, 36 S. E. 74. It appeared that some time before she died the donor came to the petitioner and stated that she had a package which she wanted the petitioner to deliver to her (the donor's) mother, in case of her death, and delivered the package to the petitioner for that purpose, not stating its contents. Subsequently, during her last illness, she frequently spoke to the petitioner about the package, and enjoined the latter, in case of her death, to deliver the package to her mother.

Woodburn v. Woodburn (1887) 123 Ill. 608, 14 N. E. 58, 16 N. E. 209. It appeared that a testator handed a note to the executor of his will, directing the latter to deliver it to the testator's son in case he did not contest the will, and, if he did, then to collect it for the benefit of the widow. It appeared that the executor took the note and handed it over to the widow to care for, she putting it back in the pocket-book from whence it had been taken, among the papers of the testator.

Seavey v. Seavey (1888) 30 Ill. App. 625. It appeared that a father indorsed certain notes and delivered them to his son, who in effect retained possession thereof until the donor's death, for the benefit of the donor's daughters. The donor reserved the right to have the interest accruing on the notes, or so much as he should need for support during his natural life, and at his death the notes were to be delivered to and divided between the beneficiaries.

Hogan v. Sullivan (1901) 114 Iowa, 456, 87 N. W. 447. It appeared that the donor, about two years before his death, took the defendant to a bank and deposited a sum of money, having the certificate made payable to the defendant, and stating that the doctors had told him that there was danger of his death, and that he wanted the defendant to be able to draw the money out. About two weeks before his death, the donor gave directions to the defendant with regard to the disposal of the money which he had previously deposited to the defendant's credit, causing the latter to make a brief memorandum of the beneficiaries and the amounts to be paid to them, and which was read over but not signed by him.

Sessions v. Moseley (1849) 4 Cush. (Mass.) 87. The evidence showed that the donor, being sick and apprehensive of death, gave into the hands of a third person the note in suit, with directions to give it, after his death, to the donee for his own, and that she kept the note until after the death of the donor and then gave it to the donee, who accepted it.

Clough v. Clough (1875) 117 Mass. 83. The evidence offered in support of a claim of a donatio causa mortis was to the effect that the defendant's deceased brother, during his last sickness, gave and delivered to him in trust for his minor son, $400, with instructions to invest and hold the same until the son became of age, and then to pay it over to him, and to pay it to other persons if the son died before reaching the age of twenty-one years. The defendant accepted the trust and took the money and deposited it in a savings bank, in his own name, as trustee for the minor son of his deceased brother, where it remained.

Pierce v. Boston Five Cents Sav. Bank (1889) 129 Mass. 425, 37 Am. Rep. 371. It appeared that a person who was about to go to the hospital to have an operation performed, from which she feared she would not recover, gave the plaintiff a package sealed with wax, having informed the plaintiff that it contained money and savings-bank books, and also directions as to what was to be done with them. On her death, the plaintiff opened the package, finding therein a sum of money and certain bank books, and a sealed envelop superscribed: "In case of death, the inclosed requests are to be carried out." This envelop contained a written request that the donor be buried in a certain place, and that whatever was left, after paying all bills and expenses, be divided among the persons named.

Bostwick v. Mahaffy (1882) 48 Mich. 342, 12 N. W. 192. It appeared that a father left money in charge of a third person with whom he boarded, with directions to deliver it to his daughter in case of his death.

Shackleford v. Brown (1886) 89 Mo. 546, 1 S. W. 390. The testimony relied on to prove a gift causa mortis was as follows: "She [the donor] was reading the Bible, but put it up, and went and got her basket; she came and sat down by me and said: 'I have something to tell you; now pay attention to what I am saying;' on taking a paper from her basket she said: 'This is my will; if anything happens to me I want you to take charge of it;' and she said: 'Here are two articles;' taking a notebook in her hand, she said: 'This is for Samuel;' she then took up a pocketbook and said: 'This is for William, and I want you to see that they get them; take them all to Clark Brown, and deposit them with him for safe-keeping; these articles and my will make all my children equal.' On Saturday morning, the day of Mrs. Wetherholt's death, I again visited her, and Mrs. Wetherholt said to me: 'I sent for you; I am going to die; do you remember what I told you about my papers?' I replied, I did. She then said: 'Take possession of and leave them with Clark Brown for safe-keeping, and do with them as I have told you.' She did not take them in her hand, but pointed to the basket and told me to 'take them;' and in her presence I took them and put them in my valise and locked it up, and took it to another room."

Emery v. Clough (1885) 63 N. H. 552, 56 Am. Rep. 543, 4 Atl. 796. It appeared that a donor, while very sick, delivered to the defendant a sum of money, as gifts to several persons, to be by her distributed to the parties designated by him, after his death.

Grymes v. Hone (1872) 49 N. Y. 17, 10 Am. Rep. 318. It appeared that the donor, being the owner of 120 shares of bank stock, included in one certificate, made an absolute assignment in writing of twenty shares thereof, to his favorite granddaughter, and appointed her his attorney irrevocable to sell and transfer it to her own use. He afterwards handed the paper to his wife to put with the will and other papers, in a tin box she had. When he gave it to his wife, he said: "I intend this for Nelly. If I die, don't give this to the executors; it isn't for them, but for Nelly; give it to her, herself." She asked: "Why not give it to her now?" "Well," he said, "better keep it for the present; I don't know how much longer I may last, or what may happen, or whether we may not need it." At the time of the execution of this instrument, the donor was about eighty years of age, and in failing health, and so continued until his death some five months later.

Williams v. Guile (1889) 117 N. Y. 343, 6 L.R.A. 866, 22 N. E. 1071. It appeared that about six weeks before his death, a donor, who had suffered two paralytic strokes, executed an instrument in the form of a bill of sale to his niece, of a policy of life insurance. In the instrument was a clause empowering him to revoke the transfer at any time during his life. This instrument and the policy the donor delivered to his attorney, telling him to deliver it to the niece if anything happened to him. After his death, the attorney delivered the papers.

Callanan v. Clement (1896) 18 Misc.

621, 42 N. Y. Supp. 514, affirmed in (1898) 82 App. Div. 631, 53 N. Y. Supp. 1101, which was affirmed in (1900) 162 N. Y. 618, 57 N. E. 1105. It appeared that the donor, having made a will under which nothing was to pass to the donee, stated a number of times that she had given the latter her bank book. A few days after receiving the injury which caused her death, the donor called for her bank book, and gave it to an old friend to take care of, stating that it was the donee's property. Subsequently, however, she sent for the friend and requested her to bring the bank book, and then, in the presence of two other witnesses, stated that she wanted them as witnesses, to show that the bank book belonged to the donee, and that she gave it to her. She then handed it to the donee, and told the donee to let her (the donor's) friend take it back with her until the donee called for it. There was no dispute in the evidence as to whether the book was actually delivered to the friend.

Gass v. Simpson (1867) 4 Coldw. (Tenn.) 288. It appeared that the donor was compelled to leave his home in consequence of the rebel conscription, and was resolved to join the Union Army. In view of the dangers to which he would be exposed, both in such service and in attempting to join it, he made a gift of the money, notes, etc., in controversy, to his nephew, to take effect on condition that he never returned; and delivered them to his sister, the nephew's mother, to be delivered to the donee on the happening of his death.

Johnson v. Colley (1903) 101 Va. 414, 99 Am. St. Rep. 884, 41 S. E. 721. It appeared that a donor, the day before his death, handed a friend and neighbor a bundle of money, with the injunction that if he died, or anything happened to him, the friend was to give it to the donee.

Walker v. Foster (1900) 30 Can. S. C. 299. It appeared that a donor placed certain promissory notes in envelopes addressed to each of his five children, and kept them and their contents in a desk at his bedside for some years, locked up and under his control.

Shortly before his death, when he believed that he would die, the donor had the envelopes, in which the notes were, taken from the desk and handed to a third person, who was directed by him to seal up the envelopes and replace them in the desk and lock it. Then he delivered the keys to the third person to retain until after his death, when he instructed him to deliver to each of his children one of the envelopes so addressed. After his death, the third person delivered the envelopes to the respective donees, as directed.

In each of the following cases, the evidence was held to be insufficient to show either an actual or a symbolical delivery of the property to the third person for delivery to the donee after the death of the donor, which divested the donor of the present title to the property and invested it in the donee, or that the donor had relinquished all control and dominion over the property given, and hence that there was no valid gift causa mortis:

Daniel v. Smith (1883) 64 Cal. 346, 30 Pac. 575. A witness testified that a short time before the donor's death the latter requested the witness to take charge of his effects, including his pass book, and to hold them in trust for him until he got well, and, if he should die, then to transfer them to his daughter, all of which the witness did. The witness did not, however, state any manual tradition of the pass book to him, nor that the book was locked in a drawer or trunk, and the keys delivered to him that he might possess himself of the book.

Noble v. Garden (1905) 146 Cal. 225, 79 Pac. 883, 2 Ann. Cas. 1001. It appeared that certificates of stock in a building and loan association, issued to the donor, were assigned by her to certain persons, the donor then giving the certificate to the secretary of the association and requesting him to deliver them to the persons to whom they had been assigned, on her death. This decision was followed in Noble v. Learned (1906) 7 Cal. Unrep. 297, 87 Pac. 402, a similar action with respect to another of the certificates described in the previous case. Knight v. Tripp (1897) 5 Cal. Unrep. 785, 49 Pac. 838; Knight v. Tripp (1898) 121 Cal. 674, 54 Pac. 267. It appeared that the donor, who was about to undergo a surgical operation, transferred all her property to the defendant, the real estate being conveyed by a deed and the furniture by a bill of sale. On the same day, she assigned her bank books to him, and on the next day indorsed to him certain promissory notes and assigned to him certain certificates of stock. At the same time, it appeared that the defendant made a written memorandum, not signed by the donor, wherein the disposition of her property to the persons named was limited to the event of her death, the defendant to have the balance remaining after the instructions were carried out, she evidently expecting to remain in the house and to have the use of the furniture so long as she lived. The promissory notes and the certificates of stock were kept by the donor in a locked tin box and placed in a secretary, which was also kept locked, in her room, the key of which she gave to the defendant, without any words of gift.

Barnum v. Reed (1891) 186 Ill. 388, 26 N. E. 572, reversing (1890) 86 Ill. App. 525. It appeared that a testatrix sent certain notes and certificates of deposit to a third person, who had acted as her agent, a week before her death, with a letter directing him to take enough of the interest money arising from the notes, which, added to the cash sent in the letter, and the amounts of the certificates of deposit, would be sufficient, and to purchase a new certificate of deposit for a stated amount in lieu of the certificates sent him, and, if the testatrix was then dead, to draw the certificate in her sister's name, "and send the interest and the notes, and the interest on them, to her so long as they continue, and, when they are paid, put them in the bank, and send the interest to her."

recting him to take them and do the best he could with them, and to furnish her with what means she needed to live, and, after her death, to pay her debts and erect a monument for her, and to give what was left to the defendant's wife.

Bowers v. Hurd (1813) 10 Mass. 427. It appeared that a donor, feeling himself under obligation to another, and desiring to avoid the expense of making and proving a will, made a promissory note payable to that person, and left the note in the keeping of a third person, to be delivered, after his decease, to the person to whom it was payable.

McCord v. McCord (1882) 77 Mo. 166, 46 Am. Rep. 9. It appeared that a father, in his last illness, delivered to a son a certain sum of money to keep as his own in case of the donor's death, and a like sum for each of his children, to be delivered to them, respectively, in the event of his death. After the father's death the son made the distribution as directed.

Dunn v. German-American Bank (1891) 109 Mo. 90, 18 S. W. 1189. The evidence all tended to show that the certificate of deposit in litigation was only delivered by the owner to his brother for safe-keeping, and to be held by him as the agent of the owner, until he got well or died, accompanied by a request that if the owner died the brother should see that the owner's children got the money.

Bieber v. Boeckmann (1897) 70 Mo. App. 503. The trial court found that the donor in her last illness, and in the belief that she would not recover from that sickness, gave the money in question to the defendant and told him to put it in his safe, and if she died to divide it in certain parts among certain relatives of hers, but that if she did not die, to return it.

Godard v. Conrad (1907) 125 Mo. App. 165, 101 S. W. 1108. It appeared that the owner of certain property accompanied its delivery into the hands of the plaintiff to hold for the donee, with the declaration: "If I pass in my checks, I want her to have the diamond." "I asked him what I should do with his watch and chain, and he replied, with some effort, that he wanted Mrs. Searcey [the donee] to have them, too, as she had been so good to him."

Partridge v. Kearns (1898) 32 App. Div. 483, 53 N. Y. Supp. 154. It appeared that a third person was holding a certain promissory note for safekeeping, subject to the order of the owner. Two days prior to the death of the owner, the holder was directed to give the note to the named person after the owner's death.

Hillman v. Young (1913) 64 Or. 73, 127 Pac. 793, 129 Pac. 124. It was alleged that the donor, being desirous that the donee should receive any portion of his estate which should remain after his death, duly assigned and transferred to a third person, as trustee, the promissory notes mentioned, and also duly assigned and transferred, in writing, a mortgage securing them to the third person. It was alleged that the donor instructed the third person to collect the proceeds thereof so far as the same should belong to the donor, and pay them over to the donee as they should be needed, and at the death of the donor, if any portion thereof remained in the hands of the trustee, he should deliver the same to the donee, except such sum as should be necessary to pay him a reasonable compensation for his services as trustee.

Walsh's Estate (1888) 122 Pa. 177, 1 L.R.A. 535, 9 Am. St. Rep. 83, 15 Atl. 470. It appeared that the day before her death the donor handed her deposit book to a third person, saying: "The money there is for my sister in Ireland, but if I don't die I want it back."

Hemphill's Estate (1897) 180 Pa. 87, 36 Atl. 406. The trial judge held that, assuming that the donor's wish that the claimant would take certain boxes, accompanied by the directions to the servant to hand them, after her death, to the claimant, together constituted a completed gift causa mortis, and assuming, further, that the gift of the boxes was meant to carry with it their contents, as to the boxes, the donor had manifested no more than an intention to give them to the claimant, and that her direction to the servant to hand them over after her death did not constitute a delivery, because the articles, being delivered while she was unconscious, did not, with her knowledge, leave her possession, nor did she at any time relinquish knowingly her dominion over them. The opinion was affirmed by the appellate court.

O'Gorman v. Jolley (1914) 34 S. D. 26, 147 N. W. 78. It appeared that a donor, while in poor health, caused a certain sum of money to be deposited in a bank, receiving therefor a certificate of deposit reciting that it was "payable as per instruction on back of this certificate." On the back of the certificate was pasted an instrument in the following words: "This certificate and the interest thereon is my property during the remainder of my life. In the event of my death, I hereby authorize and instruct the First National Bank of Vermillion, S. D., to pay and distribute the amount of said certificate of deposit as follows." Then followed the names of fifteen persons to whom payments were to be made, in various amounts set opposite their names respectively, aggregating the sum of $4,000. . . . "I direct that the certificate be handed to Father Flood, immediately after my death, and the above conditions be fulfilled."

Sheegog v. Perkins (1874) 4 Baxt. (Tenn.) 273. It appeared that a donor deposited a tin lock box of gold coin in the bank, with instructions to keep it on special deposit, and to deliver it to no one but his wife, he contemplating a journey, though his state of health was feeble. He delivered the key of the tin box to his wife.

c. Status of third person.

1. Agent of donor.

It has been held that if delivery is made to a third person, with instructions to deliver to the intended donee at the death of the donor, the latter retaining dominion over it meanwhile, the delivery is ineffectual, because the third person in such a case becomes merely the agent or bailee of the donor, and his agency is revoked by the death of the principal or donor. Such a transaction is regarded as an attempted testamentary disposition, unless accompanied by writing executed as a will, and is nugatory for the purpose designed. Knight v. Tripp (1898) 121 Cal. 674, 54 Pac. 267; Barnum v. Reed (1891) 136 Ill. 388, 26 N. E. 572, reversing (1890) 36 Ill. App. 525; Barnes v. People (1887) 25 Ill. App. 136; Duryea v. Harvey (1903) 183 Mass. 429, 67 N. E. 351; Walter v. Ford (1881) 74 Mo. 195, 41 Am. Rep. 312; Bieber v. Boeckmann (1897) 70 Mo. App. 508; Partridge v. Kearns (1898) 32 App. Div. 483, 53 N. Y. Supp. 154; Craig v. Craig (1848) 3 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 79; Hillman v. Young (1913) 64 Or. 73, 127 Pac. 793, 129 Pac. 124. Compare Callanan v. Clement (1896) 18 Misc. 621, 42 N. Y. Supp. 514, affirmed in (1898) 32 App. Div. 631, 83 N. Y. Supp. 1101, which was affirmed in (1900) 162 N. Y. 618, 57 N. E. 1105.

In Duryea v. Harvey (1903) 183 Mass. 429, 67 N. E. 351, it appeared that a donor, fearing that his physician would advise him that a surgical operation would be necessary to prevent a fatal result from a disease, from the effects of which he believed himself to be suffering, and thinking that he might commit suicide rather than submit to such an operation, put in an envelop an order on another for the payment of a certain sum per month to the donee, with a request to the drawee to pay the same. He placed the envelop in the hands of a third person, with an indorsement on the outside that it was to be opened by the third person or the donee, only by his direction or on his death. It was held that the third person held the papers during the life of the donor as his depositary, subject to his orders, and not for the donee, it being plainly the donor's intention to keep to himself during his lifetime the power to make a delivery of them. Hence, there having been no delivery to the donee, or to anybody for her, it was held that there was no valid gift causa mortis.

In Barnes v. People (1887) 25 Ill. App. 136, it appeared that the day after the donee had started to go to another state, the donor called a daughter of the donee, and directed her to get a package in her trunk, and, when it was brought to her, handed it to the girl after looking at it, saying: "Now, Myrtle, take this package and take care of it, and if I die before your father comes back, give it to him." It also appeared that she told the girl that she "should" or "could" put the package back in a small paper box in the trunk from which it was taken. The package was put in this box by the young girl, and the same day, by directions of her mother, wife of the donee, Myrtle took the package out of the donor's trunk and placed it in her mother's trunk, where it remained until a few days after the donor's death, when the daughter gave it to her father. The package consisted of two promissory notes. By the expression quoted, the court held, the delivery by the daughter to her father was to be made only on the condition of the donor's death occurring before the donee returned to his home. Had he returned before her death, the court held, the daughter clearly would have had no authority to deliver the package to him, and it was equally clear from the same language, the court held, that the donor intended to reserve to herself the control and possession of it in case the donee should return during her lifetime, so that she might herself make the gift to him. The court held that the expression was equivalent to saying: "If I die before your father comes back, give it to him; if I am alive when he returns, I will attend to the matter myself." Hence, the court held that the delivery to the daughter was not absolute, but conditional; that she held it as the agent of the donor, and not of the donee; that the death of the donor prior to the donee's return was a condition precedent, which must have happened before the daughter would either hold the package absolutely for her father or be authorized to deliver it to him.

In Barnum v. Reed (1891) 136 Ill. 388, 26 N. E. 572, reversing (1890) 36 Ill. App. 525, it appeared that a testatrix sent certain notes and certificates of deposit to a third person who had acted as her agent, a week before her death, with a letter directing him, with the money derived from the interest, when paid, on the notes and the certificates, to procure a new certificate of deposit for a stated amount, and if the testatrix was then dead, to draw the certificate in her sister's name, "and send the interest and the notes, and interest on them, to her as long as they continue, and, when they are paid, put them in the bank, and send the interest to her." The letter did not profess, by any proper or apt words, to convey the legal or equitable title, either to the agent or the sister. It was held that the facts failed to show that the donor constituted the agent trustee of the property for the benefit of her sister.

In Walter v. Ford (1881) 74 Mo. 195, 41 Am. Rep. 312, it appeared that a donor requested a third person to fill up four checks for a specified sum payable to four persons, and the checks were then signed by the donor and delivered to the third person, with directions to him to deliver them to the persons in whose favor they were drawn, if he, the donor, should die, but, if he recovered, to return the checks to him. The third person held the checks until the death of the donor, and then delivered them to the payees thereof. The court held that there was no valid delivery of the checks, as gifts causa mortis, during the lifetime of the donor. The donor's injunctions to the third person having been that the checks were not to be delivered unless he died, and were to be held by the third person to be re-delivered to him if he recovered, the court held that the third person was the agent of the donor and bound to obey his instructions, and, so doing, could not have delivered the checks to anyone while the donor lived. Hence, the gift was in the nature of a testamentary disposition.

In Bieber v. Boeckmann (1897) 70 Mo. App. 508, the trial court found that the donor, in her last illness and in the belief that she would not recover from that sickness, gave the money in question to the defendant, and told him to put it in his safe, and if she died to divide it in certain parts among certain relatives of hers; but that if she did not die, to return it. The trial court drew the conclusion from these facts that the defendant held the money as the agent of the donor during her life, with directions to return it to her if she recovered, and, if she died, to divide it as directed. It was held that this finding of the facts was supported by the evidence, and the appellate court affirmed the judgment that there was no good donatio causa mortis.

In Knight v. Tripp (1898) 121 Cal. 674, 54 Pac. 267, it appeared that the donor, who was about to undergo a surgical operation, transferred all her property to the defendant, the real estate being conveyed by deed, and the furniture by bill of sale. No delivery of the furniture was made, but the donor continued to occupy the house and use all that she had any use for, as before. By an unsigned written memorandum made at the same time, it appeared that a disposition of her property to persons named therein was to be made only in event of her death, she evidently expecting to remain in the house and have the use of the furniture and property so long as she might live. She also assigned three bank books to the defendant.

In Partridge v. Kearns (1898) 32 App. Div. 483, 53 N. Y. Supp. 154, it appeared that the promissory note in suit was given into the custody of a third person, for safe-keeping, at a time when the owner of the note contemplated, not her death, but a visit to her relatives. Subsequently, and two days prior to her death, the owner of the note told the third person to give it to the donee after her death. It was held that this direction to deliver was not accompanied by any delivery to the third person, who was, at best, but a mere agent of the donor, and that the transaction was utterly lacking in the essentials of a valid gift causa mortis.

In Craig v. Craig (1848) 3 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 79, it appeared that the note in question, payable to his son, was signed by the testator and placed in the envelop with his will, and delivered to a third person, the testimony also showing that they were to be kept together, and not to be delivered to anyone without the testator's assent, until his death. The court held that it was perfectly evident from the testimony that the testator never intended to place the note beyond his control during his lifetime, any more than his will. Since the court held that if the third person was the mere agent of the maker of the note, to keep it for him with his will, and subject to his control, and not merely as the trustee of the son to hold it for the use of the latter, in case the disease under which the testator was then laboring should terminate fatally, so as to place it beyond the reach of the maker of the note unless he should recover, it wanted one of the essential requisites of a good donatio causa mortis,—an absolute delivery, and contingent change of possession.

In Callanan v. Clement (1896) 18 Misc. 621, 42 N. Y. Supp. 514, affirmed in (1898) 82 App. Div. 681, 53 N. Y. Supp. 1101, which was affirmed in (1900) 162 N. Y. 618, 57 N. E. 1105, it appeared that the donor, having made a will under which nothing was to pass to the donee, stated a number of times that she had given the latter her bank book. A few days after receiving the injury which caused her death, the donor called for her bank book and gave it to an old friend to take care of, stating that it was the donee's property. Subsequently, however, she sent for the friend and requested her to bring the bank book, and then, in the presence of two other witnesses, stated that she wanted them as witnesses to show that the bank book belonged to the donee, and that she gave it to her. She then handed it to the donee, and told the donee to let her (the donor's) friend take it back with her until the donor called for it. There was no dispute in the evidence as to whether the book was actually delivered to the friend, and on this state of facts, it was held that all the essentials of a valid gift causa mortis were present. It was insisted, however, that there had been no delivery of the subject-matter, in other words, that the friend was the agent, not of the donee, but of the donor; and the delivery of the bank book, not having been made by the agent in the lifetime of the principal, could not thereafter be made, for the reason that the death of the principal revoked the agency. The court held, however, that delivery to an agent was sufficient; that the title to the fund did not absolutely vest in the donee until the death of the donor, but when that occurred, it became absolute, and by operation of law was deemed to have vested from the time of the delivery of the bank book to the third person.

In Hillman v. Young (1913) 64 Or. 73, 127 Pac. 793, 129 Pac. 124, it was alleged that the donor, being desirous that the donee should receive any portion of his estate which should remain after his death, duly assigned and transferred to a third person as trustee the promissory notes mentioned, and also duly assigned and transferred a mortgage securing them to the third person. It was alleged that the donor instructed the third person to collect the proceeds thereof so far as the same should belong to the donor, and pay them over to the donee as they should be needed, and at the death of the donor, if any portion thereof remained in the hands of the trustee, he should deliver the same to the donee, except such sum as should be necessary to pay him a reasonable compensation for his services as trustee. In holding that the averment did not support a gift causa mortis, the court declared that it was manifest on the face of the pleading that the third person was to act as the agent, and according to the instructions, of the donor, and not according to the directions, or for the interests, of the donee, except incidentally. The court held that the former agency of the trustee was continued, with directions to manage the property in his possession as before, and expend possibly all of it during the lifetime of the donor, on condition that if anything remained he was to pay it to the donee. The court held that the transaction was simply a perpetuation of the former relationship between the agent and the donor, and of course, as an agency, terminated at the death of the latter.

2. Trustee for donee.

Where one, in view of impending dissolution, clearly and intelligibly manifests an intention to make a present gift of personal property to another, and, in consummation of his intention, makes such a delivery to a third person for the use of the intended donee as he is then capable of making, considering the character and situation of the property, and under such circumstances as indicate that the donor relinquishes all right to the possession or control of the thing given, and intends to vest a present title in the donee, the person to whom delivery is thus made will be presumed, in the absence of countervailing circumstances, to take the property as the trustee of the intended donee, and not merely as the agent of the donor. Devol v. Dye (1890) 123 Ind. 321, 7 L.R.A. 439, 24 N. E. 246; Sessions v. Moseley (1849) 4 Cush. (Mass.) 87; Varley v. Sims (1907) 100 Minn. 331, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 828, 117 Am. St. Rep. 694, 111 N. W. 269, 10 Ann. Cas. 473; Deneff v. Helms (1902) 42 Or. 161, 70 Pac. 390; SHARPE v. SHARPE (reported herewith) ante, 891; Johnson v. Colley (1903) 101 Va. 414, 99 Am. St. Rep. 884, 44 S. E. 721; Walker v. Foster (1900) 30 Can. S. C. 299.

In Deneff v. Helms (1902) 42 Or. 161, 70 Pac. 390, it appeared that a donor, who was dangerously ill, announced to those at his bedside that he gave to a third person all and everything that he had; that the third person should care for him as long as he lived, so that he could have what was necessary; that after his death the third person was to pay all charges, pay himself liberally, and, if anything remained, he was to send it to the donor's sister in a foreign country—all of which the third person assented to, and agreed to comply with. Thereupon the donor inclosed a certain certificate of deposit to the third person, and delivered it to him, and instructed another person to pay over a certain sum of money held by him for the donor, to this third person. It was contended that the transactions were effective merely to constitute the third person agent for the donor to carry out his will respecting the money thus intrusted to him; that was to say, to pay all his lawful debts, and to send the balance, if any remained, to the donor's sister. The court held, however, that the donor had disposed himself of the property absolutely, parting with all control and dominion over it, and died the next day. The court held that it was clearly manifest from what he said that it was his present purpose to part with the title to the money, and bestow it on his sister, after the payment of the specified expenses and charges, to which he directed the third person to attend. These directions, the court held, were without reservation, and their performance depended on no conditions. The sister, the court held, was constituted the real beneficiary, or donee, and the third person a trustee for her, to execute the trust or gift causa mortis reposed in him.

In Johnson v. Colley (1903) 101 Va. 414, 99 Am. St. Rep. 884, 44 S. E. 721, it appeared that a donor, the day before his death, handed a friend and neighbor a bundle of money, with the injunction that if he died, or anything happened to him, the friend was to give it to the donee. This third person took complete physical possession of the money, and removed it to his own house for safe-keeping. The court stated that, the object of the donor's bounty being a child of tender years, he doubtless knew that it was too young to be intrusted with the large sum of money he desired to give her, and for this reason he turned to his friend and adviser, and placed the money in his hands as the surest method of securing it for the use and benefit of the child. There being no countervailing circumstances, the court held that one who thus received property for another must be held to be the trustee of the intended donee, and not the agent, merely, of the donor.

In Walker v. Foster (Can.) supra, it appeared that a donor placed certain promissory notes in envelopes addressed to each of his five children, and kept them and their contents in a desk at his bedside for some years, locked up and under his control. Shortly before his death, when he believed that he would die, the donor had the envelopes in which the notes were, taken from the desk and handed to a third person, who was directed by him to seal up the envelopes and replace them in the desk, and lock it. Then he delivered the keys to the third person to retain until after his death, when he instructed him to deliver to each of his children one of the envelopes so addressed. After his death, the third person delivered the envelopes to the respective donees as directed. In holding that the evidence was sufficient to show a valid donatio causa mortis, the court declared that there was no proof of any agency or trusteeship for the donor, or of anything short of an actual delivery of the notes and a parting with the dominion over and possession of them to the third person for the use of the donees after the donor's death.

In Varley v. Sims (1907) 100 Minn. 331, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 828, 117 Am. St. Rep. 694, 111 N. W. 269, 10 Ann. Cas. 473, it appeared that the plaintiff's mother, being about to undergo a serious surgical operation, drew her check on a bank for the entire amount of her deposit therein, payable absolutely to the plaintiff, and left it with her sister, instructing her to deliver it to the plaintiff, who was not then present, in the event the operation resulted fatally. She also stated to her sister that, if she survived the operation, the check should be returned to her. The operation, however, resulted fatally, and the check was delivered to the plaintiff after his mother's death. The court held that the delivery of the check by the mother to her sister, to be by the latter in turn delivered to the plaintiff on the occurrence of death, was a sufficient delivery, with the other attendant circumstances, to constitute a valid gift causa mortis, and transfer of the title to the fund. The court held that the sister was, in contemplation of law, the agent or trustee of the donee, and the delivery to her was as effectual as though it had been made personally to the donee.

In Sessions v. Moseley (1849) 4 Cush. (Mass.) 87, the evidence showed that the donor, being sick and apprehensive of death, gave into the hands of a third person the note in suit, with directions to give it, after his death, to the donee for his own, and that she kept the note until after the death of the donor, and then gave it to the donee, who accepted it. It was held that the transaction constituted a good donatio causa mortis, there having been an actual delivery to a person for the use of the donee.

In Devol v. Dye (1890) 123 Ind. 321, 7 L.R.A. 439, 24 N. E. 246, it appeared that a donor, some time before his death, intrusted the key of his box and private drawer in the vault of a bank safe to the cashier of the bank, in whose custody they remained from that time until the donor's death. Three days before his death the donor, who was aware of his condition, told the cashier of the bank that it had always been his purpose to give a cousin $5,000, either in cash or in bank stock, and that he had put $2,000 in gold, in a bag, and marked the name of his cousin on it, and left it in the tin box in the vault. He then directed the cashier to go to the bank and count out $3,000 more in gold coin, and put it in a sack, and mark it as the other sack was marked, and that he should also count out $1,000 in currency, and place it in an envelop for another person, and put her name on it. He then directed that, in case of his death, the sacks and the package should be delivered by the cashier to the parties indicated by the writing thereon. The cashier did as directed, and informed the donor that his directions had been carried out, to which he replied approvingly. The sacks containing the gold coin and the package with the currency remained in the box and drawer until after the donor's death, the cashier of the bank retaining the keys. The court held that there had been a valid delivery to the cashier for the use of the donees.

In SHARPE v. SHARPE (reported herewith), ante, 891, it appeared that a donor placed a check in the hands of a relative of the donee, with a direction to deliver it to the donee if he died, but to return to the donor if the latter lived. It was held that there was a sufficient delivery to constitute a valid gift causa mortis, under the presumption of fact that the third person was the agent of the donee, and that, therefore, there was a delivery to her.

In Hogan v. Sullivan (1901) 114 Iowa, 456, 87 N. W. 447, it appeared that the donor, about two years before his death, took the defendant to a bank and deposited a sum of money, having the certificate made payable to the defendant, and stating that the doctors had told him there was danger of his death and that he wanted the defendant to be able to draw the money out. About two weeks before his death, the donor gave directions to the defendant with regard to the disposal of the money which he had previously deposited to the defendant's credit, causing the latter to make a brief memorandum of the beneficiaries and the amounts to be paid to them, which was read over but not signed by the donor. It was held that there was such a delivery as to make a valid gift causa mortis.

v.

MERCED STONE COMPANY, Respt.

California Supreme Court (In Banc) — October 31, 1917.

(176 Cal. 415, 178 Pac. 498.)

Gift — of account — what necessary to effect.

1. That the president of a corporation to whom an account against it is given has the means of transferring it upon the books of the corporation is not sufficient to effect a delivery within the meaning of a statute making invalid a verbal gift, unless the means of obtaining possession or control of the thing given are delivered to the donee.

— thing in possession of donee.

2. That the subject-matter of a gift is in possession of the donee at the time the gift is made is not sufficient to satisfy the requirements of a statute that a verbal gift is not valid, unless the means of obtaining possession and control of the thing are given, nor, if it is capable of delivery, unless there is an actual or symbolical delivery of the thing to the donee.

— of chose in action.

3. To effect a valid gift of a chose in action not capable of manual delivery, the only recognized means of obtaining control is an assignment in writing, or some equivalent thereof.

[See 12 R. C. L. 938 et seq.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Alameda County in favor of defendant, and from an order denying a new trial, in an action brought to recover the balance of an indebtedness alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff's decedent. Reversed.

Shaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of the defendant, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The complaint states a cause of action against the defendant, in favor of the decedent, Thomas Prather, upon an indebtedness alleged to be the sum of $112,965.84. The defendant in its answer denied the existence of any indebtedness from it to said Thomas Prather at the time of his death, and on information and belief alleged that prior to his death said Thomas Prather made a gift of said indebtedness, due from the defendant to Thomas Prather, to one Samuel D. Prather, and that said Samuel then became and ever since has been the owner of said indebtedness.

The court found that during the last sickness of Thomas Prather, to wit, on April 17, 1913, said Thomas Prather made a gift to his brother, Samuel D. Prather, of all of the indebtedness due from the defendant to said Thomas, being the indebtedness sued for by the plaintiff herein. That at that time Samuel was the president, the general manager, and a member of the board of directors of the defendant, said defendant being a corporation, and Thomas Prather knew that Samuel held said offices and by reason thereof had full and exclusive charge and control of defendant's books of account, including power to make or direct the making of entries and transfers in said books, and knew that by reason thereof Samuel D. Prather had the means of obtaining possession and control of the said indebtedness so given to him. The court further stated that by reason of the fact that Thomas Prather had this knowledge at the time he gave the indebtedness to Samuel, he therefore at that time gave to said Samuel the means of obtaining possession and control of the thing given, that is, of the said indebtedness. This last statement is, of course, a mere conclusion from the facts previously stated. The appellant contends that the transaction as stated in the findings did not constitute a valid gift of the indebtedness in question, and that the finding, so far as it states the ultimate fact of such gift, is contrary to the evidence.

It is conceded that at the time of the asserted gift Thomas Prather knew that Samuel D. Prather held the offices above mentioned, and that it was within his official power by reason thereof to make sufficient changes upon the books of account of the defendant to make them show that the said indebtedness had been transferred by Thomas Prather to Samuel D. Prather, and was owing by the defendant to Samuel D. Prather, instead of Thomas Prather. It is admitted that the asserted gift was made during the last sickness of Samuel Prather, two days before his death, which event occurred on April 19, 1913, and was therefore a gift in view of death. Civ. Code, § 1150. It is also admitted that no change was made upon the books of the defendant regarding said indebtedness, up to the time of the trial of this action, and that when the action was begun the account books of the defendant showed it to be indebted to the said Thomas Prather in the sum claimed in the complaint. The only evidence of the gift asserted in the answer is found in the testimony of Samuel D. Prather, and is as follows: "In talking business my brother said to me; 'Now, in reference to the account of Thomas Prather in the Merced Stone Company, I want to give you that account, all that is due me from that account. I don't know just how to do this, but I give it to you.' . . . A little further in the conversation my brother said to me; 'I give you the keys to my office, the combination of my safe and keys to my desk, and with these I give you all accounts, books, papers, letters, documents, furnishings, pictures, everything that belongs to me in that office. It is yours.'"

This, he said, occurred on April 17, 1913.

The case depends upon the meaning and effect of § 1147 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "A verbal gift is not valid, unless the means of obtaining possession and control of the thing are given, nor, if it is capable of delivery, unless there is an actual or symbolical delivery of the thing to the donee."

The contention of the respondent is that this section is complied with in every case of gift of a chose in action, where, at the time the donor makes such gift, he knows that the donee has it within his power to secure the possession and control of the thing given, and that in such a case no delivery or transmission from the donor to the donee of the means of obtaining possession and control of the subject of the gift is necessary. We do not think this is the correct construction of the section quoted. It contemplates that the donor shall do something at the time of making the gift which

Gift—of account
—what necessary to effect.

has the effect of placing in the hands of the donee the means of obtaining the control and possession of the thing given. That the fact that the thing was already in possession of the donee at the time of declaring the gift is not enough is well settled by the authorities. Denigan v. Hibernian Sav. & L. Soc. 127 Cal. 141, 59 Pac. 389; Smith v. Zumbro, 41 W. Va. 623, 24 S. E. 653; Drew v. Hagerty, 81 Me. 231, 3 L.R.A. 230, 10 Am. St. Rep. 255, 17 Atl. 63; Allen v. Allen, 75 Minn. 116, 74 Am. St. Rep. 442, 77 N. W. 567.

—thing in possession of

In order to comply with the section the "means" must be "given." In the connection in which these words occur the effect is that such means must be given by the donor to the donee. This giving of the means is authorized, where the thing given is not capable of delivery, as a substitute for the actual or symbolical delivery of the thing by the donor to the donee required in cases where such thing is capable of delivery. No good reason can be given for supposing that a transmission or delivery by the donor to the donee of the means was not intended to be as essential in the case of intangible property, as the delivery, actual or symbolical, of the thing itself, where it is tangible.

In the case of a chose in action not evidenced by a written instrument, the only means of obtaining control that is recognized by the authorities is an assignment in writing, or some equivalent thereof.

—of chose
in action.

"According to the weight of authority, in order to make a valid gift inter vivos of a chose in action not evidenced by a written instrument, there must be a written assignment, or some equivalent instrument." 20 Cyc. 1202.

"A written assignment of the demand by the donor to the donee is essential to complete the delivery" in the case of gifts causa mortis. 20 Cyc. 1237; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1022.

"If the thing be not capable of actual delivery, there must be some act equivalent to it. The donor must part not only with the possession, but with the dominion of the property. If the thing given be a chose in action, the law requires an assignment, or some equivalent instrument, and the transfer must be actually executed." 2 Kent, Com. *439.

This passage from Kent was quoted and approved in Driscoll v. Driscoll, 143 Cal. 534, 77 Pac. 471, and in Giselman v. Starr, 106 Cal. 657, 40 Pac. 8.

In Cook v. Lum, 55 N. J. L. 373, 26 Atl. 803, the court said that the test of an effectual gift was this: "That the transfer was such that, in conjunction with the donative intention, it completely stripped the donor of his dominion of the thing given, whether that thing was a tangible chattel or a chose in action."

To the same effect was Ewing v. Ewing, 2 Leigh, 344; Shepard v. Shepard, 164 Mich. 183, 129 N. W. 201; McMahon v. Newtown, 67 Conn. 79, 34 Atl. 709, and many other cases. That § 1147 was not intended to change the law respecting the necessity of an assignment, or its equivalent, to make a valid gift of a chose in action, not itself evidenced by a writing, is shown by the fact that in the annotated edition of the Code, edited by the committee that prepared it, there is cited to support the section Hunter v. Hunter, 19 Barb. 631, in which case the above passage from Kent is quoted and approved.

In the present case it is true that Samuel D. Prather was possessed of the physical power and of the official authority, by reason of his relation to the defendant, to make the necessary changes on its books to show that the indebtedness was due to him and not to the decedent. But this power did not emanate from the decedent. Samuel possessed it before the asserted gift as well as after. The decedent did not even authorize him to make such changes, nor suggest that the gift might be effected in that way. It was not shown that such method was in the mind of the donor. The fact that it was a book account, or that a change might be made in the name of the debtor, was not even mentioned in the conversation. The law intends something more than a mere power to make physical entries in the books of the debtor in such a case. The authority to make the change, or cause it to be made, must be vested in the debtor by reason of some act or direction of the creditor. If verbal gifts could be made in such loose manner as this it would open the door to innumerable frauds and perjuries. For this reason the authorities hold that something more than mere physical power is necessary; something more than the previous possession of the property or of the means of obtaining it; something emanating from the donor which operates to give to the donee the means of obtaining such possession and control.

The case is not different in principle from Pullen v. Placer County Bank, 138 Cal. 170, 94 Am. St. Rep. 19, 66 Pac. 740, 71 Pac. 83. In that case a father gave to his son a check for $1,000 upon the bank, with the intention of making to him a gift of that amount of money. After delivering the check to the son the father stated that he wished he would not present it until after his death. The son awaited his death and then presented the check, which the bank refused to pay, on the ground that the death of the father revoked it. The court said: "In the present case the gift was verbal, and the property which the father intended to give to his son was money on deposit in the bank. The check was not itself the property which the father intended to give, but was merely a direction to the defendant to pay $1,000 to the son. It indicated the amount to be given and the place at which the money was to be delivered. The check was not a symbolic delivery of the money, but it was a delivery of the means by which the son could obtain possession of the money. It was, however, subject to revocation by the father at any time before its presentation to the bank, and was in fact revoked by his death. The request of the father that the son would not present the check until after his death did not affect the sufficiency of the gift. If the gift were complete by his delivery of the check, such subsequent request would not destroy its validity, and if not then complete, this request would not have the effect to dispense with its presentation for the purpose of making it complete. By the failure of the son to present the check, there was no delivery of the money during the lifetime of the father, and the gift was therefore not complete."

The mere delivery of an order for the payment of a debt is therefore not sufficient to make a complete gift thereof. In the present case there was not even the delivery of an order, nor any suggestion thereof. All that was done was to declare the present intention to give the indebtedness to Samuel D. Prather. No means whatever were delivered by the donor to the donee by which the latter could obtain payment of the indebtedness. The fact that Samuel D. Prather was the managing officer of the defendant and had power to change its books did not make the gift effectual. The indebtedness was due from the defendant and not from Samuel D. Prather, and it was necessary that the defendant should have some authority from Thomas Prather before it could legally make a change upon the books of the company to show the change in the indebtedness. Thomas Prather gave no such authority to his brother or to any other person.

The conclusion of the court below upon the facts found was not in accordance with the law, and its finding of the ultimate fact that Thomas Prather transferred the debt to Samuel D. Prather by way of a verbal gift is not supported by the evidence. Consequently the judgment and order cannot be upheld.

The judgment and order are reversed and the cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment upon the findings in favor of the plaintiff for the amount prayed for.

ANNOTATION.

Gift of debts of third person not evidenced by commercial instrument.

- I. Introductory, 933.
- II. General rules, 933.
- III. Application of rules:
  - a. Gift inter vivos, 934.
  - b. Gift causa mortis:
    - 1. In general, 936.
    - 2. Indebtedness not evidenced by writing, 938.

I. Introductory.

In the present note, discussing gifts of the indebtedness of third persons, the gift of debts evidenced by commercial instruments is excluded, and this exclusion is deemed to embrace not only promissory notes, checks, bonds, and drafts, but mortgages and insurance policies. Gifts of bank deposits have also been excluded.

II. General rules.

"The general legal principle regulating the subject of gifts of choses in action has long been established. It is to the effect that, with respect to things both tangible and intangible, mere words of donation will not suffice. With regard to the former class—that is, things corporeal—there must be, in addition to the expression of a donative purpose, an actual tradition of the corpus of the gift, whenever, considering the nature of the property and the circumstances of the actors, such a formality is reasonably practicable. In some instances, when the situation is incompatible with the performance of such ceremony, resort may be had to what has been called a symbolical delivery of the subject. Touching things in action, as there can be no actual delivery of them, the legal requirement is that the donor's voucher of right or title must be surrendered to the donee. Such surrender is deemed equivalent to an actual handing over of things corporeal. To this extent the law of the subject is neither doubtful nor obscure. The difficulty supervenes as soon as the attempt is made to apply these rules to the ever variant conditions of the cases that are being presented for judicial examination. Even when the thing given has been a personal chattel, whether certain acts show a purpose to give, consummated by a delivery of it, has often been, and doubtless will be, a vexed question. The uncertainty in construing the circumstances is even greater when we have rights of action to deal with." Cook v. Lum (1893) 55 N. J. L. 373, 26 Atl. 803.

Kent (2 Com. * 439), speaking of the delivery essential to a gift, says that in this as in every other case, delivery must be according to the nature of the thing. It must be an actual delivery, so far as the subject is capable of delivery. It must be secundum subjectam materiam, and be the true and effectual way of obtaining the command and dominion of the subject. If the thing given be not capable of actual delivery, there must be some act equivalent to it. The donor must part, not only with the possession, but with the dominion of the property. If the thing given is a chose in action, the law requires an assignment or some equivalent instrument, and the transfer must be actually executed.

So, it necessarily follows that the delivery by a donor of the evidence of any debt against a third person, with intent to transfer to the donee the possession, control, and title thereto, will transfer the debt to the donee. In such cases, the thing given is the debt, not the evidence; and yet a delivery of the latter, with intent to give the former, will effect that result. Cronan's Estate (1875) Myrick, Prob. Ct. Rep. (Cal.) 72; Jones v. Moore (1898) 102 Ky. 591, 44 S. W. 126; Davie v. Davie

(1907) 47 Wash. 231, 91 Pac. 950; Claytor v. Pierson (1904) 55 W. Va. 167, 46 S. E. 935. See also Gray v. Barton (1873) 55 N. Y. 68, 14 Am. Rep. 181 (wherein the rule is stated by way of dictum).

Mere delivery, however, without more, to the donee, of the evidence of the indebtedness of a third person to the donor, is not sufficient to institute a valid gift. Hill v. Sheibley (1880) 64 Ga. 529; Prickett v. Prickett (1869) 20 N. J. Eq. 478.

Likewise, delivery by a donor of an indebtedness of a third person to him, to another, to hold during the lifetime of the donor and subject to the latter's orders, but not for the donee, does not constitute a delivery to the donee or to anyone for her, and hence there is no valid gift. Duryea v. Harvey (1903) 183 Mass. 429, 67 N. E. 351.

In the case of a gift of the indebtedness of a third person, not evidenced by a written instrument, the rule is that; in order to constitute an effectual delivery and therefore a valid gift, there must be an assignment in writing or some equivalent thereof. Hawn v. Stoler (1904) 208 Pa. 610, 65 L.R.A. 813, 57 Atl. 1115. And see the reported case (ADAMS v. MERCED STONE CO. ante, 928).

But this is not necessary where the transfer is such that, in conjunction with the donative intent, it completely strips the donor of the dominion of the indebtedness given. Cook v. Lum (1893) 55 N. J. L. 373, 26 Atl. 803.

And where the order or request of the donor to pay the debt to the donee is accepted by the debtor during the lifetime of the donor, this is a good delivery, and neither the order nor request, nor the acceptance, need be in writing. Castle v. Persons (1902) 54 C. C. A. 133, 117 Fed. 835.

So, where the debtor, who has promised to pay the debt (a promise evidenced by no writing) at the request of the donor, to whom the promise was made, has agreed with the donee for whose benefit the debt was to be paid that it should be paid to her, there was all the delivery possible under the circumstances, and a delivery sufficient to answer the requirements of the law.

Ebel v. Piehl (1903) 184 Mich. 64, 95 N. W. 1004.

III. Application of rules.

a. Gift inter vivos.

In Ebel v. Piehl (1903) 184 Mich. 64, 95 N. W. 1004, it appeared that a father transferred to his son, the defendant, property consisting of a house, lots, notes and cash, and, according to the testimony of a daughter (the plaintiff), the defendant received the property on the promise that on the father's death, he would pay $400 to the plaintiff. Subsequently the three—the father, the plaintiff, and defendant—had a conversation about the matter at the plaintiff's residence. At this time the defendant asked his father: "What do you want me to give Kate [the plaintiff] when you are dead?" The father replied: "I told you you were to give her $400 at my death. That was understood. . . . I want you to give her writings." The defendant thereupon said: "I didn't think you told me, but I should have done it any way. . . . That will be all right, father. I will see to that," and, turning to plaintiff, said in English (the former conversation having been in German): "I don't see what you want to bother father about that money for. I am good for it; I am worth the money; and I told you I would pay it." The court held that if the plaintiff's testimony was credited, the defendant's promise created a chose in action belonging to the father and for the plaintiff's benefit, though not enforceable by her. The father might, however, transfer it to her, and if so transferred, the court declared she could, as his assignee, enforce it. The court said that a fair construction of the conversation which occurred between the parties to the suit and the father, after the property was received by the defendant, warranted, if it did not compel, the conclusion that the father had transferred to the plaintiff this cause of action; that while between the defendant and his father it was an existing cause of action, between the plaintiff and the father it was a gift of a promise to pay money in the future, of an existing cause of action, the gift itself being a gift in præsentī. Therefore, the court held, when the defendant, who had promised to pay the money (a promise evidenced by no writing) at the request of the father, to whom the promise was made, agreed with the sister, for whose benefit the money was to be paid, that it should be paid to her, there was all the delivery possible under the circumstances, and a delivery sufficient to answer the requirements of the law.

In Kerr v. Read (1876) 23 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 525, it appeared that a husband, on receiving a sum of money bequeathed to his wife, made an entry in an account book denoting that it was money bequeathed his wife. He then used the money along with money of his own in the erection of buildings on land seemingly his own, but treating them as moneys to the usufruct of which his wife was entitled. Later, his son having become indebted to him in a sum equivalent to the amount of the legacy to the wife, he, with the assent of his wife, transferred that indebtedness of the son from himself to his wife, avowedly on the ground that he had that much money of hers in his hands. The court held that, assuming that the money bequeathed to the wife became the husband's by virtue of his marital right on reaching his hands, under the transaction in question there was a good gift inter vivos from the husband to his wife of the money bequeathed to her which came into his hands.

In each of the following cases, however, it was held that there was not a sufficient delivery of the indebtedness of a third person to constitute a valid gift inter vivos:

The requirement of the Georgia Code of an intention by the donor to give, acceptance by the donee, and delivery of the article given, or some act in lieu thereof, was held in Hill v. Sheibley (1880) 64 Ga. 529, not to have been sufficiently satisfied by the evidence in support of the gift, which consisted chiefly of the testimony of the alleged donee,—who after the death of the alleged donor (his son) gave the claim to the latter's wife—to the effect that his son gave him the receipt which evidenced the claim, to collect; that he could not say whether the son intended to give it to him for his own use or not, as he gave it without saying anything, but witness thought it was the donor's intention to give it to him for his own use; and the testimony of the wife that at the time of the gift to her the father had the receipt in his possession, claiming it as his own, and delivered it to her, it further appearing that the receipt was found among the son's papers after his death, which the wife sought to explain by testifying that, having no place to keep it, she put it among her husband's papers; and that upon making a statement to the administrator to that effect the latter delivered the paper to her.

In Duryea v. Harvey (1903) 183 Mass. 429, 67 N. E. 351, it appeared that the donor, fearing that his physician would advise him that a surgical operation would be necessary to prevent a fatal result from a disease from the effects of which he believed himself to be suffering, and thinking that he might rather commit suicide than submit to the operation, placed in an envelop with other papers, a request on the lessee and purchaser of the donor's interest in a business, that he pay a certain sum per month of the amount due the donor each month to the donee, till the expiration of the lease. He sealed the envelop and caused it to be placed in the hands of one Jacob Scheider. On the outside of the envelop he wrote: "To be opened by Jacob Scheider, . . . or Miss May Duryea [the donee] . . . only by my direction or on my death." The court stated that, from the language used by the donor, it was plain that he did not intend that the envelop should be opened during his life without further direction from him. There was no delivery, the court held, to the donee or to Scheider for her, as the latter held the papers during the life of the donor subject to his orders, and not for the plaintiff donee. Hence, the court held that, there having been no delivery during the donor's life to the donee or to anybody for her, there was no valid gift inter vivos.

In Priester v. Hohloch (1902) 70 App. Div. 256, 75 N. Y. Supp. 405, it appeared that a lease provided that, in case of the death of the lessor before the expiration of the lease, the rent for the unexpired term should be paid to the wife of the lessor. It was held that this provision could not be construed as a gift to the wife of the rent for the unexpired term, for the sufficient reason that there was no delivery to her of the thing given, either actual or constructive.

In each of the following cases it was held that there was a sufficient delivery by the donor to the donee of the indebtedness of a third person, evidenced by a written instrument, to constitute a valid gift causa mortis:

In Cronan's Estate (1875) Myrick, Prob. Ct. Rep. (Cal.) 72, it appeared that a donor, having occasion to use some money, during his last illness sold a lot for $1,000. He said to his wife, in substance: "You will need some money; get the $1,000 from Carter (the purchaser), pay sickness and burial expenses, and keep the rest yourself." At the same time, he gave her a paper, but what it was, whether the deed or an order on the purchaser, or the purchaser's note, did not appear; the widow could neither read nor write. The following day the donor died, and the day after the widow went to the purchaser, gave him the paper, and received the money. It was held that the money was a gift. The court said that while it was true that the widow did not actually handle the money in the lifetime of her husband, she did receive from him a paper which authorized her to receive the money from the purchaser, and on which the latter paid the money to her. It was not the fact of receiving the money from him, but it was the delivery of the paper to her by her husband, the court held, which passed the ownership of the money.

In Jones v. Moore (1898) 102 Ky. 591, 44 S. W. 126, the plaintiff brought an action against the administrator of his deceased uncle to recover a book of accounts, alleged to have been given to him by his uncle in consideration of love and affection, and services rendered, and also the proceeds of accounts collected by the administrator, part before the death of the uncle and part after his death, as administrator. The evidence showed that the gift was made in consideration of love and affection, and that it was completed by delivery of possession, and acceptance by the donee. The court held that the contention that an account or book of accounts could not be the subject of a transfer as a gift was untenable, for, while a mere account, or even a book of accounts, might not be, per se, evidence of indebtedness by the person against whom they were drawn, there might exist a property right of an equitable nature, enforceable against the debtor on the proof of their correctness; and this property right was subject to transfer, either in writing or by parol, and either as a gift or on contract.

In Davie v. Davie (1907) 47 Wash. 231, 91 Pac. 950, the evidence showed that some four or five days before his death, the donor and his wife executed a contract for the sale of certain real estate, and at the same time executed a deed of conveyance of the real estate to the purchaser, which deed was to be held in escrow until the payments called for by the contract had been made. The donor stated that he gave the papers to his wife, and that they were to be placed in escrow for her, so as to provide for her; and the papers were delivered to the wife, and by her put in escrow. It was held that there was a sufficient delivery of a gift causa mortis, the donor having given the proceeds from the sale of the land to be paid on, and according to the terms of, the contract, and the donee having been placed in possession of the written contract and the escrow deed, the only way of making a delivery, the gift not being void as an oral gift of real estate, but virtually of the proceeds coming from the sale thereof, an interest in real estate which ordinarily was treated as personal property.

In Clayton v. Pierson (1904) 55 W.

Va. 167, 46 S. E. 935, it appeared that the donor deposited and left $1,100 belonging to him with the defendant for safe-keeping, the defendant thereafter executing and delivering to the donor a receipt in the following form: "Sewell, W. Va., August 26th, 1899. $1,100. Eleven hundred dollars. Received of William Claytor for safe-keeping. L. C. Claytor." Subsequently the donor, while ill and when he was being prepared for his removal from his home to the hospital, gave the receipt to the plaintiff. The evidence touching this transaction, as given by a witness, was that donor said: "Here, I will give you this; here is a note I have $1,100. I will make you a present of this;" and Ed told him, 'All right.' The witness also stated that the plaintiff took the receipt and put it in his pocket, and that the donor then said to the plaintiff "to take it (the receipt) and keep it; and go and draw the money on it; that it was his (plaintiff's); he made him a present of it; and Ed told him, 'All right.' He (decedent) told him (plaintiff) not to let any body else have it, his wife or any body else. . . . He further told him (plaintiff): 'Don't let my wife get hold of it, because she hasn't treated me right; I don't want her to have it.' He said he was going to the hospital, and the way the disease worked on him, he didn't think he would get well; and: 'I will give it (the receipt) to you before I go, so you will be sure to have it.'" Two days before his death, the donor reiterated his gift to the plaintiff, and the latter kept the receipt in his possession until after the donor's death. It was held that the facts showed all the elements of a valid gift causa mortis. The gift was made by the donor in the peril and contemplation of death; it was of personal property such as, under the law, might be the subject of a gift causa mortis; possession of the receipt by the donee was taken at the time of the gift; the donor died of his then illness in a month thereafter, without making any change in relation to the gift, and it was accepted by the donee at the time it was made, and became absolute at the donor's death.

It was held in each of the following cases, however, that there was not a sufficient delivery by the donor to the donee of the indebtedness of a third person, evidenced by writing, to constitute a valid gift causa mortis:

In Prickett v. Prickett (1869) 20 N. J. Eq. 478, it appeared that a father, shortly before his death, handed to his son a bill for grain sold, and told him to collect it and take care of it. The son, who had the management of the father's farm, and sold the produce and received the price thereof and paid it over to his father, collected the money on this bill after his father's death, but did not charge himself with it in his account. It was held that the words used by the father in handing over the bill for collection clearly did not import a gift, nor was there anything in the circumstances or habit of dealing of the parties previously which could convert the expression into a gift.

In Duryea v. Harvey (1903) 183 Mass. 429, 67 N. E. 351, it appeared that the donor, fearing that his physician would advise him that a surgical operation would be necessary to prevent a fatal result from a disease from the effects of which he believed himself to be suffering, and thinking that he might commit suicide rather than submit to the operation, placed in an envelop with other papers a request on the lessee and purchaser of the donor's interest in a business, that he pay a certain sum per month of the amount due the donor each month to the donee, till the expiration of the lease. He sealed the envelop and caused it to be placed in the hands of one Jacob Scheider. On the outside of the envelop he wrote: "To be opened by Jacob Scheider, . . . or Miss May Duryea [the donee] . . . only by my direction or on my death." The court held that Scheider held the papers during the life of the donor subject to the latter's orders, and not for the donee, and that there was no delivery to the donee, or to Scheider for her, passing title to her during the lifetime of the donor. Hence, the court held that there was no delivery, and therefore no valid gift causa mortis.

It has been said, however, that the test is whether the transfer is such that, in conjunction with the donative intent, it completely strips the donor of the dominion of the indebtedness given. Cook v. Lum (1893) 55 N. J. L. 373, 26 Atl. 803, wherein the court said: "The rule does not require that the title of the donee should be formally perfect, although in the earliest decisions this appears to have been indispensable; but now the law is otherwise settled. Thus, the delivery, with donative intention, of non-negotiable notes or bonds affords an apt illustration of the rule in both of its aspects. Such gifts are admittedly valid, although the title of the donee is not ceremoniously perfect, as it wants the finishing touch of a written assignment; but the transaction is validated on the ground that it is possessed of the all-important quality of depriving the donor of all control over the property. After the delivery of such bond or note, the donor can exercise not a single act of ownership with respect to it; he cannot sue upon it, nor collect it, nor regain its possession. And it is this absolute abnegation of power that, in a legal point of view, makes the transaction enforceable." In that case the following facts were found in a special verdict: The deceased donor deposited with one Kase the sum of $2,316, who thereupon gave her a dated paper containing in column eight several sums, amounting, when footed up, to the sum specified. There was no other writing on the paper. It was found that Kase never gave the donor any evidence of indebtedness from himself to her for the deposit. This paper, it was found, the donor actually delivered into the hands of the donee shortly before the former's death, with the intention of giving to the donee the money in the hands of Kase. It was found that Kase was not informed of the gift until several weeks after the death of the donor. In holding that there was no absolute abnegation of power over the gift by the donor that constituted a delivery and made the transaction enforceable, the court said: "This is the crucial test, and if it be applied to the case in hand this donation is not to be sustained. The reason is that the donor parted with nothing that was essential to his own dominion over the moneys in question. After she had transferred the slip of paper in question her dominion over her deposits remained plainly intact. The paper was in no sense a voucher of the receipt of the moneys; they could have been collected without its production; nor was it necessary to a suit for their recovery. It is impossible to believe that the parties intended this slip of paper, which contained nothing but a line of figures and an addition of them, as a testimonial showing the transaction to which it immediately appertained. It does not appear how the donor became possessed of this paper, but, construed intrinsically, it has the appearance of having been used for the temporary purpose of showing the aggregate of the several sums on deposit, and it carries on its face no indication whatever that it was drawn or given as a voucher of the indebtedness of the person making it. The delivery of so insignificant a paper as this cannot, in our opinion, operate to legalize the transaction in question."

2. Indebtedness not evidenced by writing.

In the case of a gift of a chose in action, as the indebtedness of a third person not evidenced by a written instrument, it is held that, in order to constitute an effectual delivery so as to consummate a gift causa mortis, there must be an assignment in writing of the debt by the donor to the donee, or some equivalent thereof. Hawn v. Stoler (1904) 208 Pa. 610, 65 L.R.A. 813, 57 Atl. 1115.

And see the reported case (ADAMS v. MERCED STONE CO. ante, 928).

In Hawn v. Stoler (Pa.) supra, it appeared that a donor, while very ill, sent for a neighbor and committed to the latter's keeping a sum of money. This money was taken by the neighbor to her home, and given to her husband, who took it to a bank and deposited it, taking therefor a certificate of deposit in his own name, which he apparently retained. The next day the donor entered a hospital, and died the day after. The afternoon of the day she died, the donor told the neighbor, on the latter's inquiry as to what to do with the money, to give a specified sum to the donee, the sister of the donor. The donee was not present at this time, and the fund from which the gift was to be made was not then in the possession of the donor or of the neighbor, but was on deposit in the name of the latter's husband, and they did not have the certificate, which was the evidence of the deposit, with them. When the money was given to the neighbor by the donor, it was for safe-keeping only, and there was nothing to indicate that the donor had then in mind any thought of making a gift of it to anyone. The court held that it passed completely out of the donor's possession, and out of that of the party to whom she gave it, and found its way into a bank, where it was deposited in the name of a third person, and was thus transformed from a chattel in the possession of the donor, presumably with her consent, into a chose in action. Therefore, the court held, the right which remained in the donor was nothing more than a right of action to recover the amount of the money from the party who held it, and that to transfer this the law required an assignment or some equivalent instrument, and an actual transfer, in the absence of which there was no delivery. Nor, the court held, was the delivery of the money to the neighbor, two days previous, sufficient as a delivery, for when it was so delivered, it was not for the use of any intended donee; though if the neighbor had retained the money specifically in her possession and under her control, so that actual delivery of it as a chattel could have been made when the intention to make a gift was manifested, the court held that the case would have been very different.

A California statute (Civ. Code, § 1147) provides as follows: "A verbal gift is not valid, unless the means of obtaining possession and control of the thing are given, nor, if it is capable of delivery, unless there is an actual or symbolical delivery of thing to the donee." Thereunder, in the reported case (ADAMS v. MERCED STONE CO.), it is held that this section is not complied with in every case of a chose in action, where, at the time the donor makes such a gift, he knows that the donee has it in his power to secure the possession and control of the thing given, and that in such a case no delivery or transmission from the donor to the donee of the means of obtaining possession and control of the subject of the gift is necessary. The court holds, however, that the correct construction of the statute contemplates that the donor shall do something at the time of making the gift which has the effect of placing in the hands of the donee the means of obtaining the control and possession of the thing given, the fact that the thing given is already in the possession of the donee at the time of the declaration of the gift not being enough, under the authorities. And in the case of a chose in action not evidenced by a written instrument, the only means of obtaining control that is recognized by the authorities, the court states, is an assignment in writing, or some equivalent thereof. In this case it appears that the donor made a gift to his brother of all of the indebtedness due on an account to the donor from the defendant company. At that time the brother and donee was the president, the general manager, and a member of the board of directors of the defendant company and, as the donor knew, it was within his official power by reason of the offices held by him to make sufficient changes on the books of account of the company to show that the indebtedness of the company to the donor had been transferred by him to the donee. It also appears that the gift was made during the last illness of the donor, two days before his death, when he told the donee, his brother, that he wanted to give him the account, stating that he did not know just how to do this, but that he gave it to him. The court holds that all that was done was to declare the present intention to give the indebtedness to the donee. No means whatever having been delivered by the donor to the donee by which the latter could obtain payment of the indebtedness, the fact that the donee was the managing officer of the company and had power to change its books did not make the gift effectual. The court holds that the indebtedness was due from the company and not from the donee, and that it was necessary that the company should have had some authority from the donor before it could legally make a change in its books to show the change in the indebtedness. Hence, the court holds that the evidence failed to support a finding of a transfer of the debt to the donee by way of a verbal gift.

While a mere request by a donor on his debtor to pay money to a donee is not a sufficient delivery of a chose in action so as to validate a gift causa mortis (Castle v. Persons (1902) 54 C. C. A. 133, 117 Fed. 835, and see the reported case (ADAMS v. MERCED STONE Co. ante, 928), yet where the request or order is accepted by the person on whom it is made during the lifetime of the donor, this is a good delivery. And there is no difference between a verbal order or request, and a written order or request, there being no law requiring either to be in writing; neither need the acceptance be in writing. Castle v. Persons (Fed.) supra. In that case it was held that the evidence in regard to the order or request which the donor and creditor made to the defendant debtor, to pay the indebtedness owing by the latter to the donee, when considered with the evidence in regard to the acceptance of the order, the promise to pay the indebtedness to the donee by the debtor, was sufficient to go to the jury on the question of delivery. The court said: "If the defendant in error owed Thomas Persons, and Thomas Persons requested him to pay the debt to Maria Persons, and he, upon such request, promised to pay it to Maria Persons, thereby extinguishing his debt to Thomas Persons, Maria Persons could sue and recover upon that promise, and, if this could be done, then all control over the chose in action would be in Maria Persons. She had complete power to reduce it to possession. In other words, all the delivery of which the chose in action was capable had been made." H. D. B.

J. M. SMITH.

Texas Supreme Court — March 31, 1915.

(107 Tex. 119, 174 S. W. 1094.)

Deed — character — quitclaim.

1. An instrument which assumes to convey the property described, and upon its face has that effect, is a deed, but if it merely professes to convey the grantor's interest it is a quitclaim.

[See note on this question beginning on page 945.]

Contract — construction — intention.

2. The intention of an instrument is to be confined to what its terms reveal.

[See 6 R. C. L. 835, 836.]

Deed — quitclaim.

3. An instrument may make use of the word "quitclaim," and still have the effect of a conveyance of the property.

Real property — effect of quitclaim in chain of title.

4. One in whose chain of title is a quitclaim deed cannot claim the position of an innocent purchaser, although the deed to him is a warranty.

Deed — absolute.

5. A deed of property in a certain town, which is in form a quitclaim, is converted into an absolute conveyance by a provision that it is my intention here now to convey to the said grantee all the real estate that I own in said town, whether it is set out above or not.

[See 8 R. C. L. 1025, 1026.]

Evidence — to explain meaning of instrument.

6. If the use of a particular clause in a deed renders the instrument ambiguous, proof of the attendant circumstances of its execution is admissible for the purpose of determining the true meaning of the parties.

[See 8 R. C. L. 1041.]

Appeal — finding of facts — binding effect.

7. A finding on conflicting evidence that a purchaser of real estate did not have notice of an adverse claim before he paid the purchase money, which was not disturbed on intermediate appeal, is binding on the supreme court.

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Seventh Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the District Court for Cottle County in favor of defendants, in a suit in trespass to try title for the recovery of a certain lot. *Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. R. D. Browne and O. T. Warlick for plaintiff in error Cook.

Messrs. Whatley & Hawkins and E. B. Perkins for plaintiff in error Neff.

Messrs. Fires & Diggs, for defendant in error:

The deed under which defendant Cook claims the property in controversy is nothing more than a mere quitclaim, or a mere chance at the property.

Threadgill v. Bickerstaff, 87 Tex. 523, 29 S. W. 757; Finch v. Trent, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 568, 22 S. W. 132, 24 S. W. 679; Woody v. Strong, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 256, 100 S. W. 801; Hudman v. Henderson, 58 Tex. Civ. App. 358, 124 S. W. 186; Hunter v. Eastham, 95 Tex. 653, 69 S. W. 66; McMurray v. Columbia Lumber Co. 56 Tex. Civ. App. 199, 120 S. W. 246; Richardson v. Levi, 67 Tex. 361, 3 S. W. 444; Shepard v. Hunsacker, 1 Posey, Unrep. Cas. (Tex.) 583; Tram Lumber Co. v. Hancock, 70 Tex. 312, 7 S. W. 724; Harrison v. Boring, 44 Tex. 255.

Where plaintiff shows title to the land and is entitled to recover the same, he is also entitled to recover the reasonable rents on said property from the defendant, he not having been in possession for one year prior to the filing of the suit, and hence not entitled to offset said rents by improvements made on the property.

Overton v. Meggs, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 105 S. W. 208; Gilley v. Williams, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 43 S. W. 1094; Estell v. Cole, 62 Tex. 698.

Where an intending purchaser of real property has knowledge of any facts or circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry, which, if prosecuted with ordinary diligence, would have led to actual notice of an outstanding title, he is charged with notice that might be thereby acquired.

LaBrie v. Cartwright, 55 Tex. Civ. App. 144, 118 S. W. 787.

Defendant Cook was not an innocent purchaser from Neff of the premises in controversy, and hence had notice of superior outstanding title of plaintiff at the time he received the deed from Neff, for the reason that he did not pay Neff the purchase money for said property at the time he received the deed, and did not pay him until after he had actual knowledge of the title to said property being in plaintiff.

Evans v. Templeton, 69 Tex. 375, 5 Am. St. Rep. 71, 6 S. W. 843; Murrell v. Mandelbaum, 85 Tex. 22, 34 Am. St. Rep. 777, 19 S. W. 880; Tate v. Kramer, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 427, 23 S. W. 255; Fraim v. Frederick, 32 Tex. 308; Hutchins v. Chapman, 37 Tex. 615.

Messrs. Crosby & Hamilton also for defendant in error.

Phillips, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The suit was instituted by the defendant in error, J. M. Smith, against H. P. Cook, one of the plaintiffs in error, in trespass to try title for the recovery of a lot in the town of Paducah. Cook answered with a plea of not guilty; that he was a bona fide purchaser of the lot, for value, without notice of any adverse claim; and improvements in good faith, vouching in A. A. Neff, the other plaintiff in error, his grantor, upon his warranty, and seeking recovery over against Neff on account of his improvements. Neff answered by a plea of not guilty, and that he was an innocent purchaser of the property from R. Potts, the common source of title. The trial of the case before the court resulted in a judgment denying any recovery to Smith, quieting Cook's title to the property, and denying the latter any relief on his cross action against Neff. This judgment was reversed by the honorable court of civil appeals, upon the ground that the deed from Potts to Neff was merely a quitclaim deed, and, therefore, incapable of sustaining the defense of an innocent purchase of the property; and judgment rendered in Smith's favor for the lot and the recovery of a certain amount as rents, the cause being remanded for trial as between Cook and Neff, upon the issues arising on the former's cross bill.

R. Potts duly conveyed the lot to Smith by warranty deed, dated September 21, 1906, but not recorded until September 29, 1909. The deed from Potts to Neff was of date August 31, 1909, and recorded the same day. Cook holds under that deed by subsequent conveyance from Neff, by deed of date September 3, 1909, recorded the same day.

The case turns upon the legal effect of the deed from Potts to Neff, since, if that was merely a quitclaim deed, Cook's plea of innocent purchaser failed, and Smith was accordingly entitled to recover the property. Omitting the description, the deed from Potts to Neff was in the following terms:

State of Texas,) County of Cottle,)

Know all men by these presents: That I, R. Potts, a single man, of the county of Cottle and state of Texas, for and in consideration of the sum of $2,500 to me cash in hand paid, by A. A. Neff, of San Bernardino county, state of California, the receipt whereof is hereby duly acknowledged and confessed, have bargained, sold, released, and forever quitclaimed, and by these presents do hereby bargain, sell, release, and forever quitclaim, unto the said A. A. Neff of San Bernardino county, state of California, and his heirs and assigns, all my right, title, and interest in and to that certain tracts or parcels of land lying and being situated in the county of Cottle and state of Texas, and known and described as follows, to wit: (Here follows description by block and number of a large number of lots, including the lot in controversy; also several small tracts by metes and bounds) and all other real estate that I now own and am possessed of in the town of Paducah, in Cottle county, Texas. All of the above town property is situated in the town of Paducah, in Cottle county, Texas, as shown by the original recorded plat of said town, of record in volume 5, page 81, in the deed records of Cottle county, Texas; and it is my intention here now to convey to the said A. A. Neff all the real estate that I own in said town of Paducah, in Cottle county, Texas, whether it is set out above or not.

To have and to hold the said premises, together with all and singular the rights, privileges, and appurtenances thereto in any manner belonging to the said A. A. Neff and his heirs and assigns forever, so that neither I, the said R. Potts, nor my heirs, nor any person or persons claiming under me, shall at any time hereafter have, claim, or demand any right or title to the aforesaid premises or appurtenances, or any part thereof.

Witness my hand at Paducah, Texas, on this the 31st day of August, A. D. 1909.

(Signed) R. Potts.

The character of an instrument, as constituting a deed to land or merely a quitclaim deed, is to be de-terminated according to whether it assumes to convey the property described, and upon its face has that effect, or merely professes to convey the grantor's title to the property. If, according to the face of the instrument, its operation is to convey the property itself, it is a deed.

Deed—character—quitclaim.

If, on the other hand, it purports to convey no more than the title of the grantor, it is only a quitclaim deed. Richardson v. Levi, 67 Tex. 364, 3 S. W. 444; Threadgill v. Bickerstaff, 87 Tex. 520, 29 S. W. 757. The intention of the instrument is to be confined, of course, to that which its terms reveal; but it should be considered in its entirety, and if, taken as a whole, it discloses a purpose to convey the property itself, as distinguished from the mere title of the grantor, such as it may be, it should be given the effect of a deed, although some of its characteristics may be those of a quitclaim deed. The use of the term "quitclaim" is not, of itself, a conclusive test of its character. It may make use of that term, and yet have the effect of a conveyance of the property. Garrett v. Christopher, 74 Tex. 453, 15 Am. St. Rep. 850, 12 S. W. 67; Richardson v. Levi, supra.

Deed—quitclaim.

The granting clause of the deed from Potts to Neff, "have bargained, sold, released, and forever quitclaimed, and by these presents do hereby bargain, sell, release, and forever quitclaim, and by these presents do hereby bargain, sell, release and forever quitclaim, unto the said A. A. Neff . . . all my right, title, and interest in and to that certain tracts or parcels of land," and the habendum clause as well, "to have and to hold the said premises, together with all and singular the rights, privileges, and appurtenances thereto in any manner belonging, to the said A. A. Neff and his heirs and assigns forever, so that neither I, the said R. Potts, nor my heirs, nor any person or persons claiming under me, shall at any time hereafter have, claim, or demand any right or title to the aforesaid premises, or appurtenances or any part thereof," are essentially in the terms of a quitclaim deed. If the character of the instrument were dependent alone upon the construction of these parts of it, there could be no doubt, under the authority of Threadgill v. Bickerstaff, supra, and Hunter v. Eastham, 95 Tex. 648, 69 S. W. 66, of its being simply a quitclaim deed, since these clauses are in substantially the same terms as the granting and habendum clauses of the respective instruments reviewed in those decisions, and there held to be quitclaim deeds.

Furthermore, if the deed from Potts to Neff was only a quitclaim deed, Cook's title, deraigned through that deed and resting upon it, was not such, under the rule of decision in this state, as would sustain the defense of an innocent purchase of the property, though the deed from Neff to himself was a general warranty; for in such case the record, or apparent title to the property, was clearly only such as Potts possessed, which, because of his previous conveyance to Smith, was no title at all. Taylor v. Harrison, 47 Tex. 460, 26 Am. Rep. 304; Garrett v. Christopher, and Threadgill v. Bickerstaff, supra.

Real property—effect of quitclaim in chain of title.

But the presence in the deed from Potts to Neff of the clause, "and it is my intention here now to convey to the said A. A. Neff all the real estate that I own in said town of Paducah, whether it is set out above or not," cannot be overlooked. It discloses very plainly, we think, that the grantor's intention in the execution of the instrument was to convey all of the property situated in the town previously described, and any other property there owned by him which was not described.

It is very earnestly insisted by the defendant in error that this clause is not to be construed as a declaration of the grantor's intention to convey any of the property described which he did not own, but it should be held to have reference only to such real estate in the town of Paducah as he actually owned, notwithstanding his inclusion in the instrument of specific property by express description. According to this contention, the clause should be construed as though it read: "And it is my intention here now to convey to the said A. A. Neff only such real estate as I own in said town of Paducah, although I have included herein certain specific real estate there situated." But the clause is not so written, and such is not, in our opinion, its natural sense. To give it that meaning requires a complete change in the form of its expression. Such a construction would give it all the force of a clause of limitation or restriction, when plainly that was not its intended operation. Its manifest purpose was to enlarge both the granting clause of the instrument and the preceding terms of description. This is shown by the use of its ampler phrase. The instrument had previously dealt with only the grantor's title to particular property. But to make plain that it had a larger purpose than merely to release the grantor's title to the particular property in the town which had been described, it is distinctly announced in this clause that the grantor's intention in the execution of the instrument was to convey all the real estate that he owned in the town, whether specifically described or not. This could mean nothing less than an intention to convey all the town property described; for the expression in the clause, "whether set out above or not," carries the evident implication that the grantor owned, or treated as owned, the particular town property "set out," and it was, therefore, intended to be conveyed.

As has been indicated, the test of the character of the instrument is not whether it was in fact effectual to convey any property, but whether it purported to convey this property. If its terms, upon their face, had the legal effect to convey the lot, that determines its character as a deed to the lot, and ends the present inquiry. If, upon its face, it amounted to a deed to the lot, its actual operation was dependent upon its right to prevail against the rival conveyance,—another question, governed by other rules of law and the facts of the case upon that issue.

There is an obvious distinction between the meaning of the clause in this instrument, declaring, "and it is my intention to here now convey to the said A. A. Neff all the real estate that I own in the said town of Paducah, in Cottle county, Texas, whether it is set out above or not," and one following a description of particular property in a town which says that the intention of the grantor "is to here now convey only such property in said town as he owns, notwithstanding the description of particular property." The difference is that while both clauses would express an intention to convey only such property as the grantor owned, the first, as before stated, carries the further equally plain profession that he owned the property in the town which he had described, and, therefore, intended to convey it. This clause in the instrument clearly assumed to convey this lot; and the instrument should accordingly be construed as a deed to the lot. If there were any doubt as to the purport of the deed being that this lot was "owned" by the grantor, it is relieved by the clause immediately following the description, "and all other real estate that I own and am possessed of in the town of Paducah," which amounts to an affirmation that he owned the town property before described.

If the result of the use of this clause was to render the instrument ambiguous,—and it was not capable meaning of the instrument (Harrison v. Boring, 44 Tex. 255; Threadgill v.

Bickerstaff, 87 Tex. 520, 29 S. W. 757), the record contains sufficient evidence to support the conclusion that a conveyance of the town property described was in fact intended in the execution of the deed. It was accordingly capable of sustaining the defense of an innocent purchaser, interposed by both Neff and Cook, as held by the trial court.

Cook was clearly a bona fide purchaser for value. Whether he had notice of Smith's claim before he paid the consideration for the lot was a question of fact, which, in the state of the record, is concluded by the judgment of the trial court.

It is proper that we should call attention to the manifest conflict between the holding in Garrett v. Christopher that, notwithstanding the other features of the instrument may be those peculiar to a quitclaim deed, the use of the term "premises" in the habendum clause will enlarge the effect of the instrument into that of a deed, and the later decisions of the court in Threadgill v. Bickerstaff and Hunter v. Eastham; since in neither of those cases is it recognized that the mere use of that term in such connection has, of itself, any such force. Garrett v. Christopher is not referred to in either opinion, but it cannot be otherwise regarded than as distinctly qualified by the ruling announced in each of these later cases.

The judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals is reversed and that of the District Court is affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Test of conveyance as quitclaim or otherwise.

- I. In general, 945.
- II. Instances in which conveyance has been held to be merely a quitclaim, 950.
- III. Instances in which conveyance has been held to be not a quitclaim, 952.

I. In general.

The question whether a conveyance is a mere quitclaim, or something more, is of importance only because of its bearing on some other question, such as whether one claiming under or through a particular conveyance is entitled to the protection of the Registry Act, as in the reported case (COOK v. SMITH, ante, 940), or whether the conveyance constitutes the color of title which will fix the extent of an adverse possession, or whether title subsequently acquired by the grantor will inure to the benefit of the grantee. So also, the scope of a covenant of warranty may depend upon whether the thing granted is the land itself, or merely the grantor's claim of title thereto.

3 A.L.R.—60.

The decisions as to the character of the conveyances therein under consideration seem to have been considerably influenced by the nature of the ultimate question involved. Thus, it is apparent that the courts, in seeking to escape from the effect of the rule that one claiming under a quitclaim deed is not a bona fide purchaser, and therefore is not entitled to the protection of the Registry Act, have sometimes declared conveyances not to be quitclaims upon very slight evidence.

The distinguishing characteristic of a quitclaim deed is that it is a conveyance of the interest or title of the grantor in and to the property described, rather than of the property itself. See

But if, though in the granting clause only the right, title, and interest of the grantor are purported to be conveyed, an adequate consideration is recited, and if expressions occur elsewhere in the instrument indicating an intention to convey the land itself, the intention of the parties is to be ascertained by considering all the provisions of the deed as well as the situation of the parties, and then to give effect to such intention, if practicable. The use of the word "quitclaim" does not restrict the conveyance, if other language employed in the instrument indicates the intention to convey the land itself.

Washington.—West Seattle Land & Improv. Co. v. Novelty Mill Co. (1903) 31 Wash. 435, 72 Pac. 69.

Whether a deed is a conveyance of the land itself, or merely a release of such title as may be lodged in the grantor, depends upon the intention of the parties. First Nat. Bank v. Timmins (1910) 4 Alaska, 242; Morrison v. Wilson (1866) 30 Cal. 344; Shepard v. Hunsacker (1880) 1 Posey, Unrep. Cas. (Tex.) 558; Taylor v. Harrison (1877) 47 Tex. 454, 26 Am. Rep. 304; Garrett v. Christopher (1889) 74 Tex. 453, 15 Am. St. Rep. 850, 12 S. W. 67; Carleton v. Lombardi (1891) 81 Tex. 855, 16 S. W. 1081; Threadgill v. Bickerstaff (1895) 87 Tex. 520, 29 S. W. 757; Laughlin v. Tips (1894) 8 Tex. Civ. App. 649, 28 S. W. 551; Culmell v. Borroum (1896) 13 Tex. Civ. App. 458, 35 S. W. 942; Kempner v. Beaumont Lumber Co. (1899) 20 Tex. Civ. App. 307, 49 S. W. 412; Baldwin v. Drew (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 180 S. W. 614; Pridgen v. Cook (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 184 S. W. 713; Balch v. Arnold (1899) 9 Wyo. 17, 59 Pac. 434.

Ordinarily, such intention is to be gathered from the face of the instrument (see Garrett v. Christopher (1889) 74 Tex. 453, 15 Am. St. Rep.

850, 12 S. W. 67; Pridgen v. Cook (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 184 S. W. 713), and it is not material whether such intention appears in the granting clause, in the covenants, or elsewhere in the instrument. Balch v. Arnold (Wyo.) supra.

But while a deed may be so plain and explicit as to require the courts to construe it to be a quitclaim of the grantor's interest, or an absolute conveyance of the land, as the case may be, upon the other hand, its wording may be such as to raise the question whether it is the one or the other, and in that event the circumstances under which it is made, and the purposes for which it is made, may be considered, to fix its true character as being the one or the other. Ibid.; Shepard v. Hunsacker (1880) 1 Posey, Unrep. Cas. (Tex.) 578; Threadgill v. Bickerstaff (1895) 87 Tex. 520, 29 S. W. 757. And see also, as so holding in effect, First Nat. Bank v. Timmins (Alaska) supra; Taylor v. Harrison (1877) 47 Tex. 454, 26 Am. Rep. 304; Kempner v. Beaumont Lumber Co. (1899) 20 Tex. Civ. App. 307, 49 S. W. 412; Baldwin v. Drew (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 180 S. W. 614.

The adequacy of the price paid is a circumstance to be taken into consideration. First Nat. Bank v. Timmins (Alaska) supra; Taylor v. Harrison (1877) 47 Tex. 454, 26 Am. Rep. 304; Carleton v. Lombardi (1891) 81 Tex. 355, 16 S. W. 1081; Moore v. Swift (1902) 29 Tex. Civ. App. 51, 67 S. W. 1065; Baldwin v. Drew (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 180 S. W. 614; Pridgen v. Cook (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 184 S. W. 713.

Thus, if the deed is not only a quitclaim, but it appears that the consideration was merely nominal, it may ordinarily be inferred that the purpose of the deed was only to release the existing interest of the grantor for the purpose of clearing the title, or the like. Balch v. Arnold (1899) 9 Wyo. 17, 59 Pac. 434.

But although, in determining the question whether a deed was intended to convey the land or a mere chance of title to the land, the fact that an inadequate consideration was paid may be looked to as a circumstance, it is error to make the determination of the question depend upon whether the grantee paid the full market value or not. Eastham v. Hunter (1908) 102 Tex. 145, 132 Am. St. Rep. 854, 114 S. W. 97.

Whether a deed is a mere quitclaim, or a conveyance of the title, or chance for title, which the grantor may be supposed to have, is not to be determined merely by the omission of the covenant of general warranty of title, but may be inferred, not only from the terms of the deed, but from the adequacy of the price given and other circumstances attending the transaction, calculated to show the real intent and purpose of the instrument. Taylor v. Harrison (1877) 47 Tex. 454, 26 Am. Rep. 304.

Use of word "grant."

The use of the term "grant" does not necessarily determine the character of the deed, but whether it is a quitclaim deed, or a deed of grant, bargain, and sale that purports to convey the property itself, is to be determined from the whole of the granting clause contained in the deed. State v. Kemmerer (1900) 14 S. D. 169, 84 N. W. 771, affirmed on rehearing in (1902) 15 S. D. 504, 90 S. W. 150.

A deed, the granting clause in which states that the grantors "do convey, grant, remise, release, and quitclaim all their right, title, estate, interest, property, and equity in and to the following real property," is not within a statute which provides that, from the use of the word "grant" in conveyances of an estate in fee simple, covenants that the grantor has not previously conveyed the same estate will be implied, and that if such grantor subsequently acquires title to such property the same shall pass by operation of law to the grantee. Ibid.

Use of words, "bargain and sell."

It has been held that the use of the words, "bargain and sell," although such words are declared by statute to be words of implied warranty if used without qualification, will not alter the character of a deed which also employs the word "quitclaim," and expressly limits its granting effect to the "right, title, interest, estate, claim, and demand" of the grantor. Derrick v. Brown (1880) 66 Ala. 162.

And in Gibson v. Chouteau (1866) 39 Mo. 536, it was likewise held that the words "bargain, sell, release, quitclaim, and convey" are words of release and quitclaim merely, which carry the grantor's interest and estate in the land described, whatever it may be, but do not of themselves purport to do anything more, and do not even raise the statutory covenant implied in the words, "grant, bargain, and sell."

But in D'Wolf v. Haydn (1860) 24 Ill. 525, it was held that, in view of the provisions of the Illinois statute that the words, "grant, bargain, and sell," are equivalent to an express covenant to the grantee that the grantor is seised of an indefeasible estate in fee simple, free from encumbrances done or suffered from the grantor, and for quiet enjoyment against the grantor, his heirs and assigns, a deed containing such words is not a quitclaim deed, within the rule that a quitclaim deed does not operate to transfer a subsequently acquired title.

In Touchard v. Crow (1862) 20 Cal. 150, 81 Am. Dec. 108, it was held that a deed in which the words, "bargain, sell, and quitclaim," are employed, is not strictly a quitclaim, inasmuch as they operate not merely to release, but also to transfer, any interest which the grantors possess at the execution of the deed.

But a different view has prevailed in other cases. Thus, a deed purporting to "bargain and sell" as well as to "quitclaim" may, for the purpose of fixing the status of the grantee therein as that of one who is not a bona fide purchaser without notice, be treated as a mere quitclaim. Webb v. Elyton Land Co. (1894) 105 Ala. 471, 18 So. 178.

The character of the grantee under a quitclaim deed is not affected by the fact that the deed also contains the words, "bargain and sell." Wightman v. Spofford (1881) 56 Iowa, 145, 8 N. W. 680.

A deed which uses as words of conveyance the words, "grants, bargains, sells, aliens, releases, quitclaims, and conveys," and which contains no claim or covenants of seisin, or right to convey, or warranty of title or possession, is a mere quitclaim which will not estop the grantor from afterwards asserting an after-acquired title. Bruce v. Luke (1872) 9 Kan. 201, 12 Am. Rep. 491.

A deed which recites that the grantors "have bargained, sold, and quitclaimed, and by these presents do bargain, sell, and quitclaim all our right, title, interest, estate, claim, and demand, both in law and in equity, as well in possession as in expectation, with all and singular the hereditaments and appurtenances thereunto belonging, and we do also promise to defend the property against all claims, if any should come up against said property," is only a quitclaim deed; and an after-acquired title does not inure to the benefit of the grantee. Young v. Clippinger (1875) 14 Kan. 148.

A deed purporting to grant, bargain, sell, and quitclaim in fee certain lands, but containing no covenant or warranty, is a mere bargain and sale and quitclaim, which will not estop the grantor from setting up an after-acquired title. Jackson ex dem. McCrackin v. Wright (1870) 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 194; Jackson ex dem. Weidman v. Hubble (1824) 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 613.

A deed purporting to "grant, bargain, sell, alien, remise, release, and convey" to the second party certain described property, "together with the appurtenances, and also all the estate, right, title, interest, property, possession, claim, and demand, as well in law as in equity, of the said parties of the first part in and to the above-described premises," is simply a deed of release and quitclaim which will not estop the grantor from asserting an after-acquired title. Taggart v. Risley (1872) 4 Or. 235.

The use, in addition, of other words, such as "give, grant, bargain, or sell," will not change the character of the conveyance, if the interest sold is still described as the "right and title" of the grantor. Richardson v. Levi (1887) 67 Tex. 359, 3 S. W. 444; Tram Lumber Co. v. Hancock (1888) 70 Tex. 312, 7 S. W. 724; Culmell v. Borroum (1896) 13 Tex. Civ. App. 458, 35 S. W. 942.

Effect of language used in habendum clause.

It has been broadly stated that the habendum cannot transform a deed, purporting in the premises to convey only the interest of the grantor, into a conveyance of the fee simple absolute. Frank v. Darst (1853) 14 Ill. 304, 58 Am. Dec. 575. But a more liberal rule is applied in the more recent cases.

Thus where, although the granting clause purports only to convey "all my right, title, and interest," the habendum is, "to hold all and singular the above-described lands," the deed may be regarded as something more than a quitclaim. See Baylor v. Scottish-American Mortg. Co. (1895) 13 C. C. A. 659, 30 U. S. App. 761, 66 Fed. 631, elsewhere set forth.

It has been held in a series of Texas cases, beginning with Garrett v. Christopher (1889) 74 Tex. 453, 15 Am. St. Rep. 850, 12 S. W. 67, and including Finch v. Trent (1893) 3 Tex. Civ. App. 568, 22 S. W. 132, 24 S. W. 679; Laughlin v. Tips (1894) 8 Tex. Civ. App. 649, 28 S. W. 551; Merriman v. Blalack (1909) 57 Tex. Civ. App. 270, 122 N. W. 403; Merriman v. Blalack (1909) 56 Tex. Civ. App. 594, 121 S. W. 552; Stanley v. Hamilton (1895) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 33 S. W. 601, that the word "premises" in a habendum clause means the land, and that such word, therefore, determines the instrument to be a deed of the land, as distinguished from a quitclaim deed. But this rule has been repudiated by the supreme court in Hunter v. Eastham (1902) 95 Tex. 653, 69 S. W. 66, as indicated by Justice Phillips in the reported case (COOK v. SMITH, ante, 940).

And in Smith v. Pollard (1847) 19 Vt. 272, and Cummings v. Dearborn (1884) 56 Vt. 441, it was held that the effect of a deed in the common form of a quitclaim, conveying to the grantee simply the right, title, and interest which the grantor then had in the land, is not enlarged by an habendum, "to have and to hold the premises so that neither the [grantor] nor anyone claiming under him shall thereafter have claim or right to the premises aforesaid," since, although the word premises does indeed often mean the land, it is equally well adapted to designate the interest or estate intended to be conveyed; and the deed will therefore not estop the grantor from subsequently asserting an after-acquired title.

Even where the use of the word "premises" in the habendum clause has been deemed to evince an intention to convey the land itself, it has been held that the clause will not have such effect where it concludes: "So that neither the said [grantor] or my heirs, nor any person or persons claiming under me, shall at any time hereafter have, claim or demand any right or title to the aforesaid premises or appurtenances, or any part thereof." Finch v. Trent (1893) 3 Tex. Civ. App. 568, 24 S. W. 679.

And a deed which purports to convey to the grantee "no more than the right, title, and interest" of the grantors in the land is merely a quitclaim, and is given no other effect by the incorporation of the words, "to have and to hold the same unto him, the said [vendee], forever." Threadgill v. Bickerstaff (1895) 87 Tex. 520, 29 S. W. 757.

The language of an habendum, reciting that the grantee was to have not only the right, title, and interest of the grantor, but was "to have and to hold the same, together with all and singular the appurtenances and privileges thereunto belonging or in any wise thereunto appertaining, and all the right, title, interest, and claim whatsoever of the said party of the first part, either in law or equity, to the only proper use, benefit, and behoof of the said second party, his heirs and assigns forever," when taken in connection with the granting clause, is inconsistent with an intention to release only the right, title, and interest of the grantor, whether small or great. Balch v. Arnold (1899) 9 Wyo. 17, 59 Pac. 434.

Language used in the warranty clause has sometimes been relied on as evincing an intention to convey the property itself, rather than a claim thereto. See, for instance, Merriman v. Blalack (1909) 57 Tex. Civ. App. 270, 122 S. W. 403; Merriman v. Blalack (1909) 56 Tex. Civ. App. 594, 121 S. W. 552; Baldwin v. Drew (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 180 S. W. 614; Borque v. Chappell (1900) 2 N. B. Eq. 187, elsewhere set forth.

The fact that the deed contains a covenant of warranty is not, however, conclusive that it is not a quitclaim. See Hunter v. Eastham (1902) 95 Tex. 648, 69 S. W. 66; Culmell v. Borroum (1896) 18 Tex. Civ. App. 458, 35 S. W. 942; and Cummings v. Dearborn (1884) 56 Vt. 441, elsewhere set forth.

Retention of vendor's lien.

The fact that a vendor's lien is retained in the instrument should be considered, together with all other parts of the instrument, to determine whether or not the parties intended to convey the property itself, or merely a chance of title. Harrison v. Boring (1875) 44 Tex. 265; Barksdale v. Benskin (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 194 S. W. 402.

But since a vendor's lien can be retained on any interest or estate in land, though less than the fee, it follows that retaining a vendor's lien in an instrument does not, expressly nor by implication, contradict and nullify the granting and habendum clauses of the instrument. Barksdale v. Benskin (Tex.) supra.

II. Instances in which conveyance has been held to be merely a quitclaim.

An instrument which in the granting clause purports to quitclaim, and recites that the grantors as "heirs" will never make any further claims of property, is a quitclaim deed within the rule that one who takes such a deed is not a bona fide purchaser. Hastings v. Nissen (1887) 31 Fed. 597.

A deed will be considered as one of quitclaim rather than as one of bargain and sale, where the consideration therefor was a mere moral obligation, and it appeared that the grantor had informed the grantee, previous to the execution of such conveyance, that the title to the property had never come into his actual possession. First Nat. Bank v. Timmins (1910) 4 Alaska, 242.

A conveyance purporting to "grant, bargain, and sell" all the grantor's "right, title, claim, and interest in and to" the land described therein is in effect a quitclaim deed. Reynolds v. Shaver (1894) 59 Ark. 299, 43 Am. St. Rep. 36, 27 S. W. 78.

A deed containing in its granting clause words appropriate to a deed of bargain and sale will be considered as a mere quitclaim, where it expressly stipulates: "It is fully understood that as to title this is only a quitclaim deed." Morrison v. Wilson (1866) 30 Cal. 344.

A conveyance of all the grantor's rights and title to certain premises will not pass title as against the holder of a prior unregistered deed. Adams v. Cuddy (1833) 13 Pick. (Mass.) 460, 25 Am. Dec. 330.

A conveyance granting, releasing, conveying, and quitclaiming all the rights of the grantor in and to the described premises is in effect a quitclaim deed. Veit v. Dill (1894) 78 Hun, 171, 28 N. Y. Supp. 937.

A deed which recites that the grantor grants, bargains, sells, and conveys "all my right, title, claim, and interest in and to the following described tract of land, . . . to have and to hold all and singular the same the above-described tract of land unto him the said [grantee]. And I do forever quitclaim all my claim and interest in and to the above-named tract of land," is not such a conveyance as will support the plea of innocent purchaser. Shepard v. Hunsacker (1880) 1 Posey, Unrep. Cas. (Tex.) 578.

A deed reciting that "whereas we, . . . fully satisfied and convinced that one Davis Files had a good and valid deed to the land hereinafter described from and through the late A. C. Allen, and that the said original deed to said Files has been lost, and that the record thereof in the county of Jasper was burned," "for and in consideration of preventing a suit and the payment of $10 for the heirs of Davis Files," "bargain, sell, remise, release, and quitclaim all our rights, title, interest, estate, claim, and demand in and to" certain described lands, is simply a quitclaim, and one claiming title thereunder cannot be an innocent purchaser. Tram Lumber Co. v. Hancock (1888) 70 Tex. 312, 7 S. W. 724.

A deed reciting that, in consideration of a certain amount paid to him by the grantee, the grantor has "bargained, sold, and by these presents" does "grant, bargain, sell, convey, and release unto the said [grantee] all my right, title, and interest in and to the following described tract of land," "to have and to hold, all and singular, the premises above described, unto the said [grantee] his heirs and assigns forever," and containing a covenant of warranty, shows, prima facie at least, in the absence of proof of the circumstances attending it and as to the adequacy of consideration to give a different character to the transaction, that the grantee bought only such title as his grantor had. Hunter v. Eastham (1902) 95 Tex. 648, 69 S. W. 66.

An instrument reciting that the grantor has "bargained and sold" "all my right, title, and interest in and to" certain lands, "to have and to hold unto him, the said [vendee], his heirs and assigns forever," and containing a warranty of title of the said land, is a quitclaim and not an absolute conveyance of the land, and cannot form the basis of a claim of innocent purchaser without notice. Culmell v. Borroum (1896) 18 Tex. Civ. App. 458, 35 S. W. 942.

Deeds purporting to convey only the grantors' "right, title, interest, and claim" as heirs of a certain person are merely quitclaims, under which the grantee cannot hold as a purchaser in good faith. Daugherty v. Yates (1896) 18 Tex. Civ. App. 646, 35 S. W. 937.

In McMurray v. Columbia Lumber Co. (1909) 56 Tex. Civ. App. 199, 120

S. W. 246, a deed conveying "all of our right, title, and interest in and to all of the lands we have in San Jacinto county, Texas, and to have and to hold all and singular the said premises under the said [grantee], his heirs and assigns forever, and we do hereby quitclaim and acquit unto the said [grantee] all interest we have in said San Jacinto county," was held to be merely a quitclaim, and not to support the plea of innocent purchaser.

An instrument reciting that the grantor does, "by these presents, bargain, sell, release, and forever quitclaim unto the said [vendee], his heirs and assigns, all of my right, title, and interest in and to" certain described lands, "to have and to hold the said premises, together with all and singular the rights, privileges, and appurtenances thereto in any manner belonging, unto the said [grantee], his heirs and assigns forever," is not a conveyance of the land, but merely of the grantor's right, title, and interest, and will not support the plea of innocent purchaser. Hudman v. Henderson (1910) 58 Tex. Civ. App. 358, 124 S. W. 186.

An instrument in form a warranty deed, but containing a recital immediately following the description of the land and preceding the habendum clause: "The intention of the parties thereto is to convey any and all rights, title, and interest they may have either from purchasing, gifts, devise, or inheritance, in and to the above land,"—is a quitclaim deed within the meaning of the rule that one claiming through such a deed cannot be considered as an innocent purchaser. Schmittou v. Dunham (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 142 S. W. 941.

An administrator's deed, purporting only to convey whatever interest the estate might have, is only a quitclaim deed, which will not support the plea of innocent purchaser unless the proceedings in the probate court and the facts of the entire transaction show that it was the purpose of the vendor to sell, and the intention of the purchaser to buy, the land described in the deed, and not a mere chance of title. Louisiana & T. Lumber Co. v.

Southern Pine Lumber Co. (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 171 S. W. 537.

A deed witnessing that for and in consideration of the sum of $5 and the trust reposed in the grantor by a certain person in his lifetime, "by which I hold in trust for the benefit of the said David Brown, his heirs and assigns, the lands granted to the following persons as their head, which lands have been conveyed to me by the said David Brown or procured by him to be conveyed to me, though absolutely in the deeds, but in fact in trust for the said David Brown, his heirs and assigns, to wit: . . . Now in consideration of the premises I, the said Edwin O. Le Grande, have this day bargained, sold and conveyed, released and forever quitclaimed, the aforesaid lands or the lands granted to the aforesaid persons as their headrights so far as any title now is or ever has been vested in me, unto the heirs of the said David Brown," is a quitclaim deed, and will not support the plea of innocent purchaser. Niles v. Houston Oil Co. (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 191 S. W. 748.

A deed reciting that, in consideration of a cash payment and the execution and delivery of a promissory note for an additional sum, the grantor does, "by these presents, bargain, sell, release, and forever quitclaim unto the said" grantee, his heirs and assigns, "all of my right, title, and interest in and to that certain tract and parcel of land" as described, "to have and to hold the said premises, together with all and singular the rights, privileges, and appurtenances thereto in any manner belonging unto the said [grantee], his heirs and assigns forever, so that neither I, the said [grantor], nor my heirs, nor any person or persons claiming under me, shall at any time hereafter have, claim, or demand any right or title to the aforesaid premises or appurtenances, or any part thereof," is shown to have been intended as a quitclaim deed by a clause therein, stipulating that the note given as part of the consideration "is payable only upon the condition that the said J. J. Ellis makes to the said J. M. Benskin, a warranty deed to section 53 below with clear title thereto" (such section being a portion of the premises described in the deed), and a further stipulation retaining a vendor's lien on the premises until such note should be fully paid, "when this deed shall become absolute as a quitclaim deed." Barksdale v. Benskin (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 194 S. W. 402.

A deed by which the grantor did "freely give, grant, sell, convey, and confirm unto" the grantee "all my right, title, and interest in and unto" certain lands, describing them, habendum, "the above entered and bargained premises," etc., with covenants "that until the ensembling of these presents we are the sole owners of the premises, and that they are free from every encumbrance, and we hereby engage to warrant and defend the same against all lawful claims made or suffered by us," is nothing more than a quitclaim, since the word "premises" may and should in the instant case be construed to have reference to such title and interest as the grantors had in the land at the time of the conveyance; and the covenant of warranty must be, therefore, taken in a limited sense as restricted to the grantor's title and interest. Cummings v. Dearborn (1884) 56 Vt. 441.

III. Instances in which conveyance has been held to be not a quitclaim.

A deed, the granting clause of which is in these words: "The said parties of the first part have aliened, released, granted, bargained; sold, and by these presents, they do alien, release, grant, bargain, sell, and convey, unto the said parties of the second part, their heirs and assigns, in proportions hereafter specified, the equal undivided one half of all and singular" certain described lands, habendum "to have and to hold all and singular the lands and premises hereby conveyed, to wit, said undivided one half of all the above-described grant of lands, listed and to be listed, and all the right, title, and interest of the party of the first part therein,"—is clearly something more than one of quitclaim and release; it is a deed of bargain and sale, and will convey an after-acquired title. United States v. California & O. Land Co. (1892) 148 U. S. 31, 37 L. ed. 354, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 458, affirming (1892) 1 C. C. A. 330, 7 U. S. App. 120, 49 Fed. 496.

A deed reciting that the grantor has "granted, bargained, sold, and quitclaimed, and by these presents" does "sell, quitclaim, and transfer and deliver . . . all my right, title, and interest . . . to hold all and singular said above-described land, together with all and singular the rights and appurtenances thereto or in any wise belonging unto [the grantee] his heirs and assigns forever," is not a quitclaim, but a conveyance of the land, and will therefore support the plea of innocent purchaser. Baylor v. Scottish-American Mortg. Co. (1895) 13 C. C. A. 659, 30 U. S. App. 761, 66 Fed. 631.

A deed, the granting clause of which employs the words, "remit, release, and quitclaim," but which undertakes to convey not only all the right, title, and interest of the grantor, but the land itself, is not a mere quitclaim, and title afterward acquired by the grantor will inure to the benefit of the grantee. Wise v. Watts (1917) 152 C. C. A. 195, 239 Fed. 207.

A deed by which the grantor grants, bargains, releases, aliens, and conveys "all of the title, interest, and estate of ourselves, heirs, and assigns, in and to the following described tract or parcel of land," "to have and to hold the said 3,321 acres of land as herein set forth . . . to the said" grantees, their heirs and assigns, "and do hereby warrant and defend said land to said [grantees] from ourselves, heirs, or assigns, and each and every person claiming the same," is a conveyance of the land as distinguished from a mere chance of title, and will support the plea of innocent purchaser. Gallup v. Huling (1917) 154 C. C. A. 560, 241 Fed. 858.

A conveyance which purports to "hereby sell and convey unto," as well as to quitclaim, is not a mere quitclaim deed. Sibley v. Bullis (1875) 40 Iowa, 429.

A deed is not a mere quitclaim, passing, not the title of the land but simply the grantor's interest therein, which employs the words, "have bargained, sold, and quitclaimed, and by these presents do bargain, sell, and quitclaim . . . all our right, title, and interest, estates, claim, and demand, both at law and in equity, and as well in possession as in expectancy." Wilson v. Irish (1883) 62 Iowa, 260, 17 N. W. 511.

A deed is not a mere quitclaim deed conferring no color of title, where it purports to "sell and convey" certain described land, notwithstanding the warranty therein was of the "title to our respective estates therein." McBride v. Caldwell (1909) 142 Iowa, 228, 119 N. W. 741.

A deed made by one as executor of another who had a fee-simple title, purporting to be "by virtue of the authority in me vested as said executor," and stating that he has "this day bargained and sold" and does "hereby quitclaim and transfer to" the grantee, his heirs and assigns forever, "all the right, title, and claims that I as said executor have in and to" the lands described, is not a mere quitclaim deed, and hence may constitute color of title. Southern Iron & Coal Co. v. Schwoon (1910) 124 Tenn. 176, 185 S. W. 785.

The use of the word "quitclaim" in the granting clause of a deed purporting to "grant, bargain, sell, demise, release, and forever quitclaim . . . the following lot of land," does not make it any the less a conveyance of the lot described, or restrict it so as to make it upon its face convey no more than the interest of the grantor in the property, and one holding such deed may be protected as a bona fide purchaser. Richardson v. Levi (1887) 67 Tex. 359, 3 S. W. 444.

A deed purporting to "sell, convey, remise, release, and quitclaim unto" the second party, his heirs and assigns forever, "all our right, title, claim, interest, and demand in and to and for" certain described lands, which, had it stopped there, would have been regarded as a quitclaim, is shown to have been intended to convey the land itself and not merely the vendor's chance of title, where it contained the words, "to have and to hold the above-described premises unto the said [grantee], his heirs and assigns forever." Garrett v. Christopher (1889) 74 Tex. 453, 15 Am. St. Rep. 850, 12 S. W. 67.

But see comment on this case and the decisions which follow it, under heading, "Effect of language used in habendum clause," in I. supra.

A deed purporting to "sell, alienate, convey, and quitclaim unto the said [vendee], his heirs and assigns forever, all and singular, the following described tract of land, . . . and all right, title, and interest which I have and devise to the above-described tract of land, by virtue of the survey aforesaid, I sell, convey, and quitclaim unto the said [vendee], from me, my heirs and assigns forever," is a deed for the land, and not a mere quitclaim, and will therefore preclude the assertion of a subsequently acquired title. Abernathy v. Stone (1891) 81 Tex. 430, 16 S. W. 1102.

A deed purporting to convey the land and land certificates, and not merely to quitclaim or release the grantor's right, title, and interest in the land, is not a quitclaim deed within the rule that such a deed does not estop the grantor to set up a subsequently acquired title. Lindsay v. Freeman (1891) 83 Tex. 263, 18 S. W. 727.

A deed is not a mere quitclaim which contains the clause, "and it is my intention here now to convey to the said [grantee] all the real estate that I own in said town of Paducah, whether it is set out above or not." Cook v. Smith (reported herewith) ante, 940.

A deed purporting to convey, not simply the "right, title, interest, or claim" of the grantor to the tract of land, but her entire interest in the tract, and containing a clause of general warranty, is not a mere quitclaim deed, and therefore estops the grantor from setting up an after-acquired title. Jenkins v. Adcock (1898) 5 Tex. Civ. App. 466, 27 S. W. 21.

A deed conveying "all that certain real and personal property, to wit, my right, title, and interest in and to" certain described lands, "to have and to hold the above-described premises" unto the grantees and their heirs forever, is not a mere quitclaim, but conveys the land itself, and hence precludes the grantor from asserting an after-acquired title. Laughlin v. Tips (1894) 8 Tex. Civ. App. 649, 28 S. W. 551.

A deed, the granting clause of which is, "I . . . hereby bargain, sell, and convey unto [the grantee] . . . the following property, to wit:" "It being intended to convey all of the surveys now belonging to me as the sole heir of said M. P. King, according to the records of the several counties in which the land lay. To have and to hold unto him the said [grantee], his heirs and assigns forever," is not a mere quitclaim, and will support the plea of innocent purchaser. Stanley v. Hamilton (1895) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 33 S. W. 601.

A deed executed for the purpose of partition, being intended to pass the land itself and not merely a claim thereto, is not a quitclaim deed, and one who acquires the land for value thereunder and without notice is an innocent purchaser. Kempner v. Beaumont Lumber Co. (1899) 20 Tex. Civ. App. 307, 49 S. W. 412.

A deed made by persons describing themselves as the heirs of a deceased owner, reciting that they "have bargained, sold, and quitclaimed, and by these presents do bargain, sell, and quitclaim" "all our and each of our right, title, interest, estate, claim, and demand in and to a certain tract of land" described, "to have and to hold the above-released premises to the said [grantees] their heirs and assigns forever," and made upon payment of full value, is not a "quitclaim" deed in the sense necessary to preclude the defense of innocent purchaser. Moore v. Swift (1902) 29 Tex. Civ. App. 51, 67 S. W. 1065.

A deed is not a quitclaim deed though it contains the term, "all my right, title, and interest," where the habendum clause is, "to have and to hold the above-described premises," etc., and there is a general warranty of "all and singular the said premises." Merriman v. Blalack (1909) 57 Tex. Civ. App. 270, 122 S. W. 403; Merriman v. Blalack (1909) 56 Tex. Civ. App. 594, 121 S. W. 552.

A deed will not be regarded as a mere quitclaim, under which the grantee is not entitled to protection against a prior conveyance, where, although the term "quitclaim" is employed in the granting clause, the deed undertakes to convey the land itself instead of the "right, title, and interest" of the grantor, with the further recital: "It being understood that the intention of this instrument is to convey to the grantee all the land in either of the leagues above mentioned, which was at any time owned or claimed or stood in the name of D. D. Moore, no matter what the description by metes and bounds . . . might be," and contains a warranty clause, binding the grantor to warrant and forever defend "all and singular the said premises," instead of all his right, title, interest, and claim in and to said premises. Baldwin v. Drew (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 180 S. W. 614.

A deed purporting to convey the land itself, although it uses the technical words, "remit, release, and quitclaim," is something more than a quitclaim deed, and estops the grantor to set up an after-acquired title. West Seattle Land & Improv. Co. v. Novelty Mill Co. (1903) 31 Wash. 435, 72 Pac. 69.

A deed remising, releasing, and quitclaiming certain lands, and containing a covenant by the grantor that the land was free from all encumbrances made or suffered by him, and that he would warrant and defend the same to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, against the claims and demands of all persons claiming by, through, or under the grantor, must, considering the habendum clause and the covenant as to the title, be regarded as more than a mere release or quitclaim, it being clearly the intention of the parties to convey by the deed all the right, title, and interest of the grantor in the land; and the purchaser accordingly does not take, subject to existing equities. Bourque v. Chappell (1900) 2 N. B. Eq. 187. E. S. O.

ROLL OSBORN
v.
CITY OF SHREVEPORT, Appt.

Louisiana Supreme Court — May 27, 1918.

(143 La. 932, 79 So. 542.)

Municipal corporation — undertaking business — restrictions.

1. The authority conferred upon a municipal corporation to prevent and prohibit the location, construction, or maintenance of all buildings and all establishments where any nauseous or unwholesome business may be carried on, and to restrict the same within certain limits, includes the authority to prohibit the establishment and maintenance of an undertaking business on a residential street where such business has not theretofore been conducted.

[See note on this question beginning on page 966.]

Injunction — interest to maintain.

2. An agreement containing features of a promise of sale, an option to purchase, and a lease, but which is not a sale, of a residence on a residential street within the limits of a municipal corporation, conveys no such property right to the grantee as will entitle him to an injunction restraining the municipal authorities from prosecuting him for carrying on an undertaking business upon such street, in violation of an ordinance prohibiting the same.

[See 14 R. C. L. 439-442.]

Nuisance — undertaking business.

3. In the absence of any prohibitive ordinance, an undertaker may be prevented, agreeably to the maxim, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lœdas," from establishing his business among residences where such business has not theretofore been conducted.

[See 20 R. C. L. 455.]

Injunction — against invalid penal ordinance.

4. Where rights of property are threatened with invasion by prosecutions under unconstitutional or invalid statutes or ordinances, individuals and officers from whom such threats proceed may be enjoined from attempting to execute them.

[See 14 R. C. L. 365-367.]

Courts — ousting courts of jurisdiction.

5. A criminal court actually in the exercise of its jurisdiction cannot be ousted of that jurisdiction by order of a civil court, possessed of no supervisory jurisdiction over it.

[See 7 R. C. L. 1067 et seq.]

Injunction — against interfering with right to conduct business.

6. The right to conduct a particular business in a particular place is not a property right the violation of which by penal municipal ordinance can be prevented by injunction.

[See 14 R. C. L. 365-367.]

Judicial notice — inconvenience from foul odors.

7. Courts may take it for granted that, with rare exceptions, human beings are in a greater or less degree made uncomfortable by foul odors, such as those emitted from a badly decomposed corpse.

— effect of undertaking establishment.

8. The court takes judicial notice that the introduction of an undertaking business into a residence neighborhood where none has previously been established will inevitably depreciate the value of the property, as well as discommode the owners.

[See 15 R. C. L. 1122 et seq.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of Caddo (Bell, J.) in favor of plaintiff, in an action brought to enjoin the enforcement of an alleged illegal ordinance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Lewell C. Butler, for appellant:

A citizen who is threatened with arrest for the violation of a city ordinance cannot enjoin the mayor and city commissioners from enforcing an ordinance which he admits is about to be violated by him, merely on the ground that such ordinance is claimed by him to be unconstitutional.

Mathews v. Farmerville, 121 La. 313, 46 So. 339; Murat v. New Orleans, 119 La. 506, 44 So. 279; New Orleans Baseball & Amusement Co. v. New Orleans, 118 La. 228, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1014, 118 Am. St. Rep. 366, 42 So. 784, 10 Ann. Cas. 757.

Messrs. Levy & Crane and Alexander & Wilkinson, for appellee:

The ordinance in question is ultra vires, unconstitutional, null, and void.

Patout Bros. v. New Iberia, 188 La. 697, 70 So. 616; Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 241, 49 L. ed. 177, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 22; Crowley v. West, 52 La. Ann. 527, 47 L.R.A. 652, 78 Am. St.

Rep. 355, 27 So. 53; Shreveport v. Robinson, 51 La. Ann. 1314, 26 So. 277.

Monroe, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An ordinance of the city of Shreveport (No. 27 of 1915) declares it unlawful "to maintain or operate any undertaking shop or parlor, where bodies are embalmed, kept, or prepared for interment, except on the business streets of the city." It then names, or designates by localities, the business streets and sections, and declares that all others are residential. The petition herein, filed in September, 1917, alleges that, on August 20th of that year, plaintiff had entered into a contract . . . to purchase the Logan residence on Christian street in the residential section of the city, for $18,500, of which $500 were paid in cash, and the contract, made part of the petition, purports to show an agreement whereby he is to pay the balance in eighty-seven monthly instalments, (eighty-six of them for $208.33 each) or, say $2,500 per annum; to have right of entry upon the premises in December, 1917, and make the first payment on January 1, 1918; to make certain changes therein, at his own expense; to keep the property insured and deliver the policies to the "vendor;" to have the right to a deed upon paying one half of the purchase price, provided the interest, taxes, and insurance premiums shall have been paid and all other conditions complied with; the vendor, thereafter, to retain a mortgage and lien for the balance; whereby, should the vendee default in the performance of any of the terms agreed on, or alter the property contrary thereto, the vendor, at his option, may declare the contract forfeited and retain all payments made, "as liquidated damages and as rent," and all improvements placed thereon; default, after execution of deed, to mature all payments; and vendee to take reasonable care of property and bear expense of repairs. It appears to have been the intention to execute the instrument in the form of a notarial act, as its recitals begin, "Be it known that before me, Sidney N. Cook, a notary public," etc.; but it bears neither notarial signature nor seal, nor date, save the year 1917, nor does it appear to have been witnessed or registered. There is, however, an admission concerning it to which we will refer a little later. The petition further alleges that plaintiff is an undertaker, conducting one of the largest establishments of that kind in Shreveport, on Texas street (within the business area), and that he has made the purchase in question with the intention of removing and permanently establishing that business on the premises so acquired; that, after making known his intention, he received a communication from the commissioner of public safety, advising him that, if he carried it into effect, he would be arrested and prosecuted under the ordinance No. 27 of 1915; that the ordinance is void, because ultra vires of the city; and, should the court hold that the city charter purports to convey such authority, is unconstitutional, in that it is "unreasonable, unjust, discriminatory, partial, and in contravention of common right," invades plaintiff's property rights and deprives him of his property without due process of law; and it prays for an injunction, prohibiting the city authorities from arresting and prosecuting petitioner or otherwise enforcing the ordinance, and for judgment decreeing it to be void. A preliminary injunction was issued, after which the city filed an exception to the jurisdiction of the court ratione materię, on the ground that the civil remedy of injunction cannot be used to oust the jurisdiction of the criminal court of prosecutions under the ordinance. The exception having been overruled, the city answered, and the case went to trial on the merits and upon certain admissions and oral testimony, to wit: It was admitted that plaintiff purchased the residence on a residential street upon the date and for the purpose alleged; that he was then, and had been for years, conducting his business on a business street; and that he received the notice that, if he established it on the premises alleged to have been acquired by him, he would be prosecuted under the ordinance. It was further admitted that two sanitariums and a hospital, grocery stores, livery stables, laundries, blacksmith shops, garages, restaurants, fruit stands, etc., are already established on residential streets; that hotels, where families reside, and a telephone exchange, in which sixty young women are employed, are established on business streets; and that undertaking establishments are permitted on residential streets in New Orleans, Denver, St. Louis, Cleveland, Dallas, and many other cities in the United States. Seven witnesses were called for the plaintiff and none for defendant. Plaintiff himself (as one of the witnesses called on his behalf), gave the following, with other, testimony:

On his examination in chief:

Q. Mr. Osborn, I believe that you testified in this case when it was first up, did you not?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In the opinion of the court in this case, the court quoted from your testimony which I will read to you: "In embalming shops, are any offensive odors ever emitted when a body is being embalmed? A. No, sir; not after a body is embalmed. Sometimes we have quite a time getting the smell of the disease off, and when we are getting out the gases and getting the smell of disease off, they are not so sweet. Q. Is there any difference in operating on a live patient and on a dead patient, so far as the odor is concerned? A. I don't know; I guess some of those dead bodies are not very sweet, and there is an odor. Q. Would that odor be obnoxious? A. I don't know; sometimes it makes it offensive to us until we can get them under control, and I would think, if the neighbors were where they could smell it, or very close at the time, that they would not enjoy it. I have lived over undertakers' shops all my life, and I haven't minded it." Now, with reference to that testimony, did you mean to convey the idea to the court that there were odors around the undertaking shop?

A. No, sir.

Q. I wish you would explain to the court how long it is before you have gotten a dead body under control, after it is brought into the undertaking shop, irrespective of what its condition is?

A. Well, it is a great deal owing to the body; some bodies are very much decomposed, and, of course, it takes longer than an ordinary body. For instance, we get a floater; but, oftener, we get to work, it takes five or ten minutes.

Q. Now, then, during the year, is it frequent or infrequent to get bodies decomposed in the morgue?

A. Very infrequent.

Q. How often?

A. I have been where I am at seven years, and have not had except two or three bodies in very bad condition.

Q. If the doors and windows were open, the odors would escape from the room?

A. Perhaps they would, but we do not let them get out; we kill them.

Q. You endeavor to do that?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You would not swear you could absolutely prevent the odors from escaping?

A. No, sir.

No questions were asked him concerning his contract for the purchase of the residence, and all that we find upon that subject is the admission that he had made the purchase and the instrument by private signature, evidencing an agreement as above stated.

Of the other witnesses who were examined, two were undertakers or embalmers.

One witness gave the following testimony, when examined in chief:

Q. During the time that you have lived here, have you ever lived near an undertaking establishment?

A. Not until I lived at Osborn's.

Q. How long have you lived there?

A. About four years, I think.

Q. You did live next to Roll Osborn's undertaking establishment?

A. Yes, sir; for three years.

The inference that we draw is that the witness was a member of either plaintiff's domestic or business establishment, or both. She testifies that she observed no noxious odors. Another witness is a florist, and another an iceman, both of whom have had (by reason of their businesses, no doubt) frequent occasion to visit plaintiff's establishment. The florist lived for a year, with his family, over an undertaking shop, and suffered no inconvenience from it, though, being asked whether there were no unpleasant odors coming from it at times, replied: "At times there were, the same as in any other business."

And he further testifies as follows (the question first asked being whether the odors would not be noticeable and objectionable), to wit:

It depends upon how close you came to it. I have been in undertaking establishments . . . when they would bring in a corpse that had been in the water several days in the summer, when the odor was very objectionable; but how it would affect different people I do not know. . . . The odor I do not mind, but I do not know what my neighbor would do.

Q. I will ask you if you have not, in your experience, heard neighbors complain about such matters as that?

A. I don't know that you could call it complaint, but I'll tell you what I have heard. I have heard people say that they would not live next to an undertaker's establishment; but, of course, that is from a sentimental standpoint; but I am taking the proposition that I would not object to it.

The iceman gave the following, with other testimony:

Q. Have you had occasion to go into an undertaker's shop when they brought in bodies decomposed?

A. I have been to Osborn's probably a hundred times.

Q. Have you not, on some occasions, noticed in their building odors that were disagreeable, from these dead bodies?

A. I can't say that I have.

At another time he testifies that he had been a butcher (before he became an iceman), and that he had lived next to plaintiff's place for more than three years; that he did not suffer from obnoxious odors emanating from the place, and was not otherwise inconvenienced; that it was just like living anywhere else, to him; and the same as to his family.

A young lady operator in a telephone exchange, where there are sixty ladies employed, and next door to which (in the business part of the city) is an undertaker's shop, testifies that she has not been inconvenienced by it and has heard no complaint from the others.

One of the embalmers gave the following, with other, testimony:

Q. You think that you can get the odor from a corpse under control in ten or fifteen minutes, no matter how bad?

A. Not all of them; there may be some that I could not get under control in ten or fifteen minutes, but the majority I could.

Q. Have to be an extremely bad case that you could not get under control in ten or fifteen minutes?

A. Yes, sir. . . .

Q. You said that, in some cases, you could not get the odor under control in ten or fifteen minutes?

A. Perhaps I might, and then again I might not.

Q. Might take longer?

A. Yes, sir. . . .

Q. During the time that you were getting it under control, it would be bad?

A. I expect it would.

The testimony of the other embalmer (and undertakers) is slightly more favorable to the view that there is nothing unpleasant in that business.

The objection which first suggests itself, to the issuance by our civil courts of injunctions prohibiting prosecutions in the criminal courts, is that our written law does not so provide; but, to the contrary, the Constitution itself declares that prosecutions shall be by indictment or information, or (under statute) by affidavit, and it provides for the courts in which they shall be conducted, and confers upon the civil courts no authority to interfere with the exercise of that jurisdiction. In the other states the writ of injunction is a remedy which is afforded by their systems of equity—systems of jurisprudence, separate, but incomplete, which are “administered side by side with the common law, supplementing the latter where it is deficient, in places overlapping, and there usually prevailing as against the law.” 16 Cyc. 1, 2, note 5 [p. 23]. The different Constitutions of Louisiana have uniformly, and in specific terms, prohibited the introduction into this state of any system or code of laws by general reference thereto, and the prohibition has always been understood as leveled at the common-law and equity systems prevailing in the other states and in England. Hence the sole basis for the exercise by our courts of equity jurisdiction is to be found in the provisions of article 21 of the Civil Code, reading: “In all civil matters, where there is no express law, the judge is bound to proceed and decide according to equity. To decide equitably, an appeal is to be made to natural law and reason, or received usages, where positive law is silent.”

As, however, the same Constitution and laws which confer upon some of our courts jurisdiction in the matter of the prosecution of crimes and offenses confer upon others jurisdiction in the matter of the protection of property rights, and as the line between the two jurisdictions is not defined in cases where crimes or offenses are confused with property rights, it has been held, not that a court exercising civil jurisdiction will assume to prohibit a court vested with criminal jurisdiction from exercising the same, but that, where rights of property are threatened with invasion by prosecutions under unconstitutional or invalid statutes or ordinances, individuals and officers from whom such threats proceed may be enjoined from attempting to execute them, and that, in the absence of express law conferring that authority upon the civil courts, they may appeal to “natural law and reason and received usages,” including the practice in the courts of equity in this country and England. Le Blanc v. New Orleans, 138 La. 272, 273, 70 So. 212. Turning then to the usages recognized in the courts of equity in this country, we find that in an exhaustive opinion, handed down in 1888, the Supreme Court of the United States, in considering an application for habeas corpus by certain municipal officers, imprisoned for contempt committed in disregarding an injunction issued by a circuit court of the United States, prohibiting them from further proceeding in the matter of the impeachment of a police judge, defined the jurisdiction of a court of equity as follows: “The office and jurisdiction of a court of equity, unless enlarged by express statute, are limited to the protection of rights of property; it has no jurisdiction over the prosecution, the punishment, or the pardon of crimes or misdemeanors, or over the appointment and removal of public officers. To assume such a jurisdiction, or to sustain a bill in equity to restrain or relieve against proceedings for the punishment of offenses, or for the removal of public officers, is to invade the domain of the courts of common law, or of the executive and administrative department of the government.” Re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 200, 31 L. ed. 402, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 482.

The doctrine sustained for a long time by this court is thus stated in Levy v. Shreveport, 27 La. Ann. 620 (being an appeal from a judgment enjoining defendant from prosecuting plaintiff under a city ordinance), to wit: “Defendants excepted to the action on the ground that the petition discloses no good cause for the suit and no proper showing is made for the issuance of the injunction. We think this exception should have been sustained. In order to present the question whether the mayor had authority to arrest and fine the defendants for carrying on a private market in contravention of the ordinances of the city of Shreveport, and the question whether said ordinances are legal, the defendants should have appealed from the judgments imposing the penalty in said ordinances prescribed. They cannot test the authority of the mayor to enforce the ordinances of the city of Shreveport prohibiting private markets, . . . in a proceeding of this kind."

That doctrine was affirmed in many cases, some of which are cited in the opinion in Le Blanc v. New Orleans, supra.

In 1899, in the case of L'Hote v. New Orleans, 51 La. Ann. 96, 44 L.R.A. 90, 24 So. 608, this court maintained the right of the plaintiff to an injunction restraining the enforcement of a certain penal ordinance converting into a "red light" district a section of the city of New Orleans in which he owned and occupied a residence, the penalties of the ordinance having been leveled at others than himself, and he having no opportunity, actual or prospective, to test its validity upon the trial of any prosecution. The language used by the court in dealing with the question of jurisdiction was as follows: "It is clear that the civil district court has no jurisdiction to restrain prosecutions for crime confided by law to the criminal courts. No prevention of such prosecutions is attempted. The plaintiff seeks the injunction for the protection of his rights of property, menaced, as he conceives, by an illegal ordinance. The right of the citizen to that protection is too clear to permit dispute, and, in our view, the petition contains all that is essential to secure relief at our hands, if the allegations in the petition are supported. 1 High, Inj. § 68."

The suit was, however, dismissed, on the ground that the ordinance was valid, and that ruling was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States (177 U. S. 587, 44 L. ed. 899, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 788).

A few years later, in Davis & F. 3 A.L.R.—61.

Mfg. Co. v. Los Angeles, 189 U. S. 207, 47 L. ed. 778, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 498, it appeared that plaintiffs were subcontractors, engaged in the erection of gas works for Mrs. Dobbins on a tract of land in Los Angeles, upon which, under an existing ordinance, such works could lawfully be erected, and by virtue of a permit from the proper department of the city government, when the city council passed an amendatory ordinance excluding said land from the territory within which the works were permitted, and prohibiting the erection of the same thereon, under penalty, after which the city authorities caused petitioners' employees to be arrested and prosecuted for violating the prohibition by continuing their work; wherefore, an injunction was prayed for, restraining the prosecutions, but the bill was dismissed by the circuit court, apparently on the ground that a court of chancery has no power to restrain criminal proceedings, unless they are instituted by a party to a suit already pending before it, and to try the same right that is in issue there.

On the appeal to the Supreme Court, that august tribunal considered the question of jurisdiction to some extent, but, expressing no conclusion concerning it, affirmed the judgment appealed from on the ground that plaintiffs, being merely subcontractors, presumably, had an action at law against the contractor, and showed no legal interest in the litigation.

In Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 49 L. ed. 169, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 18, the plaintiff was the lady whose name appeared in the suit brought by Davis & Farnum Manufacturing Company, and her suit was founded on the same cause of action, and, like the other, was dismissed on demurrer; but, having been taken to the Supreme Court of the United States (by writ of error to the supreme court of California), it was there decided that the enactment of the amendatory ordinance by the city council of Los Angeles was not a competent exercise of the police power, and that, taking the allegations of plaintiff's bill to be true, she had the right to proceed with the work without interference by the city authorities in the form of arrest and prosecution of those in her employ.

It is to be inferred that plaintiff herself was not threatened with prosecution, under the amendatory ordinance, and the questions whether she could have found an adequate remedy against such prosecution in the criminal court, and whether, that being the case, she was entitled to an injunction, staying the prosecution, were not considered in the body of the opinion; all that is said upon that subject being found in the closing paragraph, which reads as follows: "It is well settled that, where property rights will be destroyed, unlawful interference, by criminal proceedings, under a void law or ordinance, may be reached and controlled by a decree of a court of equity. Davis & F. Mfg. Co. v. Los Angeles, 189 U. S. 207-218, 47 L. ed. 778-780, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 498, and cases therein cited."

It was accordingly held that the demurrer should have been overruled and the city put upon its answer, and the case was remanded for further proceedings not in conflict with the opinion.

In New Orleans Baseball & Amusement Co. v. New Orleans, 118 La. 228, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1014, 118 Am. St. Rep. 366, 42 So. 784, 10 Ann. Cas. 757, it appeared that plaintiff had purchased for $10,000, a square of ground within corporate limits, and which was lawfully available for its purposes, with the intention of operating a baseball park, and that the city council thereafter adopted an ordinance declaring the operation of such parks unlawful within a territory including the square so purchased, and prescribing a penalty therefor; whereupon, plaintiff obtained a preliminary injunction from the civil district court, prohibiting the enforcement of the ordinance, and defendant applied to this court for a writ of prohibition, alleging that the civil district court was without jurisdiction to issue the writ. It was here held, however, on the authority of the L'Hote and Dobbins Cases, that, taking the allegations of the petition to be true, the ordinance was personal, arbitrary, and discriminatory, and showed injury to property rights resulting from its enactment, and that a proper case for the issuance of an injunction was disclosed.

In Le Blanc v. New Orleans, 138 La. 243, 70 So. 212, supra, plaintiffs (two in number) applied for an injunction against the enforcement of what is known as the "jitney ordinance," attacking it as unconstitutional, unreasonable, discriminatory, etc., and alleging that one of the two was being prosecuted under it, in the recorder's court. To which the city excepted that the court was without jurisdiction, and that the petition disclosed no cause of action. The preliminary injunction was, however, issued, and application made to this court for prohibition, which was granted; it being held that the petition disclosed no invasion of a property right, and hence that it was immaterial whether the ordinance was valid or invalid, or whether an adequate remedy could be found in the courts vested with jurisdiction to enforce it.

In Patout Bros. v. New Iberia, 138 La. 697, 70 So. 616, this court maintained an injunction against the threatened enforcement of an ordinance making it unlawful for anyone to "begin, erect, maintain," etc., a livery stable in the residential part of the city, without first obtaining the consent of a majority of the persons owning property within 300 feet of the site, or proposed site, of such stable, and a permit from the city trustees; the facts being that plaintiffs were operating their stable and proposed to enlarge it, when they were threatened with prosecution under the ordinance, whereupon they brought suit, alleging that the ordinance was void because, at the time of its adoption, the city was without authority to regulate stables or fix the limits within which they might be conducted. It does not clearly appear from the opinion whether plaintiffs were in business prior to the adoption of the ordinance or not; but, from the statement that the ordinance had been in existence long before they sought to enlarge the stable, we infer that, in its original shape, it pre-existed the ordinance. However that may be, it was held that the ordinance was unauthorized; that plaintiffs had a property right in which they were entitled to protection; and that the injunction was the proper remedy.

We find nothing in the cited cases which authorizes the conclusion that a criminal court, actually in the exercise of its constitutional jurisdiction, can be ousted of that jurisdiction by the order of a civil court possessing no supervisory control over the other.

The most that can be said is that, before either court is seised of jurisdiction, quoad a particular case, involving both an offense and a right of property, the question of the jurisdiction is an open one; and that, where a municipal ordinance, carrying a penalty, is adopted, is believed to be unauthorized and illegal, and its enforcement will destroy or invade a property right, it is open to the possessor of the right to appeal to the tribunal vested with jurisdiction of such matters for protection, and, pending the disposition of the question so presented, that tribunal may protect its jurisdiction by prohibiting the adverse litigant from carrying the same question into the criminal court. We do not ing with right to conduct business.

find that the right to conduct a particular business in a particular place, whether in violation of a municipal ordinance, or to the prejudice of the rights of others, is a property right within the meaning of those cases.

Applying the conclusions thus reached to the case at bar, we are of opinion that plaintiff has failed to show such a right of property <sup>—interest to maintain.</sup>

as to entitle him to the injunction that he has obtained. It is true that he alleges, and that it is admitted, that he purchased the residence described in the petition; but he makes part of his petition the instrument relied on as evidencing his purchase, and the one thing which it makes perfectly clear is that it was not intended to operate as a sale, though it may be construed as a promise of sale, an option, or, perhaps, a lease, since it declares that, in the event of plaintiff's compliance with certain conditions, the other party will execute a deed, and of his noncompliance with those conditions, the payments made by him may be regarded as rent, and one who claims title under a written instrument should require no deed, nor can he as owner be indebted to himself for rent. The fact that the instrument was not recorded is further evidence of its intention, since, as the matter stands, the alleged vendor can at any time, and the alleged vendee cannot, sell or mortgage the property to a third person.

In the cases to which we have referred, the property rights which were sought to be protected were acquired before the enactment of the ordinances by which they were invaded, and the ordinances were in the nature of ex post facto enactments which made it an offense to do with property that which did not constitute an offense when it was acquired; whereas, in the instant case, the agreement upon which plaintiff relies was entered into by him, say, two years after the enactment of the ordinance, and, as we think, with a view to its possible or probable enforcement as a valid enactment, which, whatever may be said in regard to the rights of the owner of the property, hardly presents a case for equitable consideration on behalf of the plaintiff.

If, however, that view of the matter should be erroneous, we are still of opinion that plaintiff would not be entitled to the injunction, for the restrictions.

reason that we are not convinced that the enactment of the ordinance was beyond the police power of the city of Shreveport.

The case appears to have been presented to the district court as though the plaintiff and the city were the only parties in interest, and theirs the only property rights to be considered, and none of the residents, in the midst of whom it is proposed to establish plaintiff's mortuary business, were given a hearing, nor were any witnesses summoned in their behalf to testify either as to the probable effect of the intrusion upon the value of their property or upon their future enjoyment of life in their homes. We have been at some pains, however, to consider carefully the testimony of the witnesses called by plaintiff, and we learn from some of them that a swollen corpse, salved from the river in midsummer, emits an unpleasant odor, but that they, being accustomed to handling such objects, do not mind it; from others, that they have lived in the neighborhood of undertaking establishments and have found them not different from other places of residence, occasional odors from decayed corpses to the contrary notwithstanding; and from still others that, living in such proximity, they have observed no odors and suffered no inconvenience. Where, however, in cases involving the suppression of nuisances, witnesses testify that a stench is emitted from a particular establishment, no one thinks it necessary to prove that it is unpleasant or nauseating to the vast majority of those whom it reaches, and who, not being employed in the establishment, have not become inured to it. The courts, we think, may safely take it for granted that, with rare exceptions, civilized human beings are in a greater or less degree made uncomfortable by foul odors, and by none more so than by those emitted from a badly decomposed human body.

Judicial notice—inconvenience from foul odors.

It may be that bad cases are infrequent in plaintiff's establishment, and that the stench emitted by them is "brought under control" as rapidly as possible; but a single experience of air so laden would, as we imagine, more than satisfy the average individual for the period of his natural life, and fifteen minutes would be quite long enough for the experience.

We find no reason to doubt that plaintiff conducts his business after the most approved methods and with as little offense to those by whom he may be surrounded as the business will admit; but, to the incidents mentioned, there is to be added the fact that the business itself is a gruesome one, and that the psychological influence of being confronted, and having one's family confronted, day after day and at all hours of the day, with death, and its woeful trappings in the shape of hearses and other vehicles, carrying in and out of a neighboring building the mortal remains of some fellow being, is no more enlivening nor wholesome than would be the constant presence of the same corpse, or the immediate proximity of a graveyard; and we take judicial notice that the introduction of such a business into a residential neighborhood, where none has previously been established, will inevitably depreciate the value of the property as well as discommode the owners. The case is therefore one in which the maxim, "Sic utere tuo," etc., is particularly applicable, and if the city of Shreveport had no power to enforce that maxim and protect its citizens in the peace and quiet of their homes, they would be entitled to much sympathy. But we find that Act 220 of 1912 (amending the charter of that city), § 1, ¶ 21, after conferring on the council the power to "prohibit and prevent" various specified businesses, concludes with the following language: "All establishments where any nauseous or unwholesome business may be carried on shall be restricted to certain limits within the city, to be determined by the city council." And we think the business here in question is subject to the authority thus conferred.

But, even if that were not the case, and there were no ordinance upon the subject, we can, at present, see no sufficient reason why the residents of the threatened district should not be protected from plaintiff's proposed invasion, under the general provisions of law which safeguard the citizen, in his home life, not only against nuisances per se, but against occupations which become nuisances by reason of the inappropriateness of the places in which they are conducted. The view thus suggested is ably expressed by the supreme court of Michigan in an opinion, the official report of which is not at hand, but which counsel for defendant has printed in full, as his brief, and which is said to have been handed down in a case entitled Saier v. Joy, on September 27, 1917 [198 Mich. 295, L.R.A.1918A, 825, 164 N. W. 507].

The learned court states that the industry of counsel and its own investigations had disclosed but two cases directly in point—the one, Westcott v. Middleton, 43 N. J. Eq. 478, 11 Atl. 490, and the other, Densmore v. Evergreen Camp, 61 Wash. 230, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 608, 112 Pac. 255, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1206—and that, in the case first mentioned, it appeared that defendant had been carrying on his business in its then location, in what was said to be a "populous part of the city," that a portion of the complainant's house was occupied for business purposes, that the case turned largely upon the question whether the undertaking business was a nuisance per se, and that complainant appeared to be of a supersensitive temperament; and the injunction was denied.

In the last case mentioned, the injunction was granted, on the ground that the business might become a nuisance by reason of its location (in a residential neighborhood) and surrounding circumstances.

Other cases mentioned are Ross v. Butler, 19 N. J. Eq. 294, 97 Am. Dec. 654, in which it was said: "But, on the other hand, it [the law] does not allow anyone, whatever his circumstances or condition may be, to be driven from his home, or to be compelled to live in it in positive discomfort, although caused by a lawful and useful business carried on in his vicinity. The maxim, 'Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas,' expresses the well-established doctrine of the law;" and Barth v. Christian Psychopathic Hospital Asso. 196 Mich. 642, 163 N. W. 62, in which the erection and maintenance of a private insane asylum in a strictly residential district was prohibited, and it was said, inter alia: "It must be conceded that the establishment of such an institution in close proximity to the residences of the plaintiffs, which are in a residential section of the city, would destroy the comfort, the well-being, and the property rights of the plaintiffs."

In the case before it, after finding that the danger alleged by plaintiff, of diseases being communicated from the dead bodies taken to the premises of defendant, was negligible, the learned court of Michigan went on to say: "We are not so well satisfied that noxious odors will not escape defendant's premises. Formaldehyde is extensively used by them in embalming, deodorizing, and sanitation. The more thorough and complete the sanitation the more formaldehyde is used. It gives off a pungent odor, and it is quite doubtful to our minds that this odor would fail to reach adjacent houses situated as close as these houses, especially in the summer time, when plaintiffs would expect to have, as they have a right to have, their windows open."

undertaking

The court was not convinced that undertaking establishments, with morgues attached, were located in other cities in strictly residential districts, and expressed its views on the psychological aspect of the case as follows: "We think it requires no deep research in psychology to reach the conclusion that a constant reminder of death has a depressing influence upon the normal person. Cheerful surroundings are conducive to recovery for one suffering from disease, and cheerful surroundings are conducive to the maintenance of vigorous health in the normal person. Mental depression, horror, and dread lower the vitality, rendering one more susceptible to disease, and reduce the power of resistance. There is an abundance of testimony in this record confirmatory of this, and it is a matter of common knowledge."

And reference is made to funerals, funeral mourners, the taking in and out of the dead, the funeral music, the unknown dead lying in the morgue, the visitors seeking to identify them, and various other reminders of mortality incidental to an undertaker's establishment and likely to produce a depressing effect.

"We cannot overlook the right to engage in a lawful trade," said the court, "nor the fact that the conduct of the undertaking business is not only lawful but highly necessary, nor that it is not a nuisance per se. Nor can we overlook the right of the citizen to be protected in his home, and his right to the enjoyment thereof of that repose and comfort which are inherently his. The question here is not the restraining of defendant's business, but the restraint of its intrusion into a long-established and strictly residential district."

The conclusion reached was that the case appealed to the conscience and discretion of the court, and called for injunctive relief.

In the case that we are now considering, the positions of the litigants being reversed, and the injunction issued by the District Court operating to permit the establishment of the undertaking business upon a residential street, for the reasons thus assigned, it is ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be annulled, the injunction herein issued dissolved, the ordinance in question sustained as a valid enactment, plaintiff's demands rejected, and this suit dismissed at his cost.

Petition for rehearing denied June 29, 1918.

ANNOTATION.

Restrictions on location of business of undertaker.

It will be seen that it is held in the reported case (OSBORN v. SHREVEPORT, ante, 955) that under statutory authority to restrict the location of nauseous or unwholesome business a municipality may restrict the business of undertaker.

In Koebler v. Pennewell (1906) 75 Ohio St. 278, 79 N. E. 471, a suit to enjoin an undertaking business, the court stated that a statute which provides that it shall be unlawful for any person or persons, company, association, or firm to establish a morgue on any street or part of a street upon which are dwelling houses, unless the owners or occupants of dwelling houses within 200 yards of said proposed morgue give their written consent thereto, does not prohibit the location of an undertaking establishment on a residence street, nor make it unlawful to receive, care for, and keep temporarily in an undertaking establishment thus located, in a private room thereof and unexposed to public view, the bodies of known and identified dead, which are from time to time taken to such undertaking establishment at the instance and request of relatives or friends of the deceased, that funeral services over the dead bodies may be held and conducted at that place.

As bearing upon the question under examination reference may be here made to the views of the courts in regard to undertaking establishments as nuisances.

In Saier v. Joy (1917) 198 Mich. 295, L.R.A.1918A, 825, 164 N. W. 507, it was held that the opening of a morgue and undertaking establishment in a residence district, to the depreciation of the value of neighboring property, may be enjoined as a nuisance.

So, in Densmore v. Evergreen Camp (1910) 61 Wash. 230, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 608, 112 Pac. 255, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1206, it was held that the maintenance of an undertaking establishment in a residence part of a city within a few feet of neighboring residences may be enjoined by their owners as a nuisance, in view of the probable interference with the comfortable enjoyment of their property, by the depressing effect of the reminders of mortality, and the escape of noxious odors and gases from the chemicals used in the business; and it is immaterial that the owner of the business intends to reside in the upper stories of the building.

But in Westcott v. Middleton (1887) 43 N. J. Eq. 478, 11 Atl. 490, the court refused an injunction sought against the maintenance of an undertaking establishment on the lot adjoining the one on which the plaintiff resided. It appeared that no noxious vapors or germs of disease were noticed as a result of the business, and that the main feature of offensiveness resulted from the plaintiff's sensitive nature and repugnance to anything pertaining to death. In dealing with the contention that the business was a nuisance per se, and after referring to the general rules as to what constitutes such a nuisance, the court stated that the injury must be physical, as distinguished from purely imaginative, and that before a trade or business can be declared to be a nuisance per se, it must be made to appear that it necessarily works injury, discomfort, or annoyance to the property or persons of citizens generally, who may be so circumstanced as to come within its influence; and said: "The results of my inquiries are that, while the defendant has no right to conduct his business so as to endanger or threaten the health of the complainant, or to make his home uncomfortable, either by filling the air with noxious vapors, or the germs or seeds of disease, the evidence does not show that he has done either, and that the business of an undertaker is not a nuisance per se." This case was affirmed without opinion (1888) 44 N. J. Eq. 297, 18 Atl. 80.

It may be noted that in Rowland v. Miller (1893) 139 N. Y. 93, 22 L.R.A. 182, 34 N. E. 765, it was held that an undertaking establishment in which human dead bodies are prepared for burial or other sepulture, and sometimes subjected to embalming and post mortem examination, is a business "injurious or offensive to the neighboring inhabitants," within the terms of a restrictive agreement, although it may not constitute a legal nuisance. v.
STATE OF ARKANSAS.

(— Ark. —, 209 S. W. 86.)

Bail — appeal from conviction of murder — effect of life sentence.

1. One sentenced to life imprisonment upon recommendation of the jury, upon conviction of murder for which the death penalty might have been inflicted, is entitled to bail pending appeal under a statute allowing bail except in appeals from conviction of a capital offense.

[See note on this question beginning on page 970.]

Appeal — effect on conviction.

2. A conviction of a criminal offense is not vacated by an appeal and supersedes, but proceedings under the judgment are merely stayed.

(Smith, J., dissents.)

CERTIORARI to the Circuit Court for Clay County to review a judgment refusing a motion to fix bail, pending appeal by defendant from a judgment convicting him of murder in the first degree. Order admitting defendant to bail.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

McCulloch, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was indicted for the crime of murder in the first degree, and on the trial of the case was convicted of that offense, but the verdict of the jury fixed the punishment at imprisonment in the state penitentiary for life.

The court overruled appellant's motion for a new trial, and granted an appeal to this court, but refused, on motion of appellant's attorneys, to fix bail.

The statute provides that a defendant in a criminal case, on appeal to the supreme court, "shall be permitted to give bail pending the appeal in such amount as the court may think proper and safe, in all cases, except in appeals from a conviction of a capital offense." Kirby's Dig. § 2587. The learned circuit judge refused bail on the ground that appellant was convicted of a capital offense, within the exception specified in the statute. The general assembly of 1915 enacted a statute (Acts 1915, p. 774) providing that in the trial of cases where the punishment was death, as the law then stood, the jury should have the right "to render a verdict of life imprisonment in the state penitentiary at hard labor."

It was pursuant to the authority of that statute that the jury assessed the punishment in this case at life imprisonment instead of imposing the death sentence.

The question presented now is whether, notwithstanding the imposition of the lower penalty, the appeal comes within the exception in the statute allowing bail on appeals in criminal cases.

We do not think that the case comes within the exception, and that appellant is entitled to bail. What the lawmakers intended by this statute was to allow bail in all cases except where capital punishment was imposed by the judgment appealed from. The statute deals solely with the question of appeals, and measures the right of an appellant to bail according to the severity of the punishment imposed under the judgment of conviction, and not by the gravity of the original charge in the indictment. Conceding, without deciding, that if the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, the jury would have the power, upon another conviction of murder in the first degree, to impose the death penalty notwithstanding the fact that the former jury had imposed the lesser penalty, still the judgment now before us is not one which constitutes a capital conviction, for the simple reason that the severest penalty of the law is not imposed.

The judgment is not vacated by the appeal and supersedeas, but the effect of the appeal and supersedeas is only to stay proceedings under the judgment. Miller v. Nuckolls, 76 Ark. 485, 113 Am. St. Rep. 101, 89 S. W. 88, 6 Ann. Cas. 513; Boynton v. Chicago Mill & Lumber Co. 84 Ark. 203, 105 S. W. 77; Foohs v. Bilby, 95 Ark. 302, 129 S. W. 1104.

The attorney general relies upon the case of Cæsar v. State, 127 Ga. 710, 57 S. E. 66, as sustaining the contrary view. That case involved the interpretation of a provision of the Georgia Constitution, which conferred jurisdiction on the supreme court "in all cases of conviction of a capital felony," and the court held that a conviction of murder in the first degree, with the imposition only of life imprisonment, where either that punishment or the death penalty might be imposed by the trial jury, was "a conviction of a capital felony," within the language of the Constitution, so as to confer jurisdiction on the supreme court.

The reasoning of the court in that case is not without some force in the present one, but the question there involved was altogether different from the one now before us. The constitutional provision under consideration in that case involved the jurisdiction of the court in a certain class of cases, whereas we are dealing with a statute which concerns the right of bail, and we think that the legislative intent is clear that bail should be allowed except in cases where the appellant rests under a conviction imposing the death penalty.

An order will therefore be entered here admitting appellant to bail.

Smith, J., dissenting (filed February 24, 1919):

The majority say that "what the lawmakers intended by this statute was to allow bail in all cases except where capital punishment was imposed by the judgment appealed from." Possibly so, but that is not the language of the statute. The statute is that bail shall be permitted "in all cases except in appeals from a conviction of a capital offense." So that the question, properly stated, is not whether a capital sentence has been imposed, but whether there has been a conviction of a capital offense, and as thus stated, the question, it would seem, is much simplified. There is no right of bail unless the statute gives it, as the constitutional guaranty reads as follows: "All persons shall, before conviction, be bailable by sufficient sureties, except for capital offenses, when the proof is evident or the presumption great." Const. § 8, art. 2.

In the transcript filed in this case, we read the following verdict: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree. . . ." That murder in the first degree is a capital offense is a proposition which will not be questioned. Appellant has been convicted of that offense. It is true the death sentence was not imposed, but it could have been imposed by the jury. In the case of Bell v. State, 120 Ark. 538, 180 S. W. 190, in construing this statute we said: "The manifest purpose of the legislature was not to abolish capital punishment, but to provide also another method of punishment if the jury so ordained."

And in Kelley v. State, 133 Ark. 261, 202 S. W. 54, where the same statute was before us, we said: "It is strenuously insisted by learned counsel for appellant that the act is mandatory, and imposes a duty upon the jury to fix the punishment either of death or life imprisonment. We think the plain language of the statute is against the contention. It, in so many words, extends a privilege or right to a jury to impose a lighter punishment than death. In case the clemency is not extended, the punishment fixed by law follows the verdict."

So that, while a jury may or may not assess the death punishment upon a conviction of murder in the first degree, that crime remains a capital one, because death is still a punishment fixed by law for its commission.

I agree with the majority of the court that the reasoning of the Georgia court is not without force in the instant case, although the facts are different. Discussing the principle involved here, that court said: "If the statute imposes death as a punishment, and provides for no other punishment, of course the offense is a capital felony. The question now is, when the statute provides that the punishment shall be death or imprisonment, as the jury shall recommend, and the jury recommends imprisonment, whether the verdict of guilty of the offense is a conviction of a capital offense. In our view, the expression, 'capital felony,' when used in our law, is merely descriptive of those felonies to which the death penalty is affixed as a punishment under given circumstances, to distinguish such felonies from that class in which, under no circumstances, would death ever be inflicted as a penalty for the violation of the same. Felonies, in the Penal Code, are thus divided in two classes—capital felonies and felonies not capital. If under any circumstances, the penalty of death can be inflicted, the offense is capital, whether it is actually inflicted in a particular case or not. If under no circumstances the death penalty can be inflicted, the offense is not capital. If one were asked as to what are the capital felonies under the law of Georgia, the immediate reply would be treason, murder, arson, rape, etc.; still, in all of these cases, capital punishment cannot be inflicted if the jury trying the offender shall recommend imprisonment for life as a punishment." Cesar v. State, 127 Ga. 712, 57 S. E. 67.

I am of the opinion that the court below in refusing bail correctly interpreted the statute, and I, therefore, dissent.

ANNOTATION.

Bail: imposition of life sentence as affecting capital character of offense.

The reported case (WALKER v. STATE, ante, 968) appears to be the first directly to pass upon the question whether the fact that the jury, in a case where the capital penalty might have been imposed, have assessed the defendant's punishment at imprisonment for life, renders the offense no longer capital, and removes the defendant for the time being from the category of capital offenders, and so entitles him to bail.

The point was, however, raised in Ex parte Heath (1910) 227 Mo. 393, 126 S. W. 1031, and Butt v. State (1915) 181 Tenn. 415, 175 S. W. 529;

but the necessity for deciding it was avoided by the court's conclusion that the constitutional right to be admitted to bail except for capital offenses, invoked by the petitioner, did not extend beyond the time of conviction. In the case last cited, however, the court said: "Under the practice obtaining in this state it is competent for the trial judge, or for this court on appeal, to disregard the finding of mitigating circumstances by the trial jury, and to order the infliction of the death penalty. Hence, there continues to be involved a 'capital offense,' within the meaning of the consti-tional provision now under consideration. The mere fact that the functionary empowered to assess punishment may impose either life imprisonment or the death penalty does not make the offense any the less capital within the meaning of the law."

The fact that the penalty which may be imposed may be, instead of death, imprisonment for life, or for a term of years, has been held not to change the capital character of the offense, so as to entitle a person awaiting trial for such offense to bail, under a constitutional provision that all persons shall be bailable except for capital offenses. Ex parte McCrary (1853) 22 Ala. 65; Ex parte McAnally (1875) 53 Ala. 495, 25 Am. Rep. 646; Ex parte Fortenberry (1876) 53 Miss. 428; Ex parte Dusenberry (1888) 97 Mo. 504, 11 S. W. 217.

Where a conviction has been set aside upon appeal, the case, for the purpose of determining the defendant's right to bail, stands as if it had not been tried. Ex parte Patterson (1917) 81 Tex. Crim. Rep. 26, 193 S. W. 146.

And so, where a person convicted of any offense punishable with imprisonment at hard labor may not be admitted to bail, one convicted of an offense which may be punished by hard labor is not entitled to bail between the time of his conviction and that when sentence is to be passed. State ex rel. Collette (1902) 106 La. 221, 30 So. 746, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 51.

It has been held that since a conviction of a lesser degree of homicide is an equivalent of acquittal of the higher degree, for which the defendant may not again be tried, one who, on being tried for murder in the first degree was convicted of murder in the second degree, is entitled to admission to bail pending appeal. Ex parte Spivey (1912) 175 Ala. 43, 57 So. 491; Ex parte Moore (1904) 46 Tex. Crim. Rep. 417, 80 S. W. 620.

Though the point is not germane to the subject of this note, the reader may be interested to know that it has been held that the effect of the abolition of capital punishment is to extend the constitutional right to bail for noncapital offenses to persons charged with offenses formerly punishable with death (Re Welisch (1917) 18 Ariz. 517, 163 Pac. 264 (obiter); Re Perry (1865) 19 Wis. 676), except where the repeal of the death penalty and the enactment of the amendment imposing the penalty of imprisonment for life do not affect offenses previously committed, although the prosecution therefor may have been instituted subsequently to the amendment (Re Schneck (1908) 78 Kan. 207, 96 Pac. 48). APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the District Court for Delaware County dismissing a petition filed to enforce an agreement to return to him, on demand, money on deposit in the defendant bank. Reversed.

Statement by Weaver, J.:

Action to enforce an agreement whereby it is claimed defendant received a sum of money originally deposited with the Delaware County State Bank, and afterwards taken over by defendant upon an agreement to return the same to plaintiff, on demand, if plaintiff did not receive title to certain land in the state of Texas, which plaintiff had purchased from the American & Canadian Land Company. It is alleged that this money was deposited in the banks as a tender of the amount due on certain notes given for the Texas land, with a demand for the fulfilment of the contract, which was never done; and the suit was primarily to recover the amount of the tender and deposit from the bank. Defendant bank admitted the tender and deposit, said it was made to stop interest on the notes, and also pleaded a counterclaim upon the notes. It also alleged that plaintiff was a nonresident, and it sued out a writ of attachment, which was levied upon the fund. To this plaintiff replied by alleging that the consideration for the notes had failed, and that defendant was not a bona fide holder thereof, but had notice when it purchased that the notes were given for the purchase price of lands, title to which thereafter entirely failed. Defendant averred that it was a bona fide holder without notice of any infirmities, and also pleaded an estoppel on plaintiff to deny the validity of the notes. Other issues were tendered which will be noticed in the body of the opinion. The case was tried as in equity, resulting in a decree dismissing plaintiff's petition, finding for the defendant on its counterclaim, and sustaining the attachment.

Messrs. Yoran & Yoran and J. W. Arbuckle for appellant.

Messrs. W. H. Norris and Grimm & Trewin for appellee.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In March of the year 1909 plaintiff and one F. B. Peet separately entered into written contracts with the American & Canadian Land Company of Tipton, Iowa, for the purchase of certain Texas lands. Plaintiff Todd agreed to pay $3,600 for his tract, $800 of which he paid in cash, and the balance of $2,800 was represented by two negotiable promissory notes in the sum of $1,400 each, maturing March 18, 1912. Peet agreed to pay $7,200 for his land, $3,200 of which was paid by a transfer of land to the company, and the remainder was represented by negotiable notes in the sum of $1,000 due March 18, 1912, $1,000 due March 18, 1913, $1,000 due March 18, 1914, and a note for the same amount due March 11, 1911, was paid by Peet. The five notes above described are made the subject of counterclaim against the plaintiff, he having taken over the Peet contract and assumed and agreed to pay the notes. The American & Canadian Land Company executed contracts with the purchaser of the land wherein it was agreed, among other things:

"In consideration of the payments above mentioned the vendor agrees to convey to purchaser in fee simple, free and clear of all encumbrances, the following described real estate, to wit: Southeast quarter section No. 5 in block 6, Randall county, state of Texas, U. S. A.

"It is further agreed that on the date of the last payment mentioned herein, in case same shall have been fully paid, purchaser shall have a warranty deed to the above-described property, together with an abstract of title showing title free and clear from all encumbrances in vendor; said abstract to be approved by Gustavus, Bowman, & Jackson, of Amarillo, Texas, and when so approved to be final and conclusive upon the purchaser, and his money should be due and payable; all money paid under this contract to be returned if warranty deed and abstract are not furnished as herein provided."

Some time in April, 1909, one W. R. Jameson, acting as agent for the land company, entered into negotiations with the defendant bank to sell it the Todd and Peet notes, and not later than April 19, 1909, defendant purchased all these notes, which were duly indorsed to it by the original payee. It paid cash for the notes, and took assignments of the land contracts for security. There is some dispute in the record as to the exact date when the bank took over the contracts, but, notwithstanding the claim of some of the bank officers that the contracts were not received until after the purchase of the notes, the record as a whole shows beyond reasonable doubt that they are mistaken in this respect, and that the contracts were in fact assigned and delivered to the bank together with the notes. March 18, 1912, plaintiff made a tender of the full amount called for in his notes, and also the ones executed by Peet, and demanded a deed to the land covered by the contracts. This demand was made of the appellee bank, but it could not make the title, and the money so tendered was deposited in the Delaware State Bank, and afterwards, by written agreement, transferred to the appellee bank. The tender covered the amount due and to become due on the notes at the time it was made. It was stipulated in the agreement under which the tender and deposit were made as follows:

"Both the State Bank of Edgewood and Levi M. Todd are desirous of avoiding any loss to anyone of the interest on the amount still remaining unpaid on said notes and contracts, and it is therefore agreed between the said State Bank of Edgewood and the said Levi M. Todd that the amount above stated, offered to be paid by the said Levi M. Todd and by him tendered, which is now on deposit, as above stated, with the Delaware County State Bank, shall be deposited by him with the State Bank of Edgewood under the following agreement and understanding, that is to say:

"That so long as the same is left by the said Levi M. Todd with said bank the said deposit shall have the same force and effect with relation to the tender and offer of payment above made as though the same had remained on deposit in the Delaware County State Bank, and the said State Bank of Edgewood agreed to thus accept the same as a deposit by the said Levi M. Todd for the purpose stated, and agrees that so long as the same is left on deposit with said bank there shall be no interest due or to be collected on the said notes of F. B. Peet and Levi M. Todd now held by said bank, and to pay which the said amount was offered in payment and so tendered, and each party further agrees that the making of this agreement to deposit said money with the State Bank of Edgewood, the depositing of the same, and none of the negotiations with reference to this agreement or deposit, shall be considered or held to in any way influence or change the rights or interests of either party in the ultimate determination of any question to be determined with reference to the obligations of said Levi M. Todd on said notes, or his rights under said contracts, or his right to demand and receive deed with perfect title to the property purchased under said contract before the delivery and payment of the amount to be paid as evidenced by said notes.

"It is understood that in the final settlement with the American & Canadian Land Company said company will pay all interest from the time of tender, and it is agreed that such interest, when paid, shall be for the time the deposit is kept in the State Bank of Edgewood, to be by it paid to Levi M. Todd.

"And it is further specifically agreed that the said Levi M. Todd shall have the right to withdraw said deposit at any time that he sees fit to do so, and the said State Bank of Edgewood agrees to pay the same to him on demand at the Delaware County State Bank in Manchester, Iowa."

This action is bottomed primarily on the last paragraph of this stipulation. The agreement was entered into September 23, 1912, and on September 13, 1913, plaintiff demanded the return of his money, which was refused. It appears that the land company had title to the Texas land it had agreed to convey to plaintiff and Peet at the time they negotiated for the same, but it was encumbered by vendors' liens. Todd, however, took up the vendors' liens so far as they affected the land purchased by him. There is evidence that the land company which issued these contracts and sold these notes was solvent and doing business until February, 1912, but we think it clear that long before these notes became due, if not, indeed, at the time they were negotiated, the concern was in financial straits, and that if it remained for some time a so-called "going concern" it was due to the law of nature which keeps a paper balloon afloat until some puncture allows the hot air to escape. When the notes became due March 18, 1912, and the company was called upon to perform its contracts, it confessed its inability to do so or to convey the lands free from encumbrance, and whatever title it had to the property had since been lost by foreclosure of prior liens. Before buying the notes one of the bank officers met the plaintiff and asked him whether he had any objections to their making the purchase, and he replied it would be satisfactory to him. Later, on one or two occasions, one of the men representing the bank testifies he spoke to plaintiff of the advisability of obtaining a conveyance of the land, and says he told him if he would make his own notes for the amount direct to the bank it would turn over to him the notes he had given for the land, and thereby enable him to fix the matters up with the company, but the witness further says that the plaintiff seemed satisfied with the situation as it was, and did not accept the offer made him. As it does not appear that the notes were then due or that the land company was then under any present obligation to make the conveyance, it is somewhat uncertain what the plaintiff could have done in the matter, and as he could not substitute new notes direct to the bank without waiving the benefit of his defense, if any he has, we think it not very material what the truth may be with respect to these interviews. The first of the notes in suit fell due on March 18, 1912, and promptly thereon plaintiff, with his counsel, visited the defendant bank. What talk passed between the parties at that meeting is the subject of somewhat sharp conflict in the testimony. It is conceded, however, that, as already stated, plaintiff made tender of a sufficient sum to cover the debt, and, upon defendant's statement that it was not prepared to make or furnish title to the land, plaintiff informed the bank's representatives that he would deposit the money in the Delaware County State Bank to be paid over to defendant upon delivery of a deed of conveyance in accordance with the land company's contract. It was this deposit which became the subject of the contract by which the money was withdrawn from the Delaware County State Bank and deposited in the defendant's bank, and on which this action was brought. The defendant answered this claim, denying the plaintiff's right to withdraw the deposit, and by way of counterclaim pleaded the notes upon which the plaintiff became liable, and demands a recovery thereon. Plaintiff denies that defendant has any right of recovery as a bona fide holder of the notes, and insists that he has in this action the same right to demand a conveyance of the land as a condition precedent to the payment of the notes which he would have were the action being prosecuted by the land company itself. The contest resolves itself practically into a question whether defendant is entitled to recover the amount of the notes in suit without regard to the fact that the land had never been conveyed as agreed. That plaintiff's defense would be good were the claim being sued by the payee, the land company, no one denies, and the question upon which the issue here presented must turn is, whether upon the proved or admitted facts the defendant is entitled to be considered a bona fide holder against whom such defense is unavailing. This inquiry arises here in a two-fold aspect. In the first place, it sufficiently appears that before and at the time of the purchase the managing officers of the bank conducting that transaction knew, or were reasonably well advised, that the notes were given upon contracts for the purchase of Texas land. In the second place, it is well established that the bank, at the time it purchased the notes, also demanded and took over to itself the contract of sale which the land company made with the plaintiff and Peet, in consideration of which the notes were given. Is the bank, under such circumstances, a bona fide purchaser without notice, within the meaning of the law merchant or of our statute?

In a carefully prepared opinion the trial court, having conceded that the assignment of the contracts to the defendant brought to it knowledge of the terms and conditions therein contained, finds, nevertheless, that the case falls within the doctrine of McNight v. Parsons, 186 Iowa, 392, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 718, 125 Am. St. Rep. 265, 113 N. W. 858, 15 Ann. Cas. 665, and other precedents of that class, which hold to the general rule that knowledge by the purchaser of a negotiable instrument that it was given in consideration of an executory contract will not affect his rights as a bona fide holder unless he also has notice of a breach of such contract. No breach of these contracts having been shown until the notes matured and the company failed to make the conveyance agreed upon it must be admitted that, if the court was right, that this case is of the same class as the cited precedents, the correctness of its conclusion is undisputable. But in our opinion the case presented by this record is quite distinguishable from those to which the rule contended for is properly applicable. In the McNight Case the question was whether mere knowledge by the indorsee of a note, that it was given for personal property sold with a warranty of quality, was sufficient to make the note in his hands subject to defense or counterclaim on account of a breach of such warranty, of which breach he had no notice when he bought the paper, and upon that question we found in the negative. To that holding we still adhere. A large proportion of the negotiable paper which finds its way into the banks or markets of the business world has its consideration to a greater or less extent in executory undertakings, and any other rule would be attended with unfortunate results. But there is a marked distinction to be noted between the cases of the kind just mentioned, and those where the note has been made upon terms by which the performance of an execuutory agreement is a condition precedent to the right of the payee to demand or recover payment. If such be the contract, then, as between the maker and payee, the latter, in order to make a case for recovery upon the notes, must be able to show his performance or readiness to perform the condition. It is equally clear that one who becomes the indorsee or assignee of such notes, knowing the condition precedent to a recovery thereon by the payee, takes his title with the same burden which attached to it in the hands of his indorser or assignor. That such is the position occupied by the defendant in this case, we think there can be no doubt. Let us revert for a moment to the language of the contract. After the agreement on the one part to sell, and upon the other to purchase, the land at a stipulated price, and for the giving of notes for the deferred instalments of the purchase money, the land company's undertaking to make conveyance is expressed in the following words:

"In consideration of said payments above mentioned the vendor agrees to convey to purchaser in fee simple, free and clear of all encumbrances, the following described real estate, to wit: southeast quarter of section No. 5 in block 6, Randall county, state of Texas, U. S. A."

"It is further agreed that on the date of the last payment mentioned herein, in case same shall have been fully paid, purchaser shall have a warranty deed to the above-described property, together with an abstract of title showing title clear and free from all encumbrances in vendor; said abstract to be approved by Gustavus, Bowman, & Jackson, of Amarillo, Texas, and when so approved to be final and conclusive upon the purchaser, and his money shall be due and payable; all money paid under this contract to be returned if warranty deed and abstract are not furnished as herein provided."

It does not differ materially from the ordinary form of agreement or bond for the sale of land, and we set it out in terms only to make clear the applicability of the authorities to which we shall soon call attention. It is a well-settled doctrine in equity that the effect of such a contract is to vest the purchaser with the equitable title to the land (so far, at least, as the seller is able to pass such title), and leave the seller holding the legal title in trust for the purchaser to be conveyed on payment of the price. Until both parties are prepared to complete the transaction the unpaid purchase money in the buyer's hands in his security for the performance of the seller's agreement to convey to him a good title, while, on the other hand, the legal title remaining in the seller is his security for the payment of the remainder of the price. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. 3d ed. § 368. Concerning the mutual rights of a buyer and seller under a contract for conveyance, this court has had frequent occasion to speak. In School Dist. v. Rogers, 8 Iowa, 316, it is said: "Where it is made to appear that the conveyance [of land] was to be made upon the payment of the purchase money, the courts regard the two acts as so far dependent that it is held that to entitle the plaintiff to recover he must show a performance, or offer to perform the contract on his part, unless the defendant has waived a tender of the deed."

And it was held that in an action upon a note given for the purchase of land, where the seller was to make conveyance upon payment of such note, it was error not to instruct the jury to that effect. See to the same effect, Fitch v. Casey, 2 G. Greene, 307. The rule is restated in the same language in Berryhill v. Byington, 10 Iowa, 223. Even if it be said that the duty to convey or offer to convey is not technically a condition precedent, the covenants and conditions are at least dependent and mutual, and if the buyer cannot claim his deed until he has paid or tendered the price, neither can the seller sue for the money without tendering the deed. Barron v. Easton, 3 Iowa, 76; Lyon v. O'Kell, 14 Iowa, 234; Courtright v. Deeds, 37 Iowa, 503; Claude v. Richardson, 127 Iowa, 623, 103 N. W. 991; Sutton v. Griebel, 118 Iowa, 78, 91 N. W. 825. Where the seller had undertaken to furnish title supported by an abstract showing it to be good, the performance of the covenant was held to be a condition precedent, and he was not entitled to recover the purchase money until he had complied therewith. Martin v. Roberts, 127 Iowa, 220, 102 N. W. 1126. In American Gas & Ventilation Mach. Co. v. Wood, 43 L.R.A. 465, the annotator, distinguishing between cases in which a promissory note and a contemporaneous agreement are collateral and independent, and those in which the note and contemporaneous agreement are mutual and dependent, says, in substance, that the difference is that in the former it is not the intent of the parties that the performance of the one contract should be dependent or conditional upon the performance of the other. Applying this rule, the same authority classified a promissory note given for the purchase of land, and the payee's promise to convey the land on payment of the note, as mutual and dependent agreements. Stating the rule in another way, it is said that mutual and dependent agreements depend upon whether they relate to the same subject-matter, and whether it was the intent that the performance of both should be simultaneous. That contracts like those involved in the case at bar fall within this class is, as we have seen, thoroughly well settled in this state—a position which has the support of the courts generally. Goodwin v. Nickerson, 51 Cal. 166; Mix v. Ellsworth, 5 Ind. 517; Little v. Thurston, 58 Me. 86; Hoag v. Parr, 13 Hun, 95; Kessler v. Pruitt, 14 Idaho, 175, 93 Pac. 965; Sayre v. Mohney, 30 Or. 238, 47 Pac. 197; McCulloch 3 A.L.R.—62.

v. Dawson, 1 Ind. 413; Kelly v. Webb, 27 Tex. 368; Naftzger v. Gregg, 3 Cal. Unrep. 520, 31 Pac. 612. In short, as between the parties to the contract, it is perfectly clear that both the contracts made, each in connection with or in consideration of the other, are to be read together in determining the mutual rights of such parties, and neither can recover against the other without performance or tender of performance on his own part of their mutual covenants. It is not to be denied that, if a note so made is negotiable in form, and is in fact negotiated before due, and for value, to an indorsee who receives it without notice of the conditional character of the promise to pay, he will be protected as an innocent purchaser, and may enforce collection of the note, notwithstanding the failure of the payee to perform his agreement by the conveyance of the title. But it is very difficult to understand upon what theory the defendant in this case can bring itself within the benefit of that rule. As the purchaser of the note and the assignee of the contemporaneous contract, it has perfect and complete knowledge of the contract between the parties, and as a matter of law it must be held to have known and understood the mutual dependency of the maker's agreement to pay on the payee's agreement to convey, and that as between these parties the payee could not enforce payment without proof of its performance, or of its readiness and willingness to perform. If the payee could not collect the note without such showing, by what rule or upon what principle can the indorsee, taking the paper with knowledge of the rights and equities of the maker as against the indorser, hope to stand in any better right? Had the contract and the accompanying note been written together, both upon the same sheet of paper, and in that form indorsed and delivered to the bank, counsel would hardly argue that by suing upon the note alone it could exclude the defense thereto which is asserted in this case, and founded upon the entire agreement. See Goodwin v. Nickerson, supra. But so long as it is conceded, as it must be, that the note was but a part of the contract and that defendant knew the fact, it is perfectly immaterial whether it was written all upon the same sheet or whether the mutual and dependent covenants were written on separate sheets. It is scarcely necessary to cite authorities to this proposition, which is entirely clear upon principle, but it may be said that the proposition is directly affirmed in Thomas v. Page, 3 McLean, 167, Fed. Cas. No. 13,906, where it was held that a note, though absolute in form, may, by a separate agreement between the parties, be made payable on condition, and, in the hands of an assignee or indorsee with knowledge of the condition, it takes effect the same as between the original parties. See also Sutton v. Beckwith, 68 Mich. 303, 13 Am. St. Rep. 344, 36 N. W. 79. We conclude, therefore, that defendant was a holder of the note and of the contemporaneous contract between the original parties charged with notice of the equities in favor of plaintiff.

We cannot see how defendant's claim of having advised plaintiff to take these notes before due, giving other notes direct to itself, and then adopt measures to compel the land company to make the title to the land, materially affects the relative rights of the parties. The notes in suit were not due, and, as we have seen, defendant had acquired them with knowledge of the equities in plaintiff's favor, and the latter had the right against either or both to resist payment until title to the land was conveyed or tendered to him. To have acted on the defendant's suggestion would have been to abandon his defense against the bank, and pay their claim in full, leaving him only a remedy without value against the bankrupt payee. He could rightfully insist upon the time which his contract gave him for the payment of the debt, and rest upon his right to demand a deed of the land before surrendering his money to the payee, or to any holder of the paper receiving it with notice of the facts. This is not saying that the defendant bank, by taking an assignment of the land contract, bound itself to perform the agreement to convey, or that plaintiff could maintain an affirmative action against it for specific performance of such contract. It is enough to say, in this respect, that by taking an assignment of the contract, thereby acquiring the land company's vendor's lien, it became charged with knowledge of the plaintiff's rights, and took upon itself the risk of the consequences which might follow if its assignor failed to convey the title, if it had any. True, plaintiff could also have sought such relief when his notes became due, but he has an equal right, having tendered performance on his part, to assume a purely defensive attitude. This he has done, and we find nothing in the record indicating any waiver of such right. The authorities cited by appellee are almost entirely of the class of McNight v. Parsons, 136 Iowa, 392, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 718, 125 Am. St. Rep. 265, 113 N. W. 858, 15 Ann. Cas. 665, to the effect that mere knowledge by an indorsee of a negotiable note that it was given in consideration of an executory contract of some kind is not sufficient to deprive him of the character of a bona fide holder; but, as we have tried to show, this proposition is not at all inconsistent with the view we have expressed of the effect of the knowledge by the indorsee that the note is but one of two mutual and dependent agreements between the maker and the payee, neither of which may be enforced without performance of the other.

There was no apparent lack of diligence on the part of plaintiff. It is shown that on that day when the note matured plaintiff with his counsel went to the defendant bank, and, having tendered full payment, asked that title to the land for which the notes were given be converted to him. The bank not being able to comply with this demand, the tender was deposited, as we have already seen, and on the following day plaintiff appeared with his counsel at the office of the land company, and there demanded a conveyance in accordance with the contract, and the company was unable to comply. Foreclosure proceedings, by which the company lost what title it had, were begun in Texas within a few days thereafter. Though disputed, a preponderance of the evidence is to the effect that, at the time the tender was made, the bank by its officers admitted plaintiff's right to demand conveyance before parting with his money; but such admission, if made, has little, if any, material effect upon the rights involved in this action, such rights depending, in our judgment, upon the effect of the contract between plaintiff and the land company and the mutual and dependent conditions thereof, with knowledge of which the defendants received the notes.

We regard it clear that the fact that when the notes were received by the bank the conveyance to the plaintiff by the land company was not yet due does not avoid the effect of the rule we have just stated. If this were a case of mere failure of consideration, arising from the failure of the payee to perform a collateral independent contract, there would be reason for the other conclusion; but in cases of mutual dependent agreements each party secures himself against loss from failure on part of the other, by a contract which requires reciprocal and simultaneous performance by both. This agreement qualifies and conditions the liability of the parties, and that condition inheres in and qualifies the obligation of each from the inception of the contract relation, and he who acquires a promissory note having such origin, with knowledge of the fact, takes it subject to the conditions upon which it was given. In the language of the Michigan case last cited: "It has been well settled in this case and elsewhere that several instruments made at one and the same time, and having relation to the same subject-matter, must be taken to be parts of one transaction and construed together for the purpose of showing the true contract between the parties. . . . If the plaintiff had been a good-faith holder of the note, with no knowledge of the bond, he would have been entitled to recover, because of the negotiable form of the note. But if he purchased the note before due, and before the time of performance stated in the bond with the agreement attached to it and forming a part of the contract, he would be obliged, under the law, to take the note as qualified and controlled by the bond or agreement. And if he saw the bond before he purchased the note, and was acquainted with its relation to the note, he must be considered as bound by it the same as if it had been attached to the note or written upon the same piece of paper."

Sherwood*, 165 Cal. 1, 130 Pac. 883; Consterdine v. Moore, 65 Neb. 291, 101 Am. St. Rep. 620, 91 N. W. 299, 96 N. W. 1021; Garnett v. Meyers, 65 Neb. 280, 91 N. W. 400, 94 N. W. 803; Zebbley v. Sears, 38 Iowa, 507.

There is still another angle from which this feature of the case may be considered. Defendant, as assignee of the contract, acquired the vendor's lien held by the land company to secure these notes. Let us suppose that, instead of seeking to recover in some other form of action, it had brought suit upon the contract alone or upon the contract together with the notes, and plaintiff had appeared thereto, pleading his tender of performance and the failure of both the defendant and the land company to perform the agreement to convey; could the bank in such proceeding have successfully relied on its claim, being an innocent holder of either the note or contract? If not, can it, by ignoring the contract in its own hands, escape its effect by suing upon the notes alone? We think not.

II. Neither can we find anything in the record on which the defendant can base a plea of estoppel. If plaintiff declined to act upon defendant's advice to pay the notes, and to give new notes direct to the bank, and take his chances of compelling the land company to give him title to the land, he was, as we have before said, entirely within his rights. He would properly plant himself upon the terms of his contract, and, so far as we are able to discover, he complied literally with the obligation he had therein assumed. The situation affords no opportunity for the application of the rule that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer, the loss must be borne by the one by whose negligence it happened. As between the one party to mutual and dependent agreements who promptly tenders full performance on his part, and the other party who fails or refuses to perform, there is no equality of legal or equitable merits, nor does the indorsee or assignee of the party in default, with notice of the character of the contract, stand in any more favorable position than his indorser or assignor.

III. Appellant argues the question whether the circumstances in this case are not such as to cast upon the defendant the burden of proof that it is a purchaser of the notes in suit in good faith, for value, and in the due course of business. The point thus made is, in substance, that, the land company having entered into this contract with the agreement that upon payment of the notes it would convey a good title, it could not, without breach of faith, put the note upon the market and expose plaintiff to the liability to pay them to innocent holders, while such company did not have the title which it agreed to convey, and was not in position or able to perform such agreement.

As we have reached the conclusion that the record sufficiently and affirmatively shows the defendant to be a holder of the paper with notice, it is unnecessary to extend this opinion for the consideration of the proposition so made. That the negotiation of a note for the purpose of depriving a maker of the benefit of a good defense, or the putting in circulation of a note without being accompanied by a contemporaneous agreement affecting the maker's liability on such paper, may be a fraud, has been often held, but whether the facts of this case bring it within the rule is a question which, for the reasons stated, we do not determine.

For like reasons, we pass without consideration the question whether the writ of attachment sued out by the defendant was wrongful.

IV. This case as originally brought was entitled as a suit in equity. The answer and cross petition or counterclaim were entitled in like manner. In each pleading the parties ask for general equitable relief. The issues were tried to the court as in equity without objection on either side. In this court the appellee raises the question that the issues were in fact not of an equitable nature, and asks to have the finding below treated as the verdict of a jury. It has been decided too often to be longer an open question that, where a case is brought and tried as a suit in equity without any objection thereto in the lower court, such objection will not be considered by this court upon appeal. Gate City Land Co. v. Heilman, 80 Iowa, 477, 45 N. W. 760; Lough v. Estherville, 122 Iowa, 479, 98 N. W. 308; Des Moines Sav. Bank v. Morgan Jewelry Co. 123 Iowa, 432, 99 N. W. 121; Blondel v. Ohlman, 132 Iowa, 257, 109 N. W. 806; Niemand v. Seemann, 136 Iowa, 713, 114 N. W. 48; Reiger v. Turley, 151 Iowa, 491, 131 N. W. 866. It is not, as counsel seem to think, a question of jurisdiction which may be raised at any time. The case was brought in the district court, and the district court had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter; whether it be triable to the court as in equity, or to a jury as at law, is merely a question as to the manner of trial and the relief which may be administered. If either party thinks that the case should be docketed for trial in equity instead of at law, or vice versa, it is his privilege to move for such order. Failing so to do, exception thereto taken on appeal is entitled to consideration. The case must be treated as one in equity, and the trial here is de novo.

It follows that the decree of the District Court must be reversed, the defendant's counterclaim dismissed, and that plaintiff have judgment as prayed in his petition. The cause will be remanded to the District Court for the entry of judgment as herein directed.

Gaynor, Ch. J., and Ladd, Evans, Preston, and Stevens, JJ., concur.

Salinger, J., dissenting:

The sole question is whether the majority is justified in holding that the facts here create an exception to a confessed rule. Hundreds of cases have built up the rule.

In McNight v. Parsons, 136 Iowa, at page 392, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 718, 125 Am. St. Rep. 265 (113 N. W. 860, 15 Ann. Cas. 665), that rule is stated as follows: "The courts quite universally hold that knowledge that a note was given in consideration of the executory agreement or contract of the payee, which has not been performed, will not deprive the indorsee of the character of a bona fide holder, unless he also has notice of the breach of that agreement or contract."

The collateral agreement in the case was a warranty of the animal for the purchase price of which the note was given, and further agreement by the seller that he would retain possession of the animal for several months and do certain things to enhance its value. The agreement, the sale, and the giving of the note were all parts of the same transaction.

In Jennings v. Todd, 118 Mo. 296, 40 Am. St. Rep. 373, 24 S. W. 148, all the papers were made at the same time and related to the same transaction. The collateral agreement was that the payee was to do certain things, and that the note should not be paid if it failed to fulfil any part of this agreement. Against defense to the note, the court said: "We think, however, that no well-considered case can be found in which a collateral, contemporaneous agreement, providing that the note should not be paid in the event that an executory contract, which was the consideration of the note, should not be performed, has been allowed to defeat the negotiability of the note in the hands of an indorsee, though he had notice of such agreement."

In view of these, it will suffice to cite but a few of the great number of cases affirming this rule. See Kinkel v. Harper, 7 Colo. App. 45, 42 Pac. 173; Davis v. McCready, 17 N. Y. 230, 72 Am. Dec. 461; First Nat. Bank v. Michael, 96 N. C. 53, 1 S. E. 855; Moyses v. Bell, 62 Wash. 534, 114 Pac. 194; Hakes v. Thayer, 165 Mich. 476, 131 N. W. 174; Houston v. Keith, 100 Miss. 83, 56 So. 336; Merchants' & P. Bank v. Penland, 101 Tenn. 445, 47 S. W. 693.

The contract upon the execution of which the notes in dispute were given recites that in consideration of the payment of said notes the vendor agrees to convey certain lands in fee simple, free and clear of all encumbrances; that when all the notes have been fully paid a warranty deed shall be made and an abstract furnished, showing title free and clear from all encumbrances in the vendor; and that all money paid under the contract is to be returned if warranty deed and abstract are not furnished as provided in the contract. As I experience much difficulty in understanding what there is about this transaction and collateral agreement to justify the majority in making an exception of this case, I shall attempt to clarify myself by elimination, by pointing out in what respects the situation here does not work an exception. The rule applies to nothing but considerations formed by an executory agreement. Can it be said that the contract here is not an executory agreement? It is so manifest that it is a promise not yet performed as that I shall assume the majority does not ground its opinion upon the claim that the agreement is not executory. Can it be the majority thinks the general rule does not apply because the promise is one to convey land? I can scarcely believe so, because the books are full of cases where the buyer of the note was protected, though the consideration was just such a promise. American Funding Corp. v. Pennington, 107 Miss. 10, 64 So. 845; United States Nat. Bank v. Floss, 38 Or. 68, 84 Am. St. Rep. 752, 62 Pac. 751; Merchants' & P. Bank v. Penland, supra. Is its reason that the contract and the notes here were contemporaneously made and are part of the same transaction? I can hardly think that either, because that was the situation in McNight v. Parsons and in Jennings v. Todd, supra, and, for that matter, in practically all the cases wherein the rule was applied. Is it thought that here is an exception because the payee promised to give perfect title as soon as all the notes were paid, and expressly stated what the law implies—that he would convey when all the notes were paid, or repay all the buyer had paid if there was a failure to give such title after the notes were paid? Concede, if you please, that this in a sense makes an interdependent contract, and involves reciprocal promises, and still the case remains within the rule. Call the transaction what you will, still the voice of authority says such interdependence and such reciprocal promises as are found here do not affect the buyer of the notes. These reciprocal promises create an adequate consideration, but have no other effect except to assure the buyer of the note that he is to be paid by the maker, whether the promise to the maker be or be not kept. It absolves him from inquiry whether the payee of the note will perform his contract, and he may assume that he will. Houston v. Keith, 100 Miss. 83, 56 So. 336; Hakes v. Thayer, 165 Mich. 476, 131 N. W. 174; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 300. By selling the note the maker declares he will pay it to the indorsee, though the consideration should fail as to the payee. Siegel's Case, 131 Ill. 570, 7 L.R.A. 537, 19 Am. St. Rep. 51, 23 N. E. 417; Jennings v. Todd, supra. In Whitehead v. Purdy, 172 Mich. 31, 137 N. W. 684, there were reciprocal promises, and there was an express agreement that, if the promise was not kept, the maker of the note should be reimbursed in full. The note was sold to one who had full knowledge of this agreement. At the time of the sale it was impossible to determine whether the contract of the payee could be performed as was agreed. But a verdict for plaintiff was directed because the case presented no more than that the makers of the note were willing to give it to secure what the payee promises in reliance upon the agreement to indemnify and reimburse them for what they had paid on their note if the collateral agreement was not kept. And see Kinkel v. Harper, supra; Saddler v. White, 14 La. Ann. 173. The rule was applied in Davis v. McCready, 17 N. Y. 230, 72 Am. Dec. 461, where it is expressly found that no exception is worked because the consideration is "founded upon reciprocal promises of the parties." And in United States Nat. Bank v. Floss, 38 Or. 68, 84 Am. St. Rep. 752, 62 Pac. 751, the payee stipulated just as here, to wit, that upon payment of the note at maturity he would convey to the maker by good and sufficient warranty deed. In Jennings v. Todd, supra, the note collected by the buyer itself recited it should not be paid if the payee did not fulfil every requirement of the collateral contract.

To the difference between these notes and what the law terms a conditional note I shall address myself later. All that it is necessary to say at this point is that the reciprocal nature of the engagements can have no effect here. The maker was bound to pay all the notes before he was entitled to a conveyance. Although upon payment he was thus entitled, he could not defend against either note, because no conveyance had been made, for the self-evident reason that no matter how reciprocal the promises were, as payment must precede conveyance, failure to convey was no reason for not paying.

Such agreements create a condition subsequent which cannot affect the buyer of the note. By making a negotiable note the maker says, in effect: If anyone shall buy this note, let him be advised that I have confidence the payee will perform the agreement for which I gave the note. If he shall fail, I will obtain redress for the breach of contract. Siegel's Case, supra.

It is said in Jennings v. Todd, supra: "In purchasing such note no inquiry as to the consideration is required. If a failure of consideration occur, the maker must look to the payee for indemnity."

And in Saddler v. White, supra: "Anyone having sufficient confidence in another to give his written obligation for something to be given or enjoyed thereafter is at liberty to do so, and the maker cannot censure any future holder . . . for having purchased it, and for seeking to hold him liable, for it was the faith of the maker in the payee, that he would execute his promise and allow no obstacles to defeat it, that created the note and gave currency to it."

Can it be a difference is found because the buyer of the notes here was advised by inspection of the contract itself that it was what it was? Can it make a difference how such knowledge is acquired? It seems to me the rule must be the same, whether the buyer is advised of the existence of the executory contract by statement on part of those who profess to know the fact, or gets his information by reading the contract itself. In both cases nothing is accomplished except that the buyer has notice of the agreement. If this self-evident proposition is not to be agreed to, unless supported by authority, that is not lacking. The purchaser of the note has been protected where the note itself advised him that its consideration was an executory contract. Houston v. Keith, supra; Moyses v. Bell, 62 Wash. 534, 114 Pac. 193; Henneberry v. Morse, 56 Ill. 394. In Jennings v. Todd, 118 Mo. 296, 40 Am. St. Rep. 373, 24 S. W. 148, the note itself recited that it should not be paid if the payee did not fulfil every requirement of the collateral contract. The purchaser has had the benefit of the rule where he saw a recital in the bond itself of what consideration it was given for. First Nat. Bank v. Michael, 96 N. C. 53, 1 S. E. 855. And it is said in Siegel's Case, 131 Ill. 570, 7 L.R.A. 537, 19 Am. St. Rep. 51, 23 N. E. 417, citing Henneberry v. Morse, 56 Ill. 394: "The most that can be said of a recital in the instrument itself, of the consideration upon which it rests, is that the indorsee, taking it before maturity, is chargeable with notice of the recital."

And see cases in notes to Kimpton v. Studebaker, 125 Am. St. Rep. 185, 14 Ann. Cas. 1126.

Every factor thus far considered was present in the cases wherein knowledge that the note had for its consideration an executory contract was not allowed to defeat the collection of the note. But in many of these cases one factor was absent that is present here, and that is that the buyer of the note took an indorsement of the note, and also took an assignment of the contract itself as further security. Now, in the first place, taking possession of the contract added nothing to notice. So far as the general rule is concerned, the buyer of the notes was as much affected by obtaining hearsay knowledge that the executory contract existed as he would be by seeing it in the contract of which he took possession. The majority refers to some cases to the effect that when a note and mortgage are made contemporaneously the two must be construed together, and that in jurisdictions where a note secured by mortgage is non-negotiable the buyer of the note is affected by conditions in the mortgage which limit the obligation of the note, and that, even though the note be negotiable, such conditions in the mortgage may be used in defending against the note, if the buyer had knowledge of the provisions of the mortgage. See Briggs v. Crawford, 162 Cal. 124, 121 Pac. 381; National Hardware Co. v. Sherwood, 165 Cal. 1, 130 Pac. 881; Garnett v. Meyers, 65 Neb. 280, 91 N. W. 400, 94 N. W. 803; Consterdine v. Moore, 65 Neb. 291, 101 Am. St. Rep. 620, 91 N. W. 399, 96 N. W. 1021; Brooke v. Struthers, 110 Mich. 562, 35 L.R.A. 536, 68 N. W. 272; Jacobs v. Mitchell, 46 Ohio St. 601, 22 N. E. 768. I concede their holdings, but challenge their applicability here. I am in no doubt that one who buys a contract and assumes to become a party to it is bound to perform it, and if failure to perform causes a loss to the other party, he may offset that loss when the buyer of the contract sues upon the note which he has bought, though he also bought the contract, which is the consideration for such note. The trouble lies with the premise. The buyer of the notes here did not buy the contract. He did not agree to become a party to it. He did not assume any of its obligations. He took it purely as an additional security. Such taking does not change the rights the rule gives him. See Moyes v. Bell, 62 Wash. 534, 114 Pac. 193; Kinkel v. Harper, 7 Colo. App. 45, 42 Pac. 173. As well say that if a bank takes a bond as a collateral to the note of a borrower, and has it indorsed for that purpose, it becomes obliged to pay the bond if the maker fails to do so. Taking an indorsement of the note gave the buyer the right to collect from the maker, and, in certain contingencies, from the indorser. When it took an assignment of the contract, it merely obtained a further security, consisting of a species of lien upon the interest both parties to the contract had in the land covered by the contract. Instead of becoming bound by the agreement to convey good title to land, the transfer of the contract worked merely that, if the buyer of the notes has need to resort to the land, he might resort to it, that in such event he would make any deficiency out of the land if the land was worth it, and the title of either party to the contract was good, and if there was no deficiency, or if it could not be made out of the land, the assignment of the contract would prove to be no additional security. It was never before held, and, unless it be done here, in my opinion never will be held, that the general rule which protects the buyer of the note, though he knew its consideration was an executory contract, is abrogated because the buyer takes security additional to what the mere signing and indorsing of the note gave him.

I have no complaint to make of the pronouncement of the majority that, where a note is conditional, whosoever buys it with knowledge of the condition is bound by that knowledge, unless that this is so is to be an argument for holding that the notes in suit here are conditional notes within the meaning of that rule. There is nothing in Thomas v. Page, 3 McLean, 167, Fed. Cas. No. 13,906, and Sutton v. Beckwith, 68 Mich. 303, 13 Am. St. Rep. 344, 36 N. W. 79, the only cases cited in the opinion for this point, which in the least attempts to destroy the general rule by holding that the notes here are conditional ones. They are conditional only in the sense that paying them is not the end, and that if, after payment is made, the contract is breached, the money paid may be recovered back. If that makes the notes conditional in such sense as that knowledge that the consideration is an executory contract affects the buyer, then there never was any substance to the confessed general rule. Every note upheld under that rule was in that sense conditional. I have called attention to a number of cases wherein collection was enforced, though the very note stated that payment was to be made if the payee did certain things. See Seigel, C. & Co. v. Chicago Trust & Sav. Bank, 131 Ill. 570, 7 L.R.A. 537, 19 Am. St. Rep. 51, 23 N. E. 417; State Nat. Bank v. Cason, 39 La. Ann. 865, 2 So. 881; McCarty v. Howell, 24 Ill. 341; First Nat. Bank v. Michael, 96 N. C. 53, 1 S. E. 855; Davis v. McCready, 17 N. Y. 230, 72 Am. Dec. 461; Kinkel v. Harper and Moyses v. Bell, supra. A conditional note which one having knowledge of the condition cannot enforce is one wherein the condition makes it uncertain whether the note can ever be collected, or when the obligation to pay it will mature. Here, there is no uncertainty in either respect. The only uncertainty is whether, after they are paid on the day they come due, the original payee will not create a right to reimburse the maker for what he has paid.

The transaction at bar is not against public policy. Whitehead v. Purdy, 172 Mich. 31, 137 N. W. 684. The enforcement of the rule is a salutary help to the transaction of business. Jennings v. Todd, 118 Mo. 296, 40 Am. St. Rep. 373, 24 S. W. 148. That is why the "Bohemian Oats" Cases are not in point. In Merrill v. Hole, 85 Iowa, at pages 71, 72, 52 N. W. 5, it was complained that the court should have met a claim that mere notice of what the consideration was would not defeat an innocent buyer, and the answer was: "There is no claim that mere notice that the consideration was the sale of oats and a bond would be notice of want or failure of consideration, but it is that notice of that kind of sale and bond would be, because of their being illegal and void."

In other words, when a buyer knows that the note he buys rests upon an illegal consideration, he is not an innocent purchaser. It is all met by the elementary proposition that interchanges of agreements are nothing illegal, and, on the contrary, are a valid agreement and consideration. The contract involved in this case is not "this kind of sale and bond." It is one which the authorities have always held not to affect the buyer. And it is said in Hakes v. Thayer, 165 Mich. 476, 131 N. W. 174, distinguishing Bohemian Oats Cases, that as to a contract which is lawful the buyer of the note need not inquire "whether the seller has performed his agreement, or will be able to perform."

As to numerous cases cited by the majority in support of the fact that the notes and contract were mutual and dependent agreements, that it was the intent that performance of both should be simultaneous, that as between buyer and seller the two things are interdependent, and that the buyer need not pay unless the seller conveys, I submit that any reliance upon these begs the whole question, by assuming, against the conceded general rule, that, because these things are so between the original parties therefore they control the rights of one who buys the notes.

As to the argument that the buyer of the note would have been subject to the conditions of the contract if the note and the contract had been one piece of paper, and that paper had been indorsed, answer is that the papers are not in that condition, and consequently were not indorsed while in that form. Another answer is that in the supposed case the buyer would not be subjected to defenses because he had knowledge that the obligation rested upon an executory agreement, and such agreement was breached by the payee of the notes, but because what he bought was non-negotiable, which, as a very necessary consequence and of itself, alone explains why in the supposed case the buyer would not have the status that I think he should have in this case.

It seems to me that here is another instance of asserting a non-existent distinction for the purpose of abrogating a rule, while ostensibly affirming the rule that nothing takes this case out of the confessed rule, and I would affirm.

If Zebley v. Sears, 38 Iowa, 507, is opposed, and I do not think it is, it should be overruled, and the Mc-Night Case does in effect overrule it.

A motion to amend order of remand having been sustained, the following Per Curiam response was handed down, June 27, 1918 (— Iowa —, 168 N. W. 113):

The appellant's motion to amend order remanding the case to the trial court, with direction to enter judgment for the plaintiff, is sustained, in part, as follows:

Said order to enter judgment as the same appears in the final clause of the opinion as heretofore filed and as published in — Iowa, —, ante, 971, 165 N. W. 599, is withdrawn, and the following is substituted therefor:

The decree of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction for the entry of judgment in plaintiff's favor for the recovery of the amount of his deposit in the defendant bank, subject only to the following condition, relating to the amount thereby and to the counterclaim pleaded by said defendant. It being claimed by the defendant in argument that plaintiff has acquired from another source title to the land for which the promissory notes set up in the counterclaim were given, and that he has acquired such title at a cost or expense materially less than the price of said land as fixed by the contract of purchase with the American & Canadian Land Company, which contract, together with said notes, was assigned to the plaintiff; and it being further claimed that, by reason of his acquirement of the outstanding title at a reduced price, plaintiff's loss or damage because of the failure of title in said American & Canadian Land Company has been lessened in like proportion, and that his recovery should not exceed the amount of such actual damage; and the record before this court not clearly or satisfactorily showing the truth as to the facts so asserted, it is therefore ordered that upon the remand of this cause the trial court shall proceed to ascertain and determine the facts with reference to said claim, and if it be found that plaintiff has acquired such title, and that the cost or expense of procuring the same, together with the amount of the payments, if any, made to said American & Canadian Land Company or its assignee before this suit was brought, is less than the price agreed to be paid to said company, then the difference so ascertained shall be treated and applied as a credit in favor of the defendant bank, and plaintiff's recovery upon his deposit account shall be reduced by the amount of such credit. If, however, such alleged credit is not established on the hearing, then judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff for the amount of his deposit without deduction. At the hearing upon said question of fact the parties, if so advised, may offer additional relevant testimony, but such hearing and testimony shall be confined and limited to the single question herein indicated.

ANNOTATION.

Bona fides of purchaser of note on an executory consideration, performance of which is a condition precedent.

It is a well-settled rule that knowledge by the purchaser of a bill or note that the consideration therefor was an executory contract does not prevent him from becoming a bona fide holder thereof unless there has been a breach of the contract to the knowledge of such purchaser.

One who purchases for value from a vendor the obligation of his vendee, and obtains the latter's promissory note payable to himself as evidence of such obligation, with full knowledge that it represents the final payment on the purchase price of land which he knows the vendor has conveyed with covenants of warranty and against encumbrances, that he knows were broken when made, takes the note subject to the right of the maker to reduce the amount of recovery thereon by the amount of the damages sustained by reason of the partial failure of consideration, brought about by the defects in the title. Williams v. Neely (1904) 69 L.R.A. 232, 67 C. C. A. 171, 134 Fed. 1.

The holding that the purchaser of a note, given in one of the so-called Bohemian oats transactions, or a transaction of similar kind, is, because of knowledge of this fact, precluded from becoming a bona fide holder, is not usually regarded as contrary to the above doctrine; for, as stated in Hakes v. Thayer (1911) 165 Mich. 476, 131 N. W. 174, "knowledge of those contracts or bonds was knowledge of fraud, and of contracts made in violation of law, and against public policy." Johnson v. First Nat. Bank (1887) 24 Ill. App. 352; Merrill v. Hole (1892) 85 Iowa, 66, 52 N. W. 4; Griffith v. Shipley (1891) 74 Md. 591, 14 L.R.A. 405, 22 Atl. 1107; Sutton v. Beckwith (1888) 68 Mich. 303, 13 Am. St. Rep. 344, 36 N. W. 79; Mace v. Kennedy (1888) 68 Mich. 389, 36 N. W. 187; McNamara v. Gargett (1888) 68 Mich. 454, 13 Am. St. Rep. 355, 36 N. W. 218; Davis v. Seeley (1888) 71 Mich. 209, 30 N. W. 901; Ward v. Doane (1889) 77 Mich. 328, 43 N. W. 980; Fink v. Chambers (1893) 95 Mich. 508, 55 N. W. 375; Hakes v. Thayer (1911) 165 Mich. 476, 131 N. W. 174; Watson v. Blossom (1888) 18 N. Y. S. R. 726, 4 N. Y. Supp. 489; Farthing v. Dark (1891) 109 N. C. 291, 13 S. E. 918.

The court in TODD v. STATE BANK (reported herewith) ante, 971, admits the general rule, but holds it inapplicable where "the performance of an executory agreement is a condition precedent to the right of the payee to demand or recover payment." There can be no question about the correctness of the court's conclusion if the performance of the executory agreement is a condition precedent to the right of the payee to recover on the note, and this is brought to the knowledge of the indorsee before he acquires the note. The question arises over the correctness of holding that under the contract in question the performance of the executory agreement was a condition precedent to the maker's liability on the note. Where the contract provides for performance by the payee upon the payment of the note, or at the maturity of the note, there is reason in holding that—at least, as against the payee—payment of the note cannot be enforced unless the payee is ready to comply with his agreement. And the holding of the court in the reported case (TODD v. STATE BANK), that this defense is good as against an indorsee with notice, finds support in the earlier Iowa case of Zebley v. Sears (1874) 38 Iowa, 507, where the purchaser of a note, given as the last payment for land purchased by the maker from the payee, who knew that the payee had entered into a written contract to execute a deed to the maker for the land upon the payment of the note, and that the payee was a married man at the time of making such contract to convey, and that his wife had not joined him in such contract and was then living, was held not to occupy the position of a bona fide holder, because of the knowledge of such fact. The court states that the indorsee of the note with full knowledge of the facts out of which this equity of the maker arises can occupy no better position than the payee thereof. It is also stated by the court to be settled by the decisions of the Iowa court that where a promissory note "is executed for the whole or a part of the purchase price of land, which is to be conveyed upon payment of such note, the acts are so far dependent that the grantor cannot recover in an action on the note, without showing a performance on his part by the tender of a deed, or an offer to convey upon payment."

The purchaser of notes given by the vendee of land, and expressed on their face to be in payment "on the . . . tract of land," is put on inquiry and fixed with notice of the terms of the contract, and where this provides that the vendor shall make title to the land upon the payment of the purchase money, the right to collect the note is defeated by failure of the payee's title. Howard v. Kimball (1871) 65 N. C. 175, 6 Am. Rep. 739. The court states that although notice that the notes were given as the consideration for the land sold does not amount to notice of a defect in the vendor's title, it does amount to notice of the vendee's equity, provided it turns out that the title is defective. But this case has been disapproved in Bank of Sampson v. Hatcher (1909) 151 N. C. 359, 184 Am. St. Rep. 989, 66 S. E. 308, where the court states that: "An examination into the facts of that case will disclose that the assignee of a note which expressed upon its face that it was given as purchase money of a certain tract of land not only had actual notice of the defect of title at the time he purchased, but he had taken a deed for such defective title from the original vendor, and held same, to be conveyed to the vendee when the note was paid. The case, therefore, is undoubtedly well decided; but, in so far as the opinion gives countenance to the position that a defect of title is available against an indorsee for value of a note for the purchase money, from the fact, and from that alone, that the note on its face is expressed to be for the purchase money of land, or a given tract of land, the case is not in accord with the better-considered decisions. As an authority for such a position, it was in effect disapproved by a subsequent decision of this court, in First Nat. Bank v. Michael (1887) 96 N. C. 53, 1 S. E. 855, in which a note of that kind was held to be 'negotiable;' the term 'negotiable' being used in the sense that an indorsee for value without notice, ultra, became the owner of the note, unaffected by the equities and defenses existent between the original parties to the contract." The cases in which the general rule has been applied have not given much consideration to the effect upon the rule of the relative time of performance by the parties. In Jennings v. Todd (1893) 118 Mo. 296, 40 Am. St. Rep. 878, 24 S. W. 148, a collateral contemporaneous agreement, providing that the note should not be paid in the event that the executory contract, which was the consideration of the note, should not be performed, is held not to prevent an indorsee from becoming a bona fide holder, although he had notice of such agreement, the court stating that in purchasing such a note no inquiry as to the consideration is required; that if a failure of consideration occurs, the maker must look to the payee for indemnity.

Where a note is due before performance of his executory contract by the payee is due, it is not clear how even the maker can defend an action on the note at its maturity, at least, not unless it could be shown that it would be beyond the power of the payee to perform when his performance was due. In Siegel, C. & Co. v. Chicago Trust & Sav. Bank (1890) 131 Ill. 569,

7 L.R.A. 537, 19 Am. St. Rep. 51, 23 N. E. 417, the court was dealing with a case in which the note matured before performance by the payee was due, and it is stated: "Here, the money was payable, absolutely, on the 1st day of July, 1887,—a time when the contract for the advertising could not have been completed. If the instrument had remained the property of the payee, and upon its maturity and performance to that time, suit had been brought, it is clear that no plea of partial failure of consideration could have been sustained, for the reason that the entire term had not then expired. No analysis of the instrument itself is necessary. The most careful examination of it will fail to disclose a condition precedent to the payment of the money at the time stipulated. Nor is there anything in the recital of the consideration to put the indorsee upon inquiry at the time the indorsement was made. Indeed, it is clear that at that time no inquiry would have led to notice that Dalziel would fail to comply with his contract on the 15th of May thereafter, when the term was to commence. All that the recitals would give notice of was that the note was given in consideration of an agreement on the part of the payee that the privilege of an advertisement named should be enjoyed by the makers for three months, from May 15, 1887. Giving to the language employed its broadest possible meaning, it cannot be construed as notice to the indorsee of the future breach of the contract by Dalziel. The presumption of law would be that the contract would be carried out in good faith and the consideration performed as stipulated. The makers had put their promissory note into the hands of Dalziel upon an expressed consideration, which they were thereafter to receive, and for the performance of which they had seen fit to rely upon the undertaking of Dalziel, and we are aware of no rule by which they can hold this indorsee for value, before due and before the time of performance was to begin, chargeable with notice that the promise upon which the makers relied would not be kept and performed." v.

CLARENCE THOMPSON, Appt.

(205 Mich. 124, 171 N. W. 347.)

Divorce — subjecting wife to abuse of mother-in-law.

1. A man's insistence that his wife live in his mother's home where she is subjected to abuse, and is the recipient of vile epithets from his mother, is extreme cruelty, entitling her to a divorce, although the mother's home is the only available place within 2 miles of his work and living at that distance from his work would make its successful prosecution impossible.

[See note on this question beginning on page 993.]

— cruelty — failure to provide proper home.

2. Ordinarily the refusal or inability of a man to provide a home for his wife commensurate with her ideas of comfort and luxury is not extreme cruelty which will entitle her to a divorce. [See 9 R. C. L. 349.]

— alimony — amount.

3. An allowance of $900 as permanent alimony to a wife who had no share in accumulating her husband's property and had lived with him but a few months is too high, when his property consists of an interest in a heavily mortgaged farm which, according to the highest estimate, amounts to only $2,700.

[See 1 R. C. L. 929 et seq.]

— provision for child — discretion to enlarge.

4. A provision in a divorce suit for support of a child may be enlarged in the discretion of the court as circumstances alter.

[See 9 R. C. L. 484.]

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Hillsdale County, in Chancery, (Chester, J.) in favor of plaintiff in a suit for a divorce. Modified and affirmed.

Statement by Brooke, J.:

Plaintiff and defendant at the time of their marriage on December 8, 1915, were each about twenty-three years of age. Plaintiff is the daughter of a farmer, and defendant is a farmer, their respective places being about 2 miles distant from each other. Defendant's father is dead, and defendant, together with one of his brothers, purchased from the administrator of his father's estate a 100-acre farm upon which his brother lived. Defendant at the time of the marriage lived with his mother in a house belonging to her near the farm he owned jointly with his brother. It is in evidence that the parties had known each other for some five years prior to the marriage, and had been engaged to be married for upwards of one year. A child was born to the union on January 26, 1916. The record shows that the marriage had been set for a date nearly a year before it actually took place, but because of some differences which arose was not then consummated. Some time after the date first set for the marriage the parties became sexually intimate, and as a result the plaintiff became enceinte. Plaintiff's condition becoming apparent to her father, he interviewed defendant, and urged him to make such tardy reparation as was possible to his daughter through a belated marriage. After two or three interviews the father's importunity bore fruit, and the parties were married on the date above specified. They spent the night of their wedding day with plaintiff's parents, and on the next day defendant took plaintiff to the home of his mother.

A perusal of this record convinces us that the treatment accorded the plaintiff by defendant's mother was abusive and contumelious in the highest degree. In effect, defendant's mother charged plaintiff with being a prostitute, ordered her from her home, and asserted that no Stiverson (that being plaintiff's maiden name) should ever enter her house. After a three days' sojourn plaintiff's position in the household of her husband's mother became so intolerable that she insisted upon returning to the home of her parents, where she remained a few days. On two other occasions between the date of the marriage and the birth of her child, plaintiff, at the solicitation of her husband, went to live in his mother's house, but was accorded no better treatment than upon the first attempt. She lived with her husband in his mother's house for about a week prior to the birth of her baby, during a time when the mother was absent, with fair tranquillity. Being advised of the imminent approach of maternity, the husband, at her request, took her to her mother's home on the morning of January 22d, where the baby was born two or three hours later. Thereafter, during her confinement in bed as the result of parturition, defendant visited her nearly every evening. It is in evidence that the husband insisted that she should return with him to his mother's home, but after the treatment she had received the wife steadily refused to accede to his demands, and urged him to secure a home apart from that of his mother. Shortly after plaintiff was able to be about, her mother told defendant that if he could not take proper care of her daughter she did not desire to have him come to see her. "I told him we had one young one by him, and we didn't want another one." Thereafter, and for a period of approximately two months, defendant absented himself entirely from his wife and child; made no effort to see them, to provide them with the necessaries of life, or to arrange a home for them apart from that of his mother. Plaintiff's bill was filed on March 24th. Immediately upon service of the process upon him defendant sought a conference with plaintiff and tried to induce her to return to him, stating that he had a paper from his mother to the effect that if he and his wife could not get along together she, the mother, would leave. Plaintiff refused to undertake a further experiment in the desired direction, and the case proceeded to a hearing in open court, after which a decree of divorce was granted plaintiff with permanent alimony in the sum of $900, the custody of the infant child, and the sum of $2.50 per week for the support of the child. Defendant has appealed, and in this court urges that the court below was in error: First, in granting a decree upon the ground of extreme cruelty; and, second, in fixing the amount of permanent alimony at so high a figure.

Messrs. Paul W. Chase and Merton Fitzpatrick for appellants.

Mr. B. D. Chandler for appellee.

Brooke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is impossible to define with accuracy the exact meaning of the term, "extreme cruelty," as used in the statute which provides for divorce upon that, among other grounds. We have, however, held that when a husband imputes a lack of chastity to his wife, she being a woman of character, education, and refinement, a case for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty is made out. In the case at bar the evidence shows that the defendant husband, aside from his insistence that his wife should live with him in the home of his mother and there be subjected to attacks of the most bitter and abusive character from his mother, treated his wife, the plaintiff, with uniform kindness. Plaintiff's position in the house of her husband's mother was one of extreme delicacy. Her earlier indiscretion had rendered her peculiarly vulnerable to attack. Ordinarily it is the duty of the wife to follow the husband to such a home as he may choose or may be able reasonably to provide, and his refusal or inability to provide a home commensurate with the ideas of comfort and luxury entertained by his wife is not "extreme cruelty," and constitutes no ground for divorce.

Divorce—
cruelty—
failure to provide proper home.

It is in evidence that there was no vacant house available for defendant's use within 2 miles of the farm where he worked, and that it was impossible for him to carry on his work successfully from such a distance, and it is urged in his behalf that his failure to comply with plaintiff's demands should not be taken as evidence of his lack of interest in her welfare, and much less should it be construed as such an act of extreme cruelty as would warrant a decree of divorce. The case is one of peculiar hardship. Defendant's mother, though in the court room during the hearing, did not take the stand to deny the accusations made against her by plaintiff. The learned circuit judge who saw and heard the witnesses readily granted the relief prayed. We have concluded, though with some hesitation, not to disturb the decree in this regard.

—subjecting wife to abuse of mother-in-law.

The court found defendant's net worth to be approximately the sum of $2,700, and awarded the plaintiff $900 as permanent alimony. He likewise allowed the sum of $100 for attorney's fees. Defendant's assets consist of a one-half interest in the farm, quite heavily mortgaged, and a one-third interest in the personal property used upon the farm. In computing their value the court used the highest figures given by any witness thereon. We think the allowance too high. It should be remembered that plaintiff has had no share in the accumulation of defendant's property, and that she lived with him as a wife less than two months. True, she has borne his child, but the decree provides for a contribution from the defendant

amount.

for its support, which provision, as circumstances alter, may, in the discretion of the court, be enlarged. All things considered, we believe that an allowance of $500 as permanent alimony is equitable. The allowance for attorney's fees will stand as made, and neither party will recover costs in this court.

—provision for child—discretion to enlarge.

As so modified, the decree will stand affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Abuse by relatives of other spouse as cruelty constituting ground for divorce.

Abuse by relatives of other spouse, countenanced by such other spouse, may be cruelty constituting ground for divorce. THOMPSON v. THOMPSON (reported herewith) ante, 990; Dakin v. Dakin (1901) 1 Neb. (Unof.) 457, 95 N. W. 781.

So, such abuse, so countenanced, may be cruel and inhuman treatment constituting ground for divorce (Day v. Day (1892) 84 Iowa, 221, 50 N. W. 979); or may, with other acts, amount to such cruel and inhuman treatment (Snyder v. Snyder (1917) 98 Misc. 431, 162 N. Y. Supp. 607). So, such abuse, so countenanced, may justify a divorce on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment and personal indignities, rendering the wife's life burdensome. Hall v. Hall (1881) 9 Or. 452.

It will be seen that in the reported case (THOMPSON v. THOMPSON) the court, with some hesitation, affirms a decree of divorce granted to the wife for extreme cruelty where the husband insisted that she should live in the house of his mother, who had abused her, called her a prostitute, ordered her out, and made her sojourn there intolerable.

In Dakin v. Dakin (Neb.) supra, it was held that a husband who requires his wife to live with his mother, refusing to provide her with another home, and who allows the mother to assault and abuse the wife and to teach her child bad habits, is guilty of cruelty for which the wife is entitled to a divorce.

3 A.L.R.—63.

The failure of a husband to protect his wife from disdainful, insulting, and abusive treatment by his children of a former marriage, she being of nervous temperament, advanced in years, and of impaired health, was held to be such cruel and inhuman treatment as would entitle her to divorce, and would justify her in leaving her husband's home, in Day v. Day (Iowa) supra.

It is held in Hall v. Hall (Or.) supra, that a husband who, in disregard of his wife's remonstrances and of his antenuptial promise to provide for them elsewhere, continues to keep at the family domicile his grown-up children of a former marriage, who habitually treat her with disrespect, apply coarse and degrading epithets to her, and one of whom, on one occasion, actually assaults her under such circumstances as cause conviction and punishment therefor in a criminal action, and who, generally, so conduct themselves toward her as to justify a reasonable apprehension on her part of danger to her person from their violence while endeavoring to perform her duties, adopts such misconduct as his own, and must be held responsible for it to the same extent as if it were his own, in a suit for divorce, brought against him by his wife on the ground of cruel and inhuman treatment and personal indignities, rendering her life burdensome.

Under the New York statute, providing as distinct grounds for a separation, "cruel and inhuman treatment" and "such conduct" as may render it unsafe and improper" for the defendant to cohabit with the plaintiff, the courts at first considered that the distinct grounds were synonymous. See Mason v. Mason (1831) 1 Edw. Ch. (N. Y.) 278. And in De Meli v. De Meli (1884) 67 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 20, affirmed in (1890) 120 N. Y. 485, 17 Am. St. Rep. 652, 24 N. E. 996, where, among the facts, it appeared that there had been some difference between wife and mother-in-law, who did not live together, in which the husband had taken no active part, it is stated that the cruel and inhuman treatment "must be either actual personal violence, committed with danger to life, limb, or health, or there must be a reasonable apprehension of personal violence, arising from menaces or threats creating a reasonable fear of bodily harm." But the later cases do not require physical violence, or fear of it. Thus in Snyder v. Snyder (1917) 98 Misc. 431, 162 N. Y. Supp. 607, the plaintiff was held entitled to a separation for cruel and inhuman treatment, although there was no actual violence of tongue or fist by the husband, and she was willing to live with him apart from his mother, where for several years the husband was without employment except helping his mother in her business, for which she allowed him and his wife and child to live in her home, or in other houses owned by her, and furnished them with food, the mother being the dominant factor in their lives and the real head of their household, and the plaintiff being subjected "by the mother to a continuous course of unkind treatment, evidently animated by that dislike and a desire to break up the little family, to the end that the mother might have the son to herself." The defendant knew of this treatment, but refused to live away from his mother, or to work, except for her, and he supplied his wife with no necessities except food, and refused to pay the doctor's bill for her confinement, and she herself earned the money to pay the hospital bill. The court said: "Defendant's counsel earnestly urges that plaintiff has not brought herself within the rule laid down in De Meli v. De Meli (N. Y.) supra, and other decisions of like import. This may be so, but the later cases have brought the doctrine to rest upon a rule somewhat less strict and more humane than that earlier announced. 'Cruel and inhuman treatment does not necessarily imply such treatment as places a wife in physical fear of the husband. The conduct of the husband may produce such mental agony in the wife as to be even more cruel and inhuman than if mere physical pain had been inflicted; and where the conduct of the husband toward the wife is of this character, it is certainly cruel and inhuman, and justifies the court in freeing her from the necessity of submission to such treatment.' Kissam v. Kissam (1897) 21 App. Div. 142, and cases cited at page 144, 47 N. Y. Supp. 270."

It was held in Hutchins v. Hutchins (1896) 93 Va. 68, 24 S. E. 903, that a man who marries a woman and sends her to live with his parents, who taunt her with vexatious remarks, culminating in such a violent physical attack upon her by his mother that she requires the assistance of neighbors in dressing the wounds, in consequence of which she goes to live with friends, was guilty of cruelty, and was not entitled to a divorce on the ground of desertion, where, during the wife's sojourn with his parents, he turns a deaf ear to her importunities for a different home.

In reversing a judgment granting the husband a divorce on the ground of the wife's desertion, the court said: "There is no doubt that it was a contentious household, for which the mother was at least partly to blame, so that if her conduct was not modified there could be no happiness, and this the husband did not undertake to accomplish, for he testified that he heard both sides and remained neutral, even when told by his wife that his mother had written a letter to a fortune teller in which the wife was described as 'a bad, wicked woman.' This attitude on the part of the husband is not perhaps such legal cruelty that it would justify a wife in leaving the home, but there is a species of cruelty which cuts deeper than a blow or the lash, and that is the weakening of a husband's love and affection through the disparagement of the wife by the husband's mother, and when not resented by him, but apparently sustained, is bound to destroy the happiness of the home. Under such circumstances it is his duty to remove the cause, and if he refuses it is a potent element in the consideration of the questions whether he did not consent to the separation, and whether he made a bona fide effort to induce his wife to return." Fraser v. Fraser (1917) 87 N. J. Eq. 633, L.R.A. 1917F, 738, 101 Atl. 58.

But a youth's insolent and abusive conduct toward his stepmother, there being mutual antipathy between them, and his frustration of her attempt to return to the husband's domicile after she had left by reason of his refusal to send his son away when she said that one of them must go, was held to be no ground for divorce, on the ground of cruelty, where the husband neither encouraged nor approved of his son's conduct. Nickerson v. Nickerson (1898) 34 Or. 1, 48 Pac. 423, 54 Pac. 277.

And a husband was held not guilty of extreme cruelty so as to warrant his wife in deserting him because her control of the household was intruded upon by his daughters by a former marriage, and his spinster sister, who lived with him, where the wife was not without fault in the matter, and the husband did not encourage the interference or treat her with anything resembling cruelty. Dummer v. Dummer (1898) — N. J. —, 41 Atl. 149, where the case appeared to be merely one of an inharmonious household, the female members of which, because of infirmities of temper, took exceptions to acts of each other which ordinarily would be regarded as unobjectionable. Marshak v. Marshak (1914) 115 Ark. 51, L.R.A.1915E, 161, 170 S. W. 567, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 206. B. B.-B.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania (Orr, District Judge) to review a judgment imposing a sentence upon defendant's pleading guilty to an indictment charging him with unlawfully making a fraudulent report of a banking association in violation of statute. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Argued before Buffington, McPherson, and Woolley, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Thomson & Bradshaw and George C. Bradshaw, for plaintiff in error:

The United States courts are without power to suspend sentence.

Ex parte United States, 242 U. S. 27, 61 L. ed. 129, L.R.A.1917E, 1178, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 72, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 355.

In jurisdictions where the right of the court to suspend sentence is denied, where the defendant is set at liberty upon an indefinite suspension, he cannot be further proceeded against, and, if rearrested, is entitled to discharge.

Messrs. Neil W. McGill and E. Lowry Humes, for defendant in error:

It was not only within the power of the court to impose sentence at a subsequent term, but it was the duty of the court then to impose sentence.

Ex parte United States, 242 U. S. 27, 61 L. ed. 129, L.R.A.1917E, 1178, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 72, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 355; 12 Cyc. 772; Clark, Crim. Proc. p. 495; State v. Guild, 10 N. J. L. 163, 18 Am. Dec. 404; Clark v. Allen, 114 Fed. 374; Morgan v. Adams, 141 C. C. A. 475, 226 Fed. 719.

Woolley, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

John Read Miner was indicted for violating § 5209, Revised Statutes (Comp. Stat. 1916, § 9772). On March 11, 1915, he entered a plea of guilty. Sentence was deferred to May 1, 1915. Thereafter sentence was postponed on the application of the defendant, from term to term, for three terms, recognizance being required and given at each term for his appearance at the next. On January 15, 1917, he was called for sentence. In response, he filed a motion in arrest of judgment. Upon its denial, sentence was imposed. He now brings this writ and raises the question whether the court, by failing to impose sentence at the trial term, lost jurisdiction to impose sentence at a later term.

In support of his contention that the postponement of sentence beyond the trial term, though on his motion, deprived the court of jurisdiction to impose sentence upon him at any other term, the defendant cites, for authority, Ex parte United States, 242 U. S. 27, 61 L. ed. 129, L.R.A.1917E, 1178, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 72, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 355, and numerous state decisions, holding that a court is without power to suspend a sentence once imposed, and similarly is without power to suspend the imposition of sentence, conditioned, in either instance, upon the good behavior of the prisoner, or upon the future attitude of the court toward him. These decisions are based upon the principle that the penalty for a crime is a matter within the legislative department of the government, the imposition of functions of departments of government.

the penalty by sentence is the function of the judicial department, to be performed as prescribed, and relief therefrom by pardon is exclusively within the executive department. This principle, of course, is not open to dispute. The questions are, When is the principle invaded? and, What is the effect of its invasion upon the further jurisdiction of the court over an offender?

It is now very generally held that the principle is invaded when a court, by an act done either before sentence or after, attempts to pardon a convict, or to parole him when it is not vested with power of parole, or to parole him in a manner different from that provided by law. That such an act is beyond the jurisdiction of a Federal court, and therefore invalid, has lately been decided by the Supreme Court in Ex parte United States. There the prisoner had been convicted, and sentence had been imposed. The court then ordered "that the execution of the sentence be, and it is hereby, suspended during the good behavior of the defendant, and for the purpose of this case the term of this court is kept open for five years." The Supreme Court held the order invalid, and directed that it be vacated.

While it is no longer questioned that an order of suspension, either of sentence or of the imposition of sentence, in the exercise of a power of pardon or parole not possessed by a court, is invalid, the courts are divided upon the question of the legal effect of such an invalid order upon the continued jurisdiction of a court to impose or enforce a sentence after the term, some holding that jurisdiction is lost by the illegal act, others that it is retained.

In State ex rel. Dawson v. Sapp, 87 Kan. 740, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 249, 125 Pac. 78, the court recognized the general rule that, where a verdict or plea of guilty is final, a court has no discretion, as a disciplinary measure, to suspend the imposition of sentence, and held that the legal effect of the exercise of such discretion by suspending the imposition of a sentence, indefinitely or conditionally, is to deprive the court of jurisdiction to impose sentence at a later term. Other courts have held the same view with reference to sentences imposed and conditionally suspended. United States v. Wilson (C. C.) 46 Fed. 748; Ex parte Clendenning, 22 Okla. 108, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1041, 132 Am. St. Rep. 628, 97 Pac. 650; Re Peterson, 19 Idaho, 433, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1067, 113 Pac. 729; Re Strickler, 51 Kan. 700, 33 Pac. 620; Gray v. State, 107 Ind. 177, 8 N. E. 16; Com. v. Maloney, 145 Mass. 205, 13 N. E. 482; Weaver v. People, 33 Mich. 296, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 552; Grundel v. People, 33 Colo. 191, 108 Am. St. Rep. 75, 79 Pac. 1022; Re Flint, 25 Utah, 338, 95 Am. St. Rep. 853, 71 Pac. 531; People ex rel. Smith v. Allen, 155 Ill. 61, 41 L.R.A. 473, 39 N. E. 568; People ex rel. Boenert v. Barrett, 202 Ill. 287, 63 L.R.A. 82, 95 Am. St. Rep. 230, 67 N. E. 23; State v. Hockett, 129 Mo. App. 639, 108 S. W. 599; Re Beck, 63 Kan. 57, 64 Pac. 971.

Opposed to this line of cases is another, in which the validity of an order conditionally postponing or suspending sentence is similarly recognized, but an opposite view of its effect upon the court's jurisdiction is entertained. In these cases it is held, in effect, that the order, being illegal, is so not because it is irregular or technically defective, but because it is beyond the power of the court, and being for that reason void, the conviction or sentence stands unaffected by the order, and is enforceable by the court at any time after the term, and until the convict has suffered the penalties the law imposes. Morgan v. Adams, 141 C. C. A. 475, 226 Fed. 719; State v. Abbott, 87 S. C. 466, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 112, 70 S. E. 6, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1189; State v. Drew, 75 N. H. 402, 74 Atl. 875; Sylvester v. State, 65 N. H. 193, 20 Atl. 954; State v. Hatley, 110 N. C. 522, 14 S. E. 751; State v. Whitt, 117 N. C. 804, 23 S. E. 452; Tanner v. Wiggins, 54 Fla. 203, 45 So. 459, 14 Ann. Cas. 718; Fuller v. State, 100 Miss. 811, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 247, 57 So. 806, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 98.

From this brief survey of the cases, it is pertinent to note that the question before us as to the jurisdictional effect of the court's orders —postponing sentence—effect on jurisdiction.

postponing sentence from term to term is controlled by the validity or invalidity of the orders, and the validity of the orders is determined by their character and purpose. If, in this case, the purpose of the district court in postponing sentence was to pardon or parole the defendant, then we have to decide whether the court had jurisdiction to impose a sentence at a later term. If, on the other hand, the court's purpose was incident to the administration of justice within its conceded powers, and its orders postponing sentence were unconditional and to definite periods, then we have no jurisdictional question —postponing sentence for purpose of justice.

before us, for all courts agree that in such a case jurisdiction to impose sentence at a term after the trial term is retained.

What, then, does the record show as to the validity of the orders? The record shows that sentence was regularly postponed from term to term, recognizances given, and appearance made. The postpone-ments, therefore, were entirely definite. They were made, in each instance, upon application of the defendant and against objection by the government. Hence we must assume that some —application of accused. reasons for the postponements were offered and controverted by the parties, and in that sense were litigated before and decided by the court. The reasons for the postponements do not appear of record. We cannot assume that they were not substantial.

There is nothing to show that the postponements were conditional. On the contrary, the proceedings clearly indicate that they were unconditional. If the court was moved by impulse to postpone sentence, it does not so appear. We should not assume that it was actuated by improper or unlawful considerations. Nor does the court's purpose appear. But every legal intendment favors the notion that it had a purpose, and that the purpose was lawful. In fact, we must assume, in the absence of anything in the record to the contrary, that the postponements were made for a lawful purpose, in the orderly progress of the case. This being true, the validity of the orders postponing sentence is established, leaving for decision no question of the court's jurisdiction to impose sentence at a later term.

Appeal—assumption as to procedure.

The judgment below is affirmed.

NOTE.

The question as to whether jurisdiction is lost by delay in imposing sentence is considered in the annotation beginning at page 1003, post. The effect on this general question of orders, as in the reported case (MINER v. UNITED STATES, ante, 995), postponing sentence from term to term, is treated in subdivision III. of that annotation.

ROMEO SMITH, Appt.,
v.
STATE OF INDIANA.

Indiana Supreme Court — February 11, 1919.

(— Ind. —, 121 N. E. 829.)

Criminal law — loss of power to pronounce judgment after conviction.

1. Under a statute requiring the court to pronounce judgment after a finding of guilt the court loses jurisdiction to pronounce a judgment on a plea of guilty by the passing of two terms of court thereafter, during a portion of which time accused is permitted to be at large without bail.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1003.]

— failure to compel court to act — effect.

2. An accused is not deprived of the benefit of the failure of the court to act by not compelling it to perform its plain statutory duty.

[See 8 R. C. L. 248-250.]

— right to defer sentence.

3. Courts may defer final action upon a plea of guilty, or upon a conviction, to a subsequent day or term, when it appears that the interest of justice demands it.

[See 8 R. C. L. 249.]

4. Cause for deferring sentence after conviction is shown when time is allowed the accused to move for a new trial, or in arrest of judgment, or to take other steps involving delay allowed by statute or the practice of the court, or for the purpose of hearing evidence on the question of punishment.

[See 8 R. C. L. 249.]

Appeal — failure to sentence — assumption of justification.

5. An appellate court cannot, when the record shows unlawful delay in imposing sentence after plea of guilty, assume that the delay was justified for the purpose of upholding a sentence subsequently imposed.

[See 8 R. C. L. 252.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Delaware County overruling his verified motions to set aside and vacate, and to modify, a judgment convicting him, on pleading guilty, of keeping a gaming house. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. George W. Cromer and Harry Long, for appellant:

The court has no power to withhold judgment for an indefinite or unreasonable time.

Smith v. Hess, 91 Ind. 424.

In the absence of a permissive statute, the indefinite postponement of sentence upon one convicted of a crime deprives the court of jurisdiction to pronounce sentence at a subsequent term.

Grundel v. People, 33 Colo. 191, 108 Am. St. Rep. 75, 79 Pac. 1022; Republic v. Pedro, 11 Haw. 287; Com. v. Maloney, 145 Mass. 205, 13 N. E. 482; Com. v. Dunleavy, 16 Pa. Super. Ct. 80.

By an indefinite suspension of sentence, the court loses jurisdiction of the defendant, and cannot thereafter order his commitment.

Ex parte Peterson, 19 Idaho, 433, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1067, 113 Pac. 729.

Where the court, without any legal cause therefor, passes the case over under an entry that, by agreement, the assessing of punishment and sentence is deferred to some future time, it loses its jurisdiction, and cannot pronounce sentence at a subsequent term.

State v. Hockett, 129 Mo. App. 639, 108 S. W. 599; State v. Dibert, — Mo. App. —, 108 S. W. 600; State v. Jacobs, — Mo. App. —, 108 S. W. 601.

Where sentence is delayed from time to time without the defendant's request, until the period of imprisonment to which he could have been sentenced has elapsed, the court has no jurisdiction to pass sentence.

People v. Kennedy, 58 Mich. 372, 25 N. W. 318.

A court has no authority (in the absence of a statute) to order a term of imprisonment to commence at a future period of time, and the order to that effect may be regarded as a nullity.

Miller v. Allen, 11 Ind. 389; Kennedy v. Howard, 74 Ind. 87.

Where two sentences of imprisonment are imposed at the same time, both terms commence and run concurrently.

Ibid.

Messrs. Ele Stansbury, Attorney General, and Edward M. White, for the State:

It is lawful and competent for a criminal court, after conviction on plea of guilty, to stay for a time its sentence, to give the court opportunity to better satisfy his own mind what the punishment ought to be.

Smith v. Hess, 91 Ind. 424; People v. Brown, 54 Mich. 15, 19 N. W. 571; Com. v. Dowdican, 115 Mass. 133; Ex parte United States, 242 U. S. 27, 61 L. ed. 129, L.R.A.1917E, 1178, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 72, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 355; People v. Felker, 61 Mich. 110, 27 N. W. 869.

The court had the power and right to delay defendant's sentence, and the presumption must be indulged that it was delayed for proper and legal reasons, and for a proper and reasonable time.

Smith v. Hess, supra; Cassady v. Miller, 106 Ind. 72, 5 N. E. 713; People v. Brown, 54 Mich. 15, 19 N. W. 571.

If defendant was at liberty, after his plea of guilty was entered, it was not the result of any order of the court, for the court made no order to that effect.

Shaffer v. State, 100 Ind. 365.

The trial court has no right, after a plea of guilty in a criminal case by one of legal age, to enter any order permitting the defendant to be released during good behavior.

Gray v. State, 107 Ind. 177, 8 N. E. 16.

The Delaware circuit court did not lose jurisdiction to punish defendant on his plea of guilty because of delay in administering such punishment.

Ibid.; Ledgerwood v. State, 134 Ind. 81, 33 N. E. 631; United States v. Guiteau, 1 Mackey, 498, 47 Am. Rep. 247; State v. Ray, 50 Iowa, 521; Peo- ple v. Reilly, 53 Mich. 260, 18 N. W. 849; Re St. Hilaire, 101 Me. 522, 64 Atl. 882, 8 Ann. Cas. 385; Re Terry, 71 Kan. 362, 80 Pac. 586; State v. Abbott, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 112, and note, 87 S. C. 466, 70 S. E. 6, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1189.

Even at common law, sentence may be suspended indefinitely and the court still retain jurisdiction of the person of the defendant and sentence him at a later date.

Re Collins, 8 Cal. App. 367, 97 Pac. 188; Mann v. People, 16 Colo. App. 475, 66 Pac. 452; Sylvester v. State, 65 N. H. 193, 20 Atl. 954; Weber v. State, 58 Ohio St. 616, 41 L.R.A. 472, 51 N. E. 116; Fults v. State, 2 Sneed, 232; State v. Abbott, supra; Ex parte United States, 242 U. S. 27, 61 L. ed. 129, L.R.A.1917E, 1178, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 72, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 355.

In view of the state of the record, which fails to show any entry showing why sentence was not pronounced sooner upon the plea of guilty, the court must presume the postponement of the court was based upon some sufficient reason.

Gray v. State, supra; People v. Brown, 54 Mich. 15, 19 N. W. 571.

Myers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On January 10, 1918, appellant was sentenced to pay a fine of $250, and to imprisonment on the Indiana state farm for a period of six months. On January 28, 1918, appellant filed his verified motion to set aside and vacate said judgment, which motion was overruled February 1, 1918; thereupon he filed his verified motion to modify the judgment. This motion was overruled. From the judgment thus rendered appellant has appealed to this court, and has assigned as error: (1) The overruling of his motion to set aside and vacate the judgment; (2) the overruling of his motion to modify the judgment.

Counter affidavits were filed by Honorable William A. Thompson and the deputy sheriff of Delaware county, denying certain statements of fact contained in appellant's motion to vacate the judgment. The facts thus questioned we will not undertake to settle. With these facts out of the way, this case is before us under practically an agreed statement, as follows: Two indictments were returned by the grand jury at the January term, 1917, of the Delaware circuit court, one on January 6th and one on January 16th, hereafter referred to as the first and second, respectively. On March 19, 1917, appellant appeared in the Delaware circuit court, and before Honorable William A. Thompson, sole judge thereof, and entered a plea of guilty to each of said indictments. He was then permitted to go hence on bond for his appearance in that court on May 22, 1917. He appeared in court as stipulated in the bond, and before the judge thereof, and then and there, on appellant's plea of guilty theretofore entered to the first indictment, judgment was pronounced and sentence fixed at a fine of $250, and imprisonment on the Indiana state farm for a period of three months. Appellant paid the fine and costs assessed against him, and was imprisoned in accordance with the sentence imposed. The term of his imprisonment expired on August 22, 1917, at which time he was released, and then and there returned to his home in Muncie, Indiana, where he has continuously resided, and within the jurisdiction of the Delaware circuit court.

No action whatever was taken by the court on appellant's plea of guilty to the second indictment prior to January 10, 1918, at which time, on order of the court, the sheriff of Delaware county brought appellant into court, and judgment was then and there rendered against him on his plea of guilty entered more than nine months prior thereto, and more than seven months after the time of his sentence on the first indictment. Appellant was forty-eight years old at the time he pleaded guilty, and from the time of his release from the state farm he was not in the custody of the court or sureties until said January 10th. There is no claim of any attempt on the part of the court to follow the provisions of §§ 2174, 2176, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1914 (Acts 1907, p. 447, §§ 1, 3), known as the Parole or Suspending Sentence Statute.

Appellant insists that under this state of the record, the Delaware circuit court has no authority or jurisdiction to pronounce judgment or sentence him on January 10, 1918. Section 2166, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1914 (Acts 1905, p. 584, § 290, of our Criminal Code), provides that "after a finding or verdict of guilty against the defendant, if a new trial be not granted, or the judgment be not arrested, the court must pronounce judgment."

And § 2171, Burns's Anno. Stat. provides that "if no sufficient cause be alleged or appear to the court why judgment should not be pronounced, it shall thereupon be rendered."

Under § 2073, "if the accused plead guilty, said plea shall be entered on the minutes, and he shall be sentenced, or he may be placed in the custody of the sheriff until sentenced."

The remainder of this section has reference to an accused under the age of twenty-one years, and can have no bearing on the question here for decision.

The state has called our attention to the case of Gray v. State, 107 Ind. 177, 8 N. E. 16. That case holds that any agreement to compound, discontinue, or delay a prosecution is forbidden by the statute, and is illegal and void. It also reaffirmed the doctrine announced in the case of Smith v. Hess, 91 Ind. 424, to the effect that the trial court, under the provisions of § 2073, supra, had no power to permit the accused to depart from court without sentence, subject to arrest in case he did not behave well. The ruling thus made is in harmony with the holding of this court in Shaffer v. State, 100 Ind. 365. In this last case there was an order-book entry showing that the sentence was sus-pendent. A motion to discharge the accused on the ground that the order suspending sentence amounted to a judgment which was not subject to change or amendment was overruled, and the defendant sentenced. This action of the court was upheld for the reason it did not appear from the record that the judgment was unnecessarily delayed.

In the Smith Case, this court said: "The legitimate inference from the statute is that the legislature in its enactment did not intend that the courts should allow adult offenders to go on good behavior. Without deciding what might be the result of such a practice, upon a proper case made, and properly brought before us, we may say that, as at present advised, we do not feel like giving our sanction to that practice."

The case of Ledgerwood v. State, 134 Ind. 81, 33 N. E. 631, is cited by the state in support of its contention that the trial court did not lose jurisdiction to punish appellant on his plea of guilty. That case holds that the court's failure to render judgment after a plea of guilty, until the next term, will not divest its jurisdiction. By reference to the record in that case, it will be observed that the defendant was at all times after his arrest in the custody of the court. The reason for the postponement does not appear in the opinion, but the record shows just cause. This fact would be sufficient to distinguish it from the case at bar, for in this case no cause is shown for the delay of two full terms between the term at which the plea of guilty was entered and the term at which the sentence now under consideration was pronounced.

There is no reason or authority for saying that an accused must not only do what the law requires of him, but that he must go farther and compel the court to perform a plain statutory duty, if he would protect himself from the motives of the court's failure to act. As said in the case of People v. Kennedy, 58 Mich. 372, 25 N. W. 318: "The defendant, even after conviction, has some rights that a court is bound to respect, and is entitled to have his liberty as soon as the limit of law, reasonably administered, will permit."

In the case of Re Flint, 25 Utah, 338, 95 Am. St. Rep. 853, 71 Pac. 531, the court in its opinion, after recognizing the right to defer sentence from time to time for a proper purpose, said: "But we know of no rule or principle of law whereby a court can indefinitely suspend sentence, keep the defendant in a state of suspense and uncertainty, and, long after he has been discharged from custody, have him re-arrested, and impose a sentence of either fine or imprisonment on him."

In Grundel v. People, 33 Colo. 191, 108 Am. St. Rep. 75, 79 Pac. 1022, the order entry of the trial court at the August term fixed no definite time within which sentence should be pronounced. "The defendants were released upon their own recognizance. Whether or not they would ever be called to the bar for sentence was contingent upon the action of the prosecuting officer." More than three years elapsed before any action was taken, when, over the objection of the defendant, judgment was rendered and sentence imposed. Held, that "in the absence of a permissive statute, the indefinite postponement of sentence upon one convicted of crime deprives the court of jurisdiction to pronounce sentence at a subsequent term. Such postponement is, in effect, a discharge of the prisoner, and therefore ousts the court after the expiration of the term of further authority over him. People ex rel. Smith v. Allen, 155 Ill. 61, 41 L.R.A. 473, 39 N. E. 568; Com. v. Maloney, 145 Mass. 205, 13 N. E.

482; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 314; Re Flint, supra; Weaver v. People, 33 Mich. 296, 1 Am. Crim. Rep. 552; People ex rel. Boenert v. Barrett, 202 Ill. 287, 63 L.R.A. 82, 95 Am. St. Rep. 230, 67 N. E. 23; United States v. Wilson (C. C.) 46 Fed. 748."

The rule is fairly well settled that courts may defer temporarily final action upon a plea of guilty or upon a conviction to a subsequent day or term, when it appears that the interest of justice demands it, or, as said, "for cause shown," and cause is shown when time is allowed the accused to move for a new trial, or in arrest of judgment, or to take other steps involving delay allowed by statute, or the practice of the court, or for the purpose of hearing evidence on the question of punishment.

—right to defer sentence. —when cause shown. Smith v. Hess, supra; State v. Ray, 50 Iowa, 520; People v. Kennedy, 58 Mich. 376, 25 N. W. 318; People v. Felker, 61 Mich. 110, 27 N. W. 869; State v. Watson, 95 Mo. 411, 8 S. W. 383.

The attorney general insists that, inasmuch as all presumptions must be indulged in favor of the action of the trial court, the record being silent as to reasons for postponing sentence, this court must assume the delay was justifiable. We cannot agree with this contention. In this case no record was made other than the entry of appellant's plea of guilty.

Appeal—failure to sentence—assumption of justification.

This case must be decided upon the record, which shows affirmatively the facts which we have heretofore recited. Sections of the statute to which we have referred furnish the rule adopted by the general assembly of this state, for the guidance of courts in cases of conviction, or upon pleas of guilty. The fact that no order-book entry was made or agreement entered into whereby sentence was to be postponed will not be sufficient to overcome the facts disclosed by this record. If there had been a final judgment, accompanied by an order suspending sentence to which no objection was made, we would have an entirely different question. State v. Smith, 173 Ind. 388, 90 N. E. 607.

As bearing upon the question before us for consideration, see State v. Hockett, 129 Mo. App. 639, 108 S. W. 599; Ex parte United States, 242 U. S. 27, 61 L. ed. 129, L.R.A. 1917E, 1178, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 72, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 355; Re Peterson, 19 Idaho, 433, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1067, 113 Pac. 729; Republic v. Pedro, 11 Haw. 287.

Judgment reversed, with instruction to the Delaware Circuit Court to sustain appellant's motion to vacate the judgment, and that the appellant be discharged.

I. Introductory.

This note is confined to a review of the cases discussing the delay of the court in imposing sentence as affecting its jurisdiction to impose a valid sentence. It excludes cases dealing with the power of the court to suspend sentence, or to postpone or stay the execution of a sentence, though some cases have been included wherein it is impossible to determine with certainty from the opinion whether there was a definite suspension of sentence or a mere delay in pronouncing it.

II. In general.

It seems to be well settled that it is the duty of the court on a conviction or plea of guilty to impose sentence within a reasonable time, and an indefinite postponement of sentence deprives the court of jurisdiction over the prisoner, and a subsequent sentence is without judicial authority and void.

In Smith v. Hess (Ind.) supra, the court, in referring to the right to delay sentence, said: "This is reasonable, and in many cases absolutely necessary to the administration of justice. In many cases the court may not be sufficiently advised at the time of the plea of guilty to inflict the proper punishment. It may be necessary to hear evidence to inform the court of the circumstances under which the crime may have been committed, whether palliating or aggravating. That evidence may not be at hand, and a delay of sentence may be necessary to obtain it."

In State ex rel. Dawson v. Sapp (1912) 87 Kan. 740, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 249, 125 Pac. 78, the court, in discussing the power to suspend sentence, said by way of dictum: "A court may postpone the rendition of judgment in a criminal case, and has a practically unlimited discretion in that regard, so long as the imposition of a sentence as a matter of course at some time remains in contemplation. As to this there is no conflict in the authorities. There is a difference of judicial opinion, however, as to whether a court may withhold sentence with the understanding that it may never be pronounced at all. . . . We think the better rule is that where a verdict or plea of guilty has become final the court has no discretion, as a disciplinary measure, to suspend the imposition of sentence, but is under an absolute duty to pronounce it, and this duty is violated whenever an order is made the purpose and natural effect of which are that the defendant shall understand that he may never be punished. There is an obvious and important difference between the mere delay to pronounce sentence and its suspension, in the sense in which the expression is here used. Whether a postponement is rightful depends not upon its length or definiteness, nor upon whether it extends beyond the term, but upon its purpose and character. . . . In many of the cases the action of the court which results in a loss of jurisdiction is described as the indefinite postponement of a sentence. As already indicated, we think the important consideration in this connection is the purpose of the postponement. The mere omission to pronounce sentence, even though several terms pass without an order of continuance or any other action, might not amount to a suspension of sentence, in the sense here intended, if it were occasioned, for instance, by a doubt as to whether a verdict should be set aside, or as to what punishment ought to be assessed. On the other hand, the fact that in the present case the order purported to suspend the sentences until a definite time does not prevent a loss of jurisdiction. A mere postponement of sentence until that time would, of course, not have divested the court of jurisdiction."

In People v. Kennedy (Mich.) supra, it was held that a court has the power to defer sentence for a reasonable period and for any proper purpose, such as allowing time for the defendant to make a motion for a new trial or to take exceptions to the appellate court, or for the judge to inform himself relative to the proper sentence to pass on the defendant.

In People ex rel. Boenert v. Barrett (Ill.) supra, it was said: "There can be no doubt that a court has the right, in a criminal cause, to delay pronouncing judgment for a reasonable time, for the purpose of hearing and determining motions for a new trial or in arrest of judgment, or to give the defendant time to perfect an appeal or writ of error, or for other proper causes."

Where a sentence was imposed nineteen days after the verdict was returned it was held that the presumption must be that the court appointed that time for pronouncing sentence, and it was therefore valid, notwithstanding a statutory provision that judgment must be pronounced at least two days after the verdict, "if the court intend to remain in session so long; or, if not, at as remote a time as can reasonably be allowed." Dalton v. State (1911) 6 Okla. Crim. Rep. 368, 118 Pac. 1001.

See also Re Hemstreet (1912) 18 Cal. App. 639, 123 Pac. 984.

Where the court delays the rendition of sentence, the presumption should be indulged that it was delayed "for proper and legal reasons, and for a proper and reasonable time." Smith v. Hess (Ind.) supra.

Where the court has lost the right to pass sentence, the fact that the defendant's attorney requested delay in passing it, in order to make a case for review in the appellate court, has been held not to confer on the trial judge any power to act in the premises. People v. Kennedy (Mich.) supra.

In Massachusetts, the court has statutory power, with the consent of the defendant, to place a case on file, where there are extenuating circumstances, the pendency of a like case on appeal, or for other sufficient cause. Thus, in Com. v. Dowdican (1874) 115 Mass. 133, it was said in reference to the practice of continuing the case to a subsequent term for sentence: "It has long been a common practice in this commonwealth, after verdict of guilty in a criminal case, when the court is satisfied that, by reason of extenuating circumstances, or of the pendency of a question of law in a like case before a higher court, or for other sufficient cause, public justice does not require an immediate sentence, to order, with the consent of the defendant and of the attorney for the commonwealth, and upon such terms as the court in its discretion may impose, that the indictment be laid on file; and this practice has been recognized by statute. Stat. 1865, chap. 223; 1869, chap. 415, § 60. Such an order is not equivalent to a final judgment, or to a nolle prosequi or discontinuance, by which the case is put out of court; but is a mere suspending of active proceedings in the case, which dispenses with the necessity of entering formal continuances upon the dockets, and leaves it within the power of the court at any time, upon the motion of either party, to bring the case forward and pass any lawful order or judgment therein." In Marks v. Wentworth (1908) 199 Mass. 44, 85 N. E. 81, the petitioner applied for a writ of mandamus to compel the justice of a police court to bring forward on the docket a criminal case against the petitioner, and to impose sentence, or otherwise to make a final disposition of the case. The complaint against the petitioner was for an assault and battery, and after a trial in the police court he was found guilty; the case was then continued, and the probation officer was instructed to investigate the facts relating thereto and report to the court. The petitioner was then under a recognizance, but afterwards, with his consent, he was placed on probation with the probation officer, and the case was continued several times; and at the continuance next before the last one the petitioner, for the first time, objected to a further continuance and requested that sentence be imposed; but for a good reason the court again continued the case, and when it was afterwards reached, the petitioner's wife, upon whom the assault was alleged to have been committed, appeared at the request of the court, and stated that she and her husband were living together and that matters were all right between them. The judge then intimated that he was willing to place the case on file, but the petitioner objected, whereupon the court took the case under advisement and continued it eight days, and when it came up at the expiration of that time, the petitioner asked that sentence be imposed. The judge stated that, as the petitioner had been put on probation, and the object of the probation seemed to have been accomplished, he deemed the only proper disposition of the case was to place it on file, and so ordered. The petitioner claimed an appeal, which the court refused; and the appellate court, in holding that he was entitled to an order disposing of the case in the police court, said: "It has long been the practice in this commonwealth for a court, with the consent of the defendant, after a verdict or plea of guilty in a criminal case, when for good cause it seems best not to impose sentence immediately, to place the case on file. This practice has been recognized by statute and approved by this court. . . . The case then stands on the records of the court, and although usually no further proceedings are had in it, it may at any time be called up and sentence may be imposed, or some other final disposition may be made of it. But the case cannot properly be placed on file without the consent of the defendant. He has a right to have it finally disposed of, without unreasonable delay, so that he will not be liable for an indefinite period to be brought into the court and subjected to punishment. Although this practice formerly prevailed only in the higher courts, it was extended by statute to the police district, and municipal courts. Rev. Laws, chap. 160, § 89; Stat. 1898, chap. 396, § 54. But when the statute gave to these courts authority to place complaints on file, it did not authorize such a disposition of a case against the objection of the defendant. The order made by the respondent in this case was, therefore, irregular. The petitioner cannot be compelled to remain for years subject to the risk of being sentenced on this complaint, if at any time the public authorities should choose to bring him before the court for that purpose. If the order be given any effect, it leaves the case still in court, subject to be disposed of hereafter. If it be treated as invalid, the case remains as it was before the order was made. The petitioner is, therefore, entitled to an order or judgment from the police court which shall finally dispose of the prosecution in that court."

In People ex rel. Smith v. Allen (1895) 155 Ill. 61, 41 L.R.A. 473, 39 N. E. 568, the defendant entered a plea of guilty in February, 1890, but judgment on his plea was stayed and he was allowed by the court to depart therefrom, without recognizance, to again appear for sentence or any other purpose. No order whatever was made in the case from that time until the July term of 1893, when, on motion of the state's attorney, it was stricken from the docket; and at the following September term, on motion of the state's attorney, the case was reinstated on the docket of the court and, after overruling the defendant's motion for leave to withdraw his plea of guilty entered at the February term in 1890, as well as his motion in arrest of judgment, the judge then presiding (not the one before whom the plea was entered) sentenced him to three years' imprisonment. It further appeared that the defendant did not escape after his plea of guilty, and that he remained within the jurisdiction of the court between the time of entering his plea and his final arrest and sentence. The court said: "It is thus made to appear from the record of the criminal court, and all the facts in proof before us, that the attempt upon the part of that court was to indefinitely suspend sentence upon the plea of guilty; and the question now is, Having then withheld judgment upon the plea, and permitted the prisoner to go at liberty without in any way requiring him to further appear in answer to the charge, had the court jurisdiction, more than three years thereafter, to cancel his arrest, and pass sentence upon him? It must be admitted that, if such power remained in the court three years, it would continue indefinitely, and might be exercised at any future time, and that, too, without any reason for doing so, except such as might exist in the mind of the judge causing the re-arrest and pronouncing judgment." The court then concluded: "Until the legislature shall vest courts in this state with powers not given them, it is their duty, in the trial of criminal cases, upon a conviction or plea of guilty to pronounce judgment at that time, unless, upon motion for new trial, in arrest of judgment, or for other cause, the case is continued for further adjudication, and the defendant by recognizance or being held in custody, required to continue to answer the charge. And if they fail to perform that duty, but discharge the prisoner, or permit him to go indefinitely, their power and jurisdiction over him cease, and a subsequent sentence is without judicial authority."

In Gray v. State (1886) 107 Ind. 177, 8 N. E. 16, the prosecuting attorney, after the entry of a plea of guilty, entered into an agreement with the defendant that he might depart from the court without sentence, during good behavior, but subject to arrest if, in the future, he should commit another offense of a similar character. It was held that after the entry of the plea of guilty the court "could not lawfully do anything further therein except to sentence him at the time, or to place him in the custody of the sheriff until such sentence;" and the court further held that the agreement entered into between the prosecuting attorney and the defendant was void and of no effect.

In Grundel v. People (1905) 33 Colo. 191, 108 Am. St. Rep. 75, 79 Pac. 1022, the plaintiffs in error pleaded guilty at a term of court held in June, 1900, and sentence was deferred, at their request, until the first day of the August term; that at the August term, on their motion and request, further proceedings were stayed until the district attorney should move for sentence, and no further steps were taken until November 16, 1903, when the district attorney moved for sentence, which was passed over the defendant's objection. The appellate court held that the sentence was void, saying: "By the order entered at the August term, no definite time was fixed within which sentence should be pronounced. The defendants were released upon their own recognizance. Whether or not they would be ever called to the bar for sentence was contingent upon the action of the prosecuting officer. Three years and three months elapsed before such action was taken. This delay, unexplained, in connection with the order under which they were released, was equivalent to an indefinite postponement of sentence. There is no statute which permits this practice, and hence the court was without jurisdiction to pronounce judgment against them."

In People v. Maloney (1887) 145 Mass. 205, 13 N. E. 482, the defendant was arrested and brought before the trial justice on June 19, 1886, and pleaded not guilty; the case was continued to June 26, 1886, at which time the defendant retracted his plea of not guilty, and pleaded guilty; the case was "continued for sentence" to August 7, 1886, at which time the cause was continued nisi on payment of costs by the defendant, to be again called up for sentence on notice to the defendant; on October 6, 1886, the case was called up for sentence, and continued to October 16, 1886, at which time the defendant was sentenced. The court, in holding the sentence to be invalid, said: "It is clear that the trial justice had no power to continue the case indefinitely, and to hold the defendant to appear at a time to be afterwards named. A commitment or recognizance under such an order would be simply void, and a discharge of a defendant under it would be absolute. The record does not expressly state that the defendant was discharged; but that appears, as do other essential things in the record, by implication, because it shows that he could not lawfully be longer held in custody. The record also shows that there was no final judgment and no termination of the case, unless the discharge of the defendant of itself terminated the case. During the progress of the trial, the case was indefinitely postponed, and the defendant discharged. Pronouncing sentence is a judicial act, and part of the trial. The indefinite postponement would relieve the defendant from lawful custody, and from any obligation to appear and answer further, and from any liability to be arrested and held to answer further. If the order of the magistrate discharged him, without leaving him under any obligation to appear, the magistrate would have no authority to issue a capias to compel his appearance; it would work a discontinuance of the case as to him."

In People ex rel. Boenert v. Barrett (1903) 202 Ill. 287, 63 L.R.A. 82, 95 Am. St. Rep. 230, 67 N. E. 23, the relator was indicted at a term of court held in June, 1898, and on entering into a recognizance was released from custody; at the April term, 1900, he was tried and found guilty on April 12, 1900, and was remanded into custody after moving for a new trial; on May 5, 1900, being the last day of the April term, on motion of the relator the motion for a new trial was continued, and he was recognized, without sureties, to appear before the criminal court of the county on May 7, 1900, and from day to day and from term to term, until the final order or sentence of the court, he was released from custody; on October 31, 1902, the same judge before whom the relator was tried and convicted, and who allowed him to depart on his own recognizance, overruled his motion for a new trial, and the relator then moved in arrest of judgment, and this motion was continued to November 5, 1902, and he was remanded; the motion was finally overruled November 11, 1902, and the relator was sentenced to imprisonment, and immediately applied for a writ of habeas corpus. The appellate court, in ordering the discharge of the prisoner, said: "There was, in the case of the relator, a motion for a new trial pending, which was continued to the next term, but nothing was done in the matter, although numerous terms intervened, for twenty-nine months. We are of the opinion that this was an unreasonable and unwarrantable delay, it being entirely unexplained by anything in the record, and that the court, in view of all the circumstances, including the omission to require security for the relator's appearance, lost jurisdiction of the case, and that the subsequent sentence was without judicial authority. . . . Long and unreasonable delays in passing upon motions for new trials or in arrest of judgment are calculated to obstruct the administration of public justice, and to operate as a denial of the right of the citizen to a speedy trial. It is said, however, in this case, that all the delay was with the consent of the relator, and that he cannot now be heard to complain. It cannot, of course, be contended that the doctrine of estoppel has any application here, nor can it be held that the relator could waive any requirement respecting the jurisdiction of the court to enter judgment and pronounce the sentence. If the court had no power thus indirectly to suspend sentence and to permit the relator to go at large upon his own recognizance or upon parole, such power could not be conferred by his consent nor by his express request. . . . The rendering of judgment and the final sentencing of the defendant cannot be made a mere matter of discretion with the judge or the public prosecutor, nor to depend upon the subsequent conduct of the convicted person. If it were so, what subsequent conduct would demand or justify the pronouncing or withholding of the sentence? And who would determine its character? Such conduct might be innocent in itself, yet offensive to those in whom the power to apprehend or to punish resided. The liberty of the citizen cannot, in a free country, be made to depend for its security on the arbitrary will of any public officer; it can be taken from him by due process of law only."

In People v. Felker (1886) 61 Mich.

110, 27 N. W. 869, the defendant was arraigned before a justice of the peace, and judgment having been passed on him, he appealed to the circuit court, where he pleaded guilty, and was, on October 24, 1885, sentenced to pay a fine of $75; the judge of the circuit court then ordered that the further judgment of the court be deferred until the first day of the next term, and that the defendant forthwith enter into a recognizance, conditioned that he should appear on the first day of the next term to receive the further judgment of the court; the defendant paid the fine, gave the recognizance, and appeared at the next subsequent term, and there received an additional sentence of ten days in jail. The appellate court held that the additional judgment was a nullity, saying: "The proceedings in this case cannot be sanctioned. A judgment in a criminal case cannot be divided up and parceled out, and pronounced from time to time, by the court. The court may, in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, suspend sentence for a reasonable time to enable the court to inform itself of such matters as will enable it to impose a just and proper sentence, or to enable the respondent to present exceptions to a higher court, or sue out a writ of error, but the sentence or judgment, when pronounced, must embrace the whole measure of the punishment imposed. The judgment last pronounced in this case is not a correction or alteration of the determination of the court when it pronounced the first judgment. It is a further judgment, which the court then announced its intention of pronouncing. There is neither law nor precedent for such course as was pursued in this case, and the judgment given must be reversed, and the respondent discharged."

In State v. Hockett (1907) 129 Mo. App. 639, 108 S. W. 599, the defendants pleaded guilty at the November term of court, 1906, and on the plea being entered the record showed that "thereupon, by agreement, the assessing of punishment and sentence is deferred to some future time;" and the defendants were permitted to go at large without bail, no further entry appearing on the record for that term. No mention was made of the case at the following February term, but at the June term, 1907, the record not showing the presence of the defendants, they were fined and their license as dramshop keepers was revoked, and they were prohibited from obtaining a license for a period of two years. The appellate court held that the defendants were sentenced without authority of law, and that the court, having passed the case over indefinitely after the plea of guilty without any legal cause therefor, lost its jurisdiction. The court said: "It seems to us that it is an exercise of the power of pardon to withhold the sentence which the law imposes. The court is but the instrument, the arm, of the law. The only power to indefinitely stay the force of that arm is lodged with another department of the government. If the power be granted, where is it to be limited? It is asserted to be a discretionary power. Therefore, it would be in great part a power practically beyond control, and might be exercised in cases where the general good demanded the law's enforcement. If a court refuses to render a judgment in a civil case it may be compelled to perform that duty, and we can think of no good reason why it should not be likewise compelled to pass sentence in a criminal case."

A peculiar situation was presented in People v. Kennedy (1885) 58 Mich. 372, 25 N. W. 318, wherein the following facts appeared: The defendant was convicted before a justice of the peace, from which he appealed to the circuit court, where he was again convicted on November 28, 1883; and, on December 3 following, he was brought before the court for sentence, which, on motion of the court, was deferred until the first day of the next term. On February 29, 1884, which was not the first day of the term, the defendant was again brought into court, and sentence was further deferred to March 10th; and the next proceeding was had on May 26th, when the defendant was again brought into court for sentence, but his attorneys objected that he could not then be legally sentenced, which objection was overruled. A desire being expressed to take the case to the supreme court, a request was made for a delay of sentence, and imposition of sentence was again deferred until the first day of the next term, being August 18th; and it was also ordered that the defendant enter into a recognizance to appear on that day and prosecute his bill of exceptions. On August 18th, the defendant not appearing in court, and not having prepared or settled any bill of exceptions, it was ordered that an attachment issue, directing the sheriff to produce him in court for sentence. The return of the sheriff showed that he was unable to find the defendant, and nothing further was done until September 22d, when an order was entered reciting that sentence having been deferred until that term of court, and the defendant not having appeared, sentence was further deferred until the first day of the next term. "The next step in this rather peculiar course of justice" occurred on December 6th, when it was ordered that the defendant appear on the first day of the next term for sentence, "and that sentence herein be, and the same is hereby, deferred until said time." The action of the court again slept until March 4, 1885, when an order was made reciting that the defendant had failed to appear according to the terms of the last order, and that an attachment issue to the sheriff directing him to bring the defendant into court to receive sentence, which was done on the following day. It was held that the court lost jurisdiction on March 10, 1884, and that the sentence passed on the defendant a year later was therefore void. The court said: "In this case, the order of the court made on the 3d day of December, 1884, was reasonable and proper, and perhaps the circuit judge had the right and power during the next term, although he did not act upon the matter the first day thereof, to again defer sentence until the 10th day of March. But when the defendant appeared on that day in obedience to the order of February 29th, and found no court in session, his bondsmen were not only released, but we think the defendant was absolved from any further attendance upon the court. When he was convicted on the 28th day of November, 1883, if sentence had been at once imposed upon him, the utmost length of his imprisonment on account of not paying fine and costs, namely, ninety days, would have expired on or before the day the second order deferring sentence was made. If the defendant, for want of bail, had been in the county jail, it is obvious that the circuit judge could not, upon his own motion, and without apparent reason, have deferred sentence until the 26th day of May, 1884, and then imposed upon defendant the full penalty of the law. The defendant, even after conviction, has some rights that a court is bound to respect, and is entitled to have his liberty as soon as the limit of the law, reasonably administered, will permit. The principle in this case is the same as if the defendant had been in confinement, as he was under bonds and in the custody of the court; and the deferring of sentence was not asked by him or his counsel. We think the court lost jurisdiction on the 10th of March, 1884, and that the sentence passed upon the defendant a year afterwards was null and void."

In People v. Stokes (1907) 5 Cal. App. 205, 89 Pac. 997, the jury rendered its verdict on March 19, 1906, and April 2d following was by the court fixed as the date for pronouncing sentence, which, however, on motion of counsel for the defendant, was postponed to April 16th, and on that date, on like motion, again postponed to April 30, 1906; but nothing further was done until June 4, 1906, at which time sentence was pronounced. In answer to the contention that the trial court, by reason of this delay, had lost jurisdiction, the appellate court said: "At defendant's request, April 30th was the time fixed by the court for pronouncing sentence. This was, at most, a delay of thirty-five days, including intervening Sundays and holidays. We cannot assent to the proposition that, by reason of this delay, the court lost jurisdiction to pronounce sentence. The delay was undoubtedly due to the holidays proclaimed by the governor of the state, and which continued throughout the month of May, 1906. It is not necessary to pass upon the question as to whether this holiday period of one month would excuse and justify an otherwise unwarranted delay, for the reason that we are of the opinion that, even though it be held that the act of pronouncing judgment is a part of the trial, the court did not, by reason of the postponement from April 30th to June 4th, lose jurisdiction in the matter."

In Smith v. Hess (1883) 91 Ind. 424, the defendant pleaded guilty on the 21st day of August, 1883, to a charge of grand larceny, and the record entry of the court, showing the plea, was the following: "Sentence withheld." It further appeared that at the time the sentence was withheld the defendant was allowed to depart from the presence and custody of the court without bond or recognizance; that the judge of the court stated to him that if he was brought back, or ever came into the court again, he would be sentenced; that he was absent from the court, and a part of the time from the state, until the 27th day of October, 1883, when he was arrested without any new warrant, or new legal proceedings, and was sentenced by the judge of the criminal court, and remanded to the custody of the sheriff. The defendant contended, under a writ of habeas corpus, that the criminal court had authority to allow minors to go on good behavior, but not adults; that, by reason of the facts stated, the court lost jurisdiction of the subject and the person, and hence had no authority to pronounce the judgment and sentence; that being thus allowed to depart operated as an acquittal, and that his rearrest and sentence constituted a second jeopardy for the same offense. The appellate court affirmed the sentence, saying: "The legitimate inference from the statute is that the legislature, in its enactment, did not intend that the courts should allow adult offenders to go on good behavior. Without deciding what might be the result of such a practice, upon a proper case made and properly brought before us, we may say that, as at present advised, we do not feel like giving our sanction to that practice. We say this much, really, outside of the case before us. What we decide is, that the judgment of the criminal court under which appellant is imprisoned cannot be overthrown in the collateral attack here made upon it. For all irregularities and errors that may intervene in the trial and progress of a criminal cause, the statute of this state provides a direct, easy, cheap, and speedy remedy by appeal. The doctrine of the case is, that where such remedy is provided, defendants imprisoned under judgments, and seeking to overthrow them for reasons which do not render them absolutely void, and which are not apparent upon the record, will be driven to seek a remedy by appeal, or other direct proceeding. A judgment by a court of competent jurisdiction, valid upon its face, and a valid commitment under it, is an unanswerable return to a writ of habeas corpus. A large number of the states have statutes providing that a prisoner shall not be discharged under a writ of habeas corpus, where it appears that he is held in custody by virtue of the judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, or by virtue of a warrant issued upon such judgment or decree. This state is one of them. The writ of habeas corpus is not to take the place of a writ of error or a court of appeals."

In State v. Watson (1888) 95 Mo. 411, 8 S. W. 383, the defendant was convicted at a term of the circuit court held in November, 1882, and motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment were filed and overruled at that term, and the defendant appealed to the supreme court. The cause was stricken from the docket on motion of the attorney general because the record disclosed no final judgment, and at a term of the circuit court held in June, 1885, the defendant, then under bail, was brought before the court and sentenced in accordance with the previous verdict. The supreme court, in upholding the sentence of the trial court, although reversing the conviction on other grounds, said: "There seems to be no doubt the sentence may be postponed until a future day or term to suit the convenience of the court, or for cause shown. . . . After the motion for new trial is overruled, the defendant should be brought before the court and given an opportunity to show cause, if any he has, why sentence should not be pronounced. He may then present matters which will render it proper for the court to postpone a final disposition of the case until a future term of the court. It would be highly prejudicial to the administration of the criminal law, both as to the state and as to the defendant, to deny the court power to render final judgment at a time subsequent to conviction. The power to pass sentence is not confined to the term at which the defendant was convicted by any statute of this state, nor, we conclude, by the law in the absence of any statute. The failure to pronounce sentence in this case at the term at which the cause was tried was an omission on the part of the state; but the continued delay was evidently due to the appeal prosecuted by the defendant. But let the blame, whatever there is, rest where it may, it was competent for the trial court, when the appeal was out of the way, to pronounce sentence upon the defendant according to the verdict of the jury."

The foregoing case was followed in State v. Schierhoff (1890) 103 Mo. 47, 15 S. W. 151, wherein it was contended that the court, having entered judgment against the defendant while a motion for a new trial was pending, and having overruled the motion, could not wait a year and then impose a final sentence. The court said: "We do not think there is any merit in this contention. The case of State v. Watson, 95 Mo. 411, and the cases cited on page 415, are decisive of this point. A court does not lose jurisdiction of a case till final judgment be rendered."

III. Sentence imposed at subsequent term.

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, sentence need not necessarily be imposed at the same term of court at which the verdict or plea of guilty was had, and courts of general jurisdiction, having stated terms for the trial of criminal actions, have the power to continue the case to a subsequent term for sentence.

As was said in State ex rel. Gehrmann v. Osborne (N. J.) supra: "To one approaching this subject for the first time, the initial question which presents itself is whether there is any legal foundation for the popular conception, held, I think, by most lawyers, that a sentence which is the judgment of the court, to be legal and effective, must be pronounced at the term at which the conviction is had. So far as my researches go, this conception has no basis upon which to rest; that is to say, at common law, and where the matter is not regulated by statute, there does not appear to have been any legitimate objection to a sentence imposed after the term at which the conviction was had."

In Greene v. State (1908) 88 Ark. 290, 114 S. W. 477, the court said: "Sentence may be pronounced on a plea of guilty at a subsequent term." See to the same effect, State v. Wright (1910) 96 Ark. 203, 181 S. W. 688.

In Com. v. Mayloy (1868) 57 Pa. 291, it was said by way of dictum: "The court has power to remand and hold convicts for sentence as long as may be deemed necessary and advantageous to the ends of justice, and, in the meantime, may receive information in addition to that disclosed on the trial, in regard to what should be an appropriate sentence, under the circumstances, where the court has a discretion on the subject."

In MINER v. UNITED STATES (reported herewith) ante, 995, it appeared that sentence was postponed on the application of the defendant from term to term for three terms, recognition being required and given at each term for his appearance at the next term; and it was held that the failure of the court to impose sentence at the trial term did not deprive it of jurisdiction to impose sentence at a later term.

In Clanton v. State (Ala.) supra, it was held that sentence may be pronounced at a subsequent term, provided the case has been regularly kept in court so that there has been no discontinuance.

In a case where the defendant requested that sentence be deferred and the case continued on the docket, it was held not to be error to impose sentence at a subsequent term of the court. State v. Overton (N. C.) supra.

Where the court fixed no time for pronouncing sentence, and the case was continued, it was held not to be error to impose sentence at a subsequent term, held more than one year after a plea of guilty was entered. Cox v. State (Ark.) and State v. Stevens (Iowa) supra.

In Re St. Hilaire (Me.) supra, the petitioner was indicted at a September term, 1901, and on his plea of guilty the trial court ordered that the case be continued for sentence; that at the September term, 1902, the case was placed on the special docket, and at the April term, 1905, the indictment was brought forward and the petitioner was sentenced to a fine and imprisonment. The appellate court held that the sentence and commitment of the petitioner were legal, and said: "We have recognized the power of courts of general jurisdiction, having stated terms for the trial of criminal cases, for good cause to place the indictment on file or continue the case to a subsequent term for sentence."

In Ledgerwood v. State (1892) 134 Ind. 81, 33 N. E. 631, the trial court deferred the rendition of judgment, after a plea of guilty, until the next term of court, and it was held that the court's failure to render judgment until the next term did not divest its jurisdiction. It appeared, however, that the defendant was at all times, after his arrest, in the custody of the court. See to the same effect, Harbin v. State (1892) 133 Ind. 698, 33 N. E. 635.

In State v. Ray (1879) 50 Iowa, 520, the defendant was tried and convicted at the January term of court, but no judgment was rendered on the verdict until the August term of the same year, when he was adjudged to pay a fine. The appellate court affirmed the judgment, saying: "It is insisted that the court could not render judgment after the term, but our attention is called to no statute or decision which supports the position."

In People v. Felix (1872) 45 Cal. 163, it was held that sentence passed on a defendant at the third term of court after his conviction was valid, although it does not appear from the report of the case that the cause was continued by any record entry therein.

In United States v. May (1876) 2 MacArth. (D. C.) 512, the defendant was found guilty on November 9, 1875, and a motion was then made for a new trial, but the motion was overruled and an appeal was taken to the supreme court; and, with the assent of the defendant, the execution of the sentence was postponed for the statutory limit. The defendant having failed to obtain the relief sought, the case was sent back to the criminal court, whereupon that court, June 8, 1876, imposed a sentence of three years' imprisonment. The defendant contended that, the sentence not being pronounced at the same term at which the verdict was found, no sentence could be passed at any subsequent term. The court said: "I believe we all agreed that this proposition is untenable. Especially is this so when the delay in passing sentence is at the special instance and request of the defendant, which appears to be true in this case."

In State ex rel. Gehrmann v. Osborne (1912) 79 N. J. Eq. 430, 82 Atl. 484, the petitioner on April 28, 1909, pleaded not guilty, and on June 1, 1909, the case was called and put off; on June 14, 1909, the petitioner retracted her plea and pleaded nolo contendere, a plea of non vult being entered on the record, and bail continued for sentence; on June 11, 1909, the petitioner was called to the bar and sentence was postponed, and on August 9, 1911, sentence was ordered revoked; and on September 21, 1911, sentence was pronounced. In holding that it was within the power of the trial court to postpone the imposition of a sentence, and subsequently to impose sentence, the appellate court said: "If a defendant has pleaded nolo contendere, or guilty, or has been convicted upon trial, the court has the power, if the defendant does not object thereto, and therefore is assumed to assent thereto, to refrain from pronouncing a judgment or sentence, and may, at a subsequent time, hale the defendant before it, and impose the punishment in the same manner that it would have been justified in pronouncing it upon the very day when the case was first ripe for sentence."

In Ex parte Sparks (1913) 9 Okla. Crim. Rep. 665, 132 Pac. 1118, it was held that there was no statutory provision forbidding the pronouncing of sentence at a term subsequent to that in which the verdict was rendered, the court saying: "The action of the trial court in postponing judgment in this case to a subsequent term of the court is approved." See to the same effect, Beaubien v. State (1917) — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 165 Pac. 213.

In Barwick v. State (1913) 107 Ark. 115, 153 S. W. 1106, at the February term, 1907, the defendant pleaded guilty, and the court entered an order "that this cause be continued; that the defendant pay all costs herein at once, and that the fine be imposed at the pleasure of the court;" no further proceedings were had until the November term, 1912, when the court entered judgment against the defendant, on his plea of guilty, for a fine in the sum of $100. The appellate court sustained the judgment, saying: "No statute is brought to our attention which would operate as a bar, on account of lapse of time, to the exercise of the court's power to render judgment after the lapse of several terms."

It is well settled that if, through inadvertence or oversight on the part of the court, sentence is not pronounced during the term at which the case is tried, or the clerk neglects to enter a sentence duly pronounced, the court may impose sentence at a subsequent term.

United States v. May (D. C.) supra; Neace v. Com. (1915) 165 Ky. 739, 178 S. W. 1062; Easterling v. State (1858) 35 Miss. 210; Greenfield v. State (1872) 7 Baxt. (Tenn.) 18;

State v. Miller (1873) 6 Baxt. (Tenn.) 513; Dunn v. State (1912) 127 Tenn. 267, 154 S. W. 969; Ex parte Beard (1874) 41 Tex. 234; Cleek v. Com. (1871) 21 Gratt. (Va.) 777; Flint v. Com. (1912) 114 Va. 820, 76 S. E. 808.

Thus, in Dunn v. State (1912) 127 Tenn. 267, 154 S. W. 969, the court said: "The judgment on the verdict may be lawfully entered at a subsequent term, whether the failure to enter it at the trial term be the result of mere inadvertence on the part of the court, or misprision of the clerk."

In State v. Miller (1873) 6 Baxt. (Tenn.) 513, the defendant was tried and convicted April, 1872, but for some cause not disclosed by the record, the court failed or omitted to enter judgment on the verdict until the next succeeding term held in July; and it was held that "there was no error in this of which the defendant can complain."

In Neace v. Com. (1915) 165 Ky. 739, 178 S. W. 1062, by inadvertence or oversight of the clerk the judgment on the verdict was not entered at the March term of the court, although the counsel for the appellants and the judge believed that the judgment, following the verdict, which was passed on the defendants, had been duly entered in the order book. At the following May term the defendants were brought into court and sentenced, and judgment in conformity thereto was duly entered on the record. The appellate court, in sustaining the sentence, said: "When the judgment was entered at the May term of the court, there was before the court the verdict of the jury that had been entered on the records of the court when it was returned at the March term, and in entering judgment on this verdict at the May term the court merely followed the verdict and pronounced and had entered the identical judgment that was pronounced, but not entered, on the verdict at the March term of the court. If, however, the trial judge at the March term had, by oversight or inadvertence of any kind, failed to pronounce judgment on the verdict and for this reason the judgment had not been entered by the clerk, we have no doubt that at a subsequent term of the court the judge could have pronounced judgment on the verdict. So that whether as a matter of fact the court did or did not sentence the defendants at the March term is not material, nor does it matter whether the omission to enter judgment on the record book of the court at the March term was the fault of the judge or the clerk. The court had undenied power to pronounce judgment on the verdict and have it entered of record, and the jurisdiction and power to enter judgment on the verdict continued in the court until these things were done. It is urged that the substantial rights of the defendants were prejudiced by the failure of the record to show that judgment had been pronounced at the March term, as the right of appeal was thereby delayed. It is doubtless true that the right of appeal on account of this omission was delayed for a time, but this trifling delay cannot be allowed to interfere with the jurisdiction of the court to do at the May term what should have been done at the March term. The trial judge pronounced judgment and had it entered in due form immediately upon his attention being called to the omission by counsel for the defendants, and we have no doubt that he would earlier have done this had the matter been brought to his notice."

In Greenfield v. State (1872) 7 Baxt. (Tenn.) 18, the appellant was convicted at the May term, and his motion for a new trial and arrest of judgment being overruled, he was "remanded to jail," and the judge inadvertently omitted to impose sentence, or the clerk inadvertently omitted to enter it. No further action was taken until the September term, when the appellant was brought before the court, whereupon he moved for his discharge on the ground that no judgment had been rendered at the May term; but the court refused the motion and pronounced sentence on the verdict. The appellate court held the sentence valid, saying: "The time elapsing between the return of the verdict of the jury and the entering of judgment is not fatal to the judgment. They are different steps in the cause. Upon the return of the verdict, unless a motion for a new trial, or in arrest of judgment, is pending, or has been allowed, the court should pronounce judgment, and unless for special reasons it is delayed, it should be pronounced at the same term of the court, . . . but until the judgment is rendered, or the cause in some way disposed of, it is still pending, and stands continued with the unfinished business until the next term."

In Flint v. Com. (Va.) supra, the court, in holding that a judgment, which, by inadvertence, the court had omitted to enter on a verdict rendered at the trial term, may be entered at a subsequent term, said: "The court had full authority to enter the judgment upon a verdict rendered at a preceding term. The court speaks of it as a nunc pro tunc order, and in a certain sense it was; that is, it was the entry of a judgment at the October term which the court might have entered at a former term; but in effect it was in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction. The prosecution had, indeed, proceeded to a verdict, but until judgment was rendered it was a pending action, upon which it was the duty of the court to render judgment, unless it had seen fit for good cause to set it aside." See to the same effect, Cleek v. Com. (1871) 21 Gratt. (Va.) 777.

In United States v. May (1876) 2 MacArth. (D. C.) 512, the court, in referring to the omission to pass sentence, said: "We are of the opinion that the judge who tries a cause, and a verdict is found by the jury, if the judge, by accident, mistake, or design, should fail to pass sentence during the term of the court at which the verdict was found, he may do so at a subsequent term, and so may any other judge holding the same court."

In Ex parte Beard (1874) 41 Tex. 234, the relator was found guilty in October, 1871, and his punishment assessed at fifteen years' imprisonment; his motion for a new trial being overruled, he appealed, and the case was reversed and remanded, but upon a rehearing, it appearing that no final judgment had been rendered, the case was again remanded with directions to enter judgment nunc pro tunc. It further appeared that there was an omission to enter judgment at the next succeeding term, and it was not entered until the June term, 1872; and the judgment thus entered was affirmed on appeal, and the relator was sentenced to the penitentiary, from which place he obtained a writ of habeas corpus. The applicant claimed that he was unlawfully imprisoned, because the judgment of conviction was rendered during the second term of the court, after the trial and verdict against him, and contrary to the statute. The supreme court held that the judgment was valid, saying: "We are of opinion that the court below had a right to render the judgment nunc pro tunc, notwithstanding a term of the district court had intervened between the verdict and judgment so rendered, which had been caused by the effort of the applicant to carry his case to the supreme court on appeal, without a proper judgment having been rendered. The article relied on (Paschal's Dig. art. 3151) makes provision for rendering a judgment at the next term after verdict, but it does not restrict the general powers of the court to render a judgment at a later period than the next term when it clearly appears that the prosecution has not been abandoned and a proper case for it is presented."

In Easterling v. State (1858) 35 Miss. 210, the jury returned a verdict of guilty, and the entry on the minutes of the court recording the verdict was as follows: "It is, therefore, considered by the court, that the state of Mississippi do recover of and from the defendant, Simeon Easterling, the sum of — dollars, together with the costs in this behalf expended." At the next term of the court the judgment was corrected, and it was ordered to be entered as of the last term, to which the defendant objected on the ground that the court had lost jurisdiction. The appellate court sustained the sentence, saying: "After the verdict was returned, it was the duty of the court to render judgment against the defendant for the penalty prescribed by law; and until that was done, the defendant was not discharged from the custody of the law, and the jurisdiction of the court was not at an end. It is manifest here that the essential thing required by law had not been done,—an award of the punishment prescribed by law for the offense; and that the verdict stood at the term at which it was rendered without a judgment. The judgment purporting to be rendered was without substance, and the judgment of the law remained to be pronounced. It was, therefore, competent for the court, at the next term, to render judgment upon the verdict for the penalty prescribed by law. It is not the case of a judgment merely erroneous, but of one without substance and void."

IV. Sentence imposed at adjourned term.

It has been held that sentence may be imposed on a plea or verdict of guilty at an adjourned term of the court, although the plea or verdict was had at a regular term. Charles v. State (1836) 4 Port. (Ala.) 107; Greene v. State (1908) 88 Ark. 290, 114 S. W. 477; Williams v. Com. (1857) 29 Pa. 102; Com. v. Murphy (1911) 45 Pa. Super. Ct. 185.

Thus, in Com. v. Murphy (Pa.) supra, it was said: "It is well settled, however, that a person convicted by the jury at a regular term may be sentenced at one of these adjourned courts."

Likewise, sentence may be imposed at a subsequent term by a different judge than the one who presided at the trial term. Charles v. State, (Ala.) supra.

V. Effect of escape of accused.

The decisions are in accord that where the accused escapes from custody, after conviction and before sentence, the court has jurisdiction to impose sentence at any subsequent term. Thus, in Thurman v. State (1891) 54 Ark. 120, 15 S. W. 84, the appellant pleaded guilty and the court adjourned without imposing sentence, but before the next term he escaped from prison, and after an absence of several years was recaptured, and sentence was formally pronounced by the court in which the conviction was had. The appellate court, in sustaining the sentence, said: "The statute does not require that the sentence shall be pronounced and judgment entered at the same term at which a plea of guilty is entered, and the entry of the judgment at a subsequent term does not alter or conflict with anything done by the court at the previous term. There is, therefore, no lack of power in the court, and the judgment may be deferred until a succeeding term." So, in Smith v. Com. (1884) 6 Ky. L. Rep. 305, the fact that a verdict was returned in October, 1881, and sentence was not pronounced until May, 1884, was held not to entitle the defendant to a reversal, where it appeared that he had absconded after the jury had retired to consider their verdict, as judgment could not be rendered against him except in his presence, and he was not brought before the court until the time when judgment was rendered.

As to the power of the court to re-sentence a prisoner who escapes after the imposition of the death penalty, see Bland v. State (1851) 2 Ind. 608; State v. Cardwell (1886) 95 N. C. 643; Rex v. Okey (1674) 1 Lev. 61, 83 Eng. Reprint, 297; Rex v. Ratcliffe (1746) 1 Wils. 150, 95 Eng. Reprint, 543.

VI. Effect of pendency of proceedings to review or the like.

The rule seems to be well settled that during the pendency of a motion for a new trial, in arrest of judgment, or to give the defendant time in which to perfect an appeal or writ of error, a postponement or delay in pronouncing sentence does not deprive the court of jurisdiction to impose later a valid sentence. Hall v. Patterson (1891) 45 Fed. 352; Rankin v. Superior Ct. (1910) 157 Cal. 189, 106 Pac. 718; People v. Rhodes (1912) 17 Cal. App. 789, 121 Pac. 935; People v. Boling (1916) 32 Cal. App. 42, 161 Pac. 1169; Darsey v. State (1915) 17 Ga. App. 280, 36 S. E. 781; State v. Guild (1828) 10 N. J. L. 163, 18 Am. Dec. 404; Beaubein v. State (1917) — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 165 Pac. 213. And see

People v. Brewer (1908) 142 Ill. App. 610.

A delay of three or four years from the rendition of the first verdict to the sentence of the court, caused by an appeal to the supreme court of the state and to the Supreme Court of the United States, has been held to give the accused no ground of complaint. Darsey v. State (1915) 17 Ga. App. 280, 86 S. E. 781.

In Rankin v. Superior Ct. (1910) 157 Cal. 189, 106 Pac. 718, the court, in referring to the statutory time within which sentence must be pronounced, said: "The court has no authority to fix the time for pronouncing judgment for a day later than five days after the verdict; that if a motion for new trial or in arrest of judgment is made, the court may, for the purpose of deciding the same, extend the time for ten days, and that where the question of probation is considered, the court may, for that purpose, extend the time twenty days. These two provisions for extension of time are not cumulative, and the latest date to which the court is authorized to extend the time for rendering judgment, where present insanity is not involved, is a day not more than twenty-five days after the date of the return of the verdict. . . . If judgment was not pronounced within the time limited, a new trial was made imperative, if the defendant so desired." See also the following cases, wherein the statutory limit of time for pronouncing sentence during the pendency of proceedings to review, was discussed. People v. Treshenko (1911) 159 Cal. 456, 114 Pac. 578; People v. Bernard (1913) 21 Cal. App. 56, 130 Pac. 1063; People v. Flavin (1913) 21 Cal. App. 244, 131 Pac. 321; People v. Winner (1916) 31 Cal. App. 352, 160 Pac. 689; People v. Lamattina (1918) — Cal. App. —, 175 Pac. 484.

In People v. Rhodes (1912) 17 Cal. App. 789, 121 Pac. 935, wherein sentence was not pronounced until the tenth day after the rendition of the verdict, because of the pendency of a motion for a new trial, it was held that the court was not deprived of jurisdiction, even if no continuance was had. The court said: "The record shows that upon the rendition of the verdict the court fixed the time for pronouncing judgment upon the tenth day thereafter. This was within the time allowed by § 1191 of the Penal Code, where such extension is granted for the purpose of hearing a motion for a new trial. At the time appointed for the rendition of judgment a motion for a new trial was made and denied, and judgment thereupon rendered. While it does not affirmatively appear that the time for pronouncing judgment was extended to ten days for the purpose of hearing such motion for a new trial, it does not affirmatively appear that the extension was not made for such purpose, and we must therefore presume that the court acted regularly, and that the continuance was for such purpose."

In People v. Boling (1916) 32 Cal. App. 42, 161 Pac. 1169, the verdict was rendered on March 25th, and the court fixed March 28th as the day for pronouncing sentence, but on that day the time of sentence was continued to April 4th, on which day a motion for a new trial was made and denied, whereupon the defendant applied for probation, and the court extended the time for sentence to April 20th, and then to July 19th, on which day the defendant moved for a new trial on the ground that sentence had not been pronounced within the period limited by statute. The court denied the motion, but the ruling was reversed on appeal, the appellate court holding that the time of extension granted by statute was not cumulative, and more than 110 days had elapsed since the verdict was rendered.

In Hall v. Patterson (1891) 45 Fed. 352, the petitioner was convicted on May 19, 1883, but was not sentenced until April 4, 1884, and the delay in sentence was caused by the petitioner's interposition of special pleas in bar to the indictments, which pleas were certified to the supreme court of New Jersey for its advisory opinion; and immediately on the rendition of its opinion sentence was pronounced. It was held that the New Jersey statute, fixing the punishment of the offense, and providing that a defendant "on being thereof convicted" shall be punished, did not require sentence to be immediately pronounced.

In State v. Guild (1828) 10 N. J. L. 163, 18 Am. Dec. 404, the pronouncement of sentence was deferred so that the advisory opinion of the supreme court on several questions of law, which had arisen during the trial, might be obtained. It was held that jurisdiction to sentence was not lost by the delay.

In Beaubien v. State (1917) — Okla. Crim. Rep. —, 165 Pac. 213, the verdict was returned on September 2, 1915, and thereupon the court appointed September 13, 1915, as the time for pronouncing sentence; on September 4, 1915, the defendant filed a motion for a new trial, which was pending until October 25, 1915, when the motion was overruled, and sentence pronounced. It was claimed that, as the term of court at which the verdict was returned had expired by operation of law, the court had lost jurisdiction to pronounce sentence; but the appellate court held to the contrary and sustained the sentence.

In People v. Brewer (1908) 142 Ill. App. 610, the defendant was convicted on March 6, 1906, and on the following day he entered a motion for a new trial, which was taken under advisement by the court, and on March 9, 1907, the motion was overruled; on May 18, 1907, the court entered judgment on the verdict and pronounced sentence on the defendant. It was contended that as the judgment was not entered and the sentence imposed until the April term, 1907, the court lost jurisdiction to lawfully perform those acts. The court said: "When the motion for a new trial was entered by plaintiff in error at the February term, 1906, and no action taken thereon at that term, the case stood continued until the next term of the court in accordance with the provision of paragraph 56, chapter 37, Hurd's Stat. 1905. The delay in entering judgment and imposing sentence from the February term, 1907, when motion for a new trial was overruled, until the April term following, we do not regard as so unreasonable as to oust the court of jurisdiction to enter judgment and impose sentence. The practice, however, of delaying action by the court upon a motion for a new trial and in entering judgment and imposing sentence after conviction, as was done in this case, is not conducive to the wholesome administration of justice and should be discouraged."

Where the court delays the imposing of sentence in order to await the determination of another trial of the accused for the same or a similar offense, the delay does not deprive it of jurisdiction to pronounce a valid sentence. Ex parte Morton (1901) 132 Cal. 346, 64 Pac. 469; People v. Robertson (1907) 6 Cal. App. 514, 92 Pac. 498.

In Robinson v. State (1908) 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 559, 113 S. W. 763, it was held that, where no sentence was pronounced at the trial term, the court could pass sentence at a subsequent term, although the judgment was affirmed on an intervening appeal, as such affirmance was invalid, owing to the omission to pronounce sentence.

But where a motion for a new trial is overruled and a notice of appeal is given, no sentence being imposed, a sentence subsequently pronounced and entered nunc pro tunc is without lawful authority and void. Estes v. State (1898) 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 506, 43 S. W. 982.

In Hinman v. State (1908) 54 Tex. Crim. Rep. 434, 113 S. W. 280, the appellant was convicted at the August term, 1907, and a motion for a new trial being overruled, notice of appeal was given, and on account of the illness of the judge, or for some other cause, sentence was not pronounced until the following January term; and it was held that the court did not have jurisdiction to pass sentence at that time. The appellate court said: "When the August term of the court adjourned, all power of the district judge over it ceased, except to substitute lost or destroyed records.

. . . That court could in no manner amend the record, or add to it otherwise than stated. It was without power, pending the appeal to this court, to sentence, or to enter a judgment on the verdict even. The notice of appeal had attached the jurisdiction of this court, had ousted the jurisdiction of the trial court, and, until this court has passed upon the appeal, the trial court is without authority to enter a judgment or sentence."

In Texas the rule has been recognized that, where an appeal in a criminal case is dismissed because of the omission to enter judgment on the verdict, the court has the power to perfect the record at a subsequent term, by causing the formal entry of the judgment on the verdict. O'Connell v. State (1857) 18 Tex. 359, where the court said: "The entry of judgment in this case was in accordance with a settled practice, which has been recognized by this court in numerous cases. Where, as in this case, the court has failed to enter up judgment on a verdict at the term, but has caused entry to be made at a subsequent term, this court has uniformly entertained the appeal." See to the same effect, Smith v. State (1876) 1 Tex. App. 408.

In Tennessee the same rule prevails. Nolin v. State (1868) 6 Coldw. (Tenn.) 12; State v. Miller (1873) 6 Baxt. (Tenn.) 513.

VII. Waiver of delay.

It has been held that, where the conduct of the accused shows that he has waived any delay in pronouncing sentence, he cannot maintain that the court lost jurisdiction to impose sentence at a later or subsequent term. Barwick v. State (1913) 107 Ark. 115, 153 S. W. 1106; People v. Creitsner (1914) 25 Cal. App. 647, 145 Pac. 109; People v. Everhardt (1887) 104 N. Y. 591, 11 N. E. 62; People v. Trimble (1892) 131 N. Y. 118, 29 N. E. 1100, affirming (1891) 60 Hun, 364, 38 N. Y. S. R. 999, 15 N. Y. Supp. 60.

Thus, in People v. Everhardt (1887) 104 N. Y. 591, 11 N. E. 62, the defendant moved that judgment should be arrested because "the verdict was rendered and the jury discharged on the 18th day of December, 1885, and during the December term of the court; and afterwards, to wit, on the 24th day of December, 1885, the court was duly adjourned until the next term, by which adjournment the December term was finally adjourned without day, no judgment having been rendered, and the defendant not having applied for or consented to any delay in the rendition of judgment beyond the 22d day of December, 1885, being the Tuesday following next after the day on which the verdict was rendered; and the court now holding the January term, 1886, has no jurisdiction to render judgment in the action." The court of appeals answered this contention by saying: "The court which pronounced the judgment was the same court which tried the indictment, and in which the verdict was rendered, and it would be a sufficient answer in this case that no substantial harm was done to the defendant by the delay from the 22d day of December to the 7th day of January following. But upon this record it may fairly be said that the defendant, not objecting, waived any delay within the meaning of § 472 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, which provides that the time for pronouncing judgment after a verdict of guilty 'must be at least two days after the verdict, if the court intend to remain in session so long, or, if not, as remote a time as can reasonably be allowed; but any delay may be waived by the defendant.' Judgment in this case was postponed at the request of the defendant until the 22d day of December, to enable his counsel to make a motion for arrest of judgment, and for a new trial. On that day he did not appear or request to appear in court to make his motion, and hence he must be assumed to have been wholly indifferent to the delay and to have consented thereto. There is, therefore, no reason for saying that the court lost jurisdiction to pronounce judgment on a subsequent day."

In People v. Trimble (N. Y.) supra, the defendant, in answer to an indictment, pleaded a previous conviction for the same offense, which issue was tried and resulted in a verdict "for the people;" the defendant was thereafter permitted to plead over, and, without demanding the entry of a formal judgment or objecting to its omission, interposed a plea of not guilty, which issue was tried and the prisoner convicted. It was held that the defendant could not avail himself of the omission to enter a formal judgment on the first verdict, the court saying: "The omission of a formal judgment upon the first verdict was not objected to on behalf of the accused, nor was any demand made by him for its entry. If entered, it must necessarily have been either a general judgment of conviction, which seems to be the claim of the appellant, or a judgment of respondeat ouster, the plea not sustained, and the defendant must answer over. Certainly he cannot be heard to object that a formal judgment of conviction was not entered, for the error, if it was one, inured to his benefit. He accepted the order granted and availed himself of the privilege it gave him to answer over. He cannot now be permitted to complain that he should have been convicted when the issue of his guilt or innocence had not yet been tried."

Where the court continues a case from term to term, and the defendant does not ask that sentence be imposed or that he be discharged, he is held to have waived the delay and cannot complain because the court delayed pronouncing sentence on his plea of guilty. Barwick v. State (Ark.) supra.

In People v. Creitser (1914) 25 Cal. App. 647, 145 Pac. 109, the defendant, after entering a plea of guilty and after several postponements of the time for passing sentence, withdrew his plea of guilty, and asked that the case should be set down for trial; and the matter of fixing a date for the trial being continued to a certain date, the defendant again entered a plea of guilty and informed the court that he desired to dispense with any further services of his attorney. It was held that the defendant, on entering his plea of guilty the second time, waived any delay in pronouncing sentence, the court saying: "Assuming that there is a legal appeal here, it is readily obvious that, while the court in the first instance exceeded its authority by postponing the matter of passing sentence beyond the time expressly limited by the statute, that point cannot now be urged by the defendant, since it appears, as we have shown, that he withdrew his plea of guilty after the matter of pronouncing judgment had been postponed from one date to another until the statutory period had been passed, and that, after so withdrawing said plea, he again entered a plea of guilty, waived time for the pronouncing of judgment, and the court thereupon and at once pronounced its judgment of sentence. The court, therefore, in passing sentence was obviously within the time limit prescribed by the statute for pronouncing judgment upon what seems to have been at that time the only plea to the information before it."

v.

JOHN BLANCHARD EDGAR, Appt.

New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals—June 19, 1916.

(86 N. J. Eq. 205, 98 Atl. 407.)

Injunction — against action at law — matters arising pendente lite.

1. Injunction does not lie to prevent further prosecution of an action at law because of an accord and satisfaction effected after beginning of the action.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1026.]

Accord and satisfaction — effect.

2. Performance by one party to an accord and satisfaction of the obligation imposed upon him thereby extinguishes the claim against him upon which the other party has begun action.

[See 1 R. C. L. 199.]

— cognizance by court.

3. An accord and satisfaction made between litigants privately and without judicial sanction is not entitled to judicial cognizance until properly brought before the court in which the action was pending.

[See 1 R. C. L. 202.]

— refusal of party to be bound — effect.

4. The refusal of one party to an accord and satisfaction to be bound by it does not alter its legal effect as a settlement.

[See 1 R. C. L. 201.]

— effect on pending action.

5. An accord and satisfaction of the matter involved in a pending action affords a complete defense to the further prosecution of the action.

[See 1 R. C. L. 201.]

Fraud — availability at law.

6. That an accord and satisfaction was induced by fraud may be shown in an action at law in which it is sought to rely upon it as a defense.

[See 1 R. C. L. 201.]

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Court of Chancery in favor of complainants in a suit to restrain the prosecution of an action at law in the Supreme Court. Reversed.

Statement by Kalisch, J.

The complainants filed their bill in the court of chancery to restrain the prosecution of an action at law in the supreme court. The bill and affidavit in support of it disclosed that John Blanchard Edgar, the defendant-appellant, had an action pending in the supreme court to recover $50,000 from Edward S. Savage and his wife, the respondents; that, while the action was pending, an agreement was entered into by Edgar and Savage and reduced to writing, in which it was recited that it was the desire and purpose of both parties to settle and adjust all matters of difference of accounts between them, and thereupon it was agreed that Savage should transfer to Edgar 250 shares of the common stock of the Trembly Point Corporation and should, in addition thereto, pay to Edgar $2,000 in cash, and give him a note for $2,000 more, payable in thirty days. This was to be in full settlement of all claims and demands whatsoever. In consideration thereof Edgar agreed to discontinue the action at once and pay all fees, including his attorney's fees and counsel fees. The cash was paid, the note was given, and two days afterwards the parties met by appointment in Mr. Savage's office. Savage took a certificate for 250 shares of the Trembly Point stock out of his safe, indorsed it in blank, exhibited it to Edgar, and together they then went to the transfer office of the company to have the stock there transferred to Edgar. The stock was thereupon delivered to the secretary of the company, and he was requested by Savage to transfer the name to Edgar, whereupon Edgar said that he would prefer to have the transfer of the stock made to his wife, and thereupon the secretary was directed to make the transfer as Edgar had requested, and this was done. Subsequently, Edgar refused to accept the stock upon the grounds that he was not bound to take it until he had ascertained its value, and that investigation had shown him that it was not worth what Savage represented it to be. After complainants filed their bill to stay the action at law, Edgar tendered back the cash and the notes, which Savage refused to accept.

The bill avers "that the said settlement made by the complainants with the said Edgar was positive and final, and was accepted by Edgar together with the property paid and delivered, pursuant to the terms of the same, as a full compromise settlement of the said action of the said Edgar against the complainants, and the agreement of settlement made in writing, as hereinbefore mentioned, has been fully carried out and performed in all respects on the part of the said complainants, but that the said Edgar had violated the said agreement in that he has attempted and is now attempting to bring the said action to trial in the supreme court notwithstanding the same had been fully settled."

The case shows that after the settlement was made, and after Edgar, the plaintiff in the action at law, had noticed the case for trial, notwithstanding the settlement, that the complainants, defendants in that action, presented a petition to the supreme court in which the agreement was set up, and in which it was averred that the cash and note had been delivered to Edgar and the stock had been transferred to Edgar's wife at his request. In answer to the petition, Edgar set up that the stock was not worth what it was represented to be, and that when tendered to him it was made a condition of its delivery that he should sign a statement that the defendant Savage was making no representation as to its value, except the appraisals made by Mr. Corbin and Mr. Day, that Edgar declined to sign this, and, under the advice of his attorney, declined to accept the stock. The supreme court declined to perpetually restrain the action because of the controverted facts upon which the application was based, discharged the rule with leave to the defendants to file a supplementary answer setting up the settlement, and preserving to Edgar the right to take issue upon such answer and have the questions of fact settled by a jury.

From the refusal of the supreme court to perpetually restrain the action at law, the respondents herein appeal to this court, and upon a motion made by the appellant herein, in that cause, the appeal of the respondents was dismissed upon the ground that the action of the supreme court rested upon its discretion and, therefore, was not appealable.
